1. What is here foretold concerning the Messiah himself. 1st. He shall have his commission from God himself; I will set him up, ver. 23; I will raise him up, ver. 29. He sanctified and sealed him, appointed and anointed him. 2nd. He shall be the great Shepherd of the sheep, who shall do that for his flock which no one else could do. He is the one Shepherd under whom Jews and Gentiles should be one fold. 3rd. He is God's servant, employed by him and for him, and doing all in obedience to his will, with an eye to his glory; his servant to re-establish his kingdom among men, and advance the interests of that kingdom. 4th. He is David, one after God's own heart, set as his king upon the holy hill of Sion, made the head of the corner, with whom the covenant of royalty is made, and to whom God would give the throne of his father David. He is both the root and offspring of David. 5th. He is the "plant of renown," because a "righteous branch," Jer. xxiii. 5,—a branch of the Lord that is beautiful and glorious, Isa. iv. 2. He has a name above every name, a throne above every throne, and may therefore well be called a branch of renown. Some understand it of the church, the "planting of the Lord," Isa. lxi. 3. "Its name shall be remembered," Ps. xlv. 17, and Christ's in it.

2. Concerning the great charter, by which the Messiah should be incorporated, and upon which it should be founded; ver. 25, "I will make with them a covenant of peace." The covenant of grace is a covenant of peace; in it God is at peace with us, speaks peace to us, and assures us of peace, of all good,—all the good we need to make us happy. The tenor of this covenant is, "I the Lord will be their God," a God all-sufficient to them, ver. 24, will own them, and will be owned by them. In order to this, my servant David shall be a prince among them, to reduce them to their allegiance, to receive their homage, and to reign over them, in them, and for them. Note, Those, and those only, that have the Lord Jesus for their prince have the Lord Jehovah for their God. And then they, even the house of Israel, shall be my people. If we take God to be our God, he will take us to be his people. From this covenant between God and Israel there results communion; "I the Lord their God am with them," to converse with them; and they shall know it, and have the comfort of it.

3. Concerning the privileges of those that are the faithful subjects of this kingdom of the Messiah, and interested in the covenant of peace. These are here set forth figuratively, as the blessings of the flock; but we have a key to it, ver. 31. They that belong to this flock, though they are spoken of as sheep, are really men,—men that have the Lord for their God, and are in covenant with him. Now to them it is promised,

1st. That they shall enjoy a holy security under the Divine protection. Christ, our good Shepherd, has caused "the evil beasts to cease out of the land," ver. 25, having vanquished all our spiritual enemies, broken their power, and triumphed over them; the roaring lion is not a roaring, devouring lion to them. "They shall no more be a prey to the heathen," nor the heathen a terror to them; "neither shall the beasts of the land devour them." Sin and Satan, death and hell, are conquered. And then "they shall dwell safely," not only in the folds but in the fields, in the wilderness, in the woods, where the beasts of prey are. They shall not only dwell there, but they shall sleep there, which notes not only that, the beasts being made to cease, there shall be no danger, but, their consciences being purified and pacified, they shall be in no apprehension of danger; not only safe from evil, but quiet from the fear of evil. Note, Those may lay them down and sleep securely, sleep at ease, that have Christ for their prince; for he will be their protector, and make them to dwell in safety. None shall hurt them, nay, "none shall make them afraid." If God be for us who can be against us? "Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed." Through Christ God delivers his people, not only from the things they have reason to fear, but from their fear even of death itself, from all that fear that has torment. This safety from evil is promised, ver. 27, "They shall be safe in their land," in no danger of being invaded and enslaved, though their great plenty be a temptation to their neighbours to desire their land; and that which shall make them think themselves safe is, their confidence in the wisdom, power, and goodness of God; "They shall know that I am the Lord." All our disquieting fears arise from our ignorance of God, and mistakes concerning him. And their experience of his particular care concerning them encourageth their confidence in him; "I have broken the bonds of their yoke," with which they have been brought and held down under oppression, and have "delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them;" from whence they shall argue, He that has delivered doth and will, therefore will we dwell safely. This is explained and applied to our gospel state; Lu. i. 74, "That we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear," as those may do that serve him in faith.

2nd. That they shall enjoy a spiritual plenty of all good things—the best things—for their comfort and happiness. "They shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land," ver. 29. Famine and scarcity, when Israel was punished with that judgment, turned as much to their reproach among the heathen as any other, because the fruitfulness of Canaan was so much talked of. But now "They shall not bear that shame of the heathen any more;" for "the showers shall come down in their season," even "showers of blessings," ver. 26. Christ is a Shepherd that will feed his people; and they shall go in and out and find pasture. First. They shall not be consumed with hunger; for they shall not be put off with the world for a portion, which is not bread, which satisfies not, and which those that are put off with cannot but be "consumed with hunger." The ordinances of the ceremonial law are called beggarly elements; for there was little in them compared with the Christian institutes, "wherewith the mower fills his hand and he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." They that "hunger and thirst after righteousness" shall not be consumed with that hunger, for "they shall be filled;" and he that drinks of the water that Christ gives him, the still waters by which he leads his sheep, shall never thirst. Secondly. "Showers of blessings" shall come upon them, ver. 26, 27. The heavens shall yield their dews, the trees of the field also shall yield her fruit. The seat of this plenty is God's hill, his holy hill of Zion; for on that mountain, in the gospel church, it is that God has "made to all nations a feast," so that those must join themselves that would partake of gospel benefits. The cause of this plenty is the showers that come down in their season, that descend upon the mountains of Zion, the graces of Christ, his doctrine that drops as the dew, the graces of Christ, and the gifts and comforts of his Spirit, by which we are made fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. The instances of this plenty are the blessings of heaven poured down upon us, and the products of grace brought forth by us, our comfort in God's favour, and God's glory in our fruit-bearing. The extent of this plenty is very large, to all the "places round about my hill;" for "out of Sion shall go forth the law," shall go forth light to a dark world, and the river that shall water a dry and desert world; all that are in the neighbourhood of Sion shall fare better for it, and the nearer the church the nearer its God. And, lastly, the effect of this plenty is, "I will make them a blessing," eminently and exemplarily blessed, patterns of happiness, Isa. xix. 24. Or, they shall be blessings to all about them, diffusively useful. Note, Those that are the blessed of the Lord must study to make themselves blessings to the world. He that is good, let him do good; he that has received the gift, the grace, let him minister the same.

Now this promise of the Messiah and his kingdom spoke much comfort to those to whom it was then made, for they might be sure God would not utterly destroy their nation, how low soever it might be brought, as long as that blessing was in the womb of it, Isa. lxv. 8. But it speaks much more comfort to us to whom it is fulfilled, who are the sheep of this good Shepherd, are fed in his pastures, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things by him.

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was promised in the foregoing chapter, that when the time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, should come, especially the time for sending the Messiah, and setting up his kingdom in the world, God would cause the enemies of the church to cease, and the blessings and comforts of the church to abound. This chapter enlargeth upon the former promise, concerning the destruction of the enemies of the church; the next chapter upon the latter promise, the replenishing of the church with blessings. Mount Seir, that is, Edom, is the enemy prophesied against in this chapter, but fitly put here, as in the prophesy of Obadiah, for all the enemies of the church; for, as they all walked in the way of Cain that hated Abel, so they all walked in the way of Esau that hated Jacob, but over whom Jacob, by virtue of a particular blessing, was to have dominion. Now here we have, I. The sin charged upon the Edomites, and that was their spite and malice to Israel, ver. 5, 10—13. II. The ruin threatened that should come upon them for this sin: God will be against them, ver. 3; and then their country shall be laid waste, ver. 4; depopulated, and made quite desolate, ver. 6—9; and left so when other nations that had been wasted should recover themselves, ver. 14, 15.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against mount Seir, and prophesy against it, 3 And say unto it,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, O mount Seir, I am against thee,
And I will stretch out mine hand against thee,
And I will make thee most desolate.
4 I will lay thy cities waste, and thou shalt be desolate
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD.
5 Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred,
And hast shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword
In the time of their calamity, in the time that their iniquity had an end:
6 Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, [thee:
I will prepare thee unto blood, and blood shall pursue
Sith thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue
7 Thus will I make mount Seir most desolate, [thee.
And cut off from it him that passeth out and him that returneth.

MOUNT SEIR.

8 And I will fill his mountains with his slain men:
In thy hills, and in thy valleys, and in all thy rivers,
Shall they fall that are slain with the sword.
9 I will make thee perpetual desolations, and thy cities shall not return:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Mount Seir was mentioned as partner with Moab in one of the threatenings we had before, ch. xxv. 8; but here it is convicted and condemned by itself, and has woes of its own. The prophet must boldly set his face against Edom, and prophesy particularly against it; for the God of Israel hath said, "O mount Seir, I am against thee!" Note, Those that have God against them have the word of God against them, and the face of his ministers; neither dare they prophesy any good of them, but evil. The prophet must tell the Edomites that God has a controversy with them, and let them know,

First. What is the cause and ground of that controversy, ver. 5. God espouseth his people's cause, and will plead it; takes what is done against them as done against himself, and will reckon for it; and it is upon their account that God now contends with the Edomites. 1. Because of the enmity they had against the people of God, that was rooted in the heart; Thou hast had a perpetual hatred to them, to the very name of an Israelite. The Edomites kept up an hereditary malice against Israel, the same that Esau bore to Jacob, because he got the birthright and the blessing. Esau had been reconciled to Jacob, had embraced and kissed him, Gen. xxxiii.; and we do not find that ever he quarrelled with him again; but the posterity of Esau would never be reconciled to the seed of Jacob, but hated them with a perpetual hatred. Note, Children will be more apt to imitate the vices than the virtues of their parents, and to tread in the steps of their sin than in the steps of their repentance. Parents should therefore be careful not to set their children any bad example; for, though through the grace of God they may return and prevent the mischief of what they have done amiss to themselves, they may not be able to obviate the ill influence of it upon their children. It is strange how deeply rooted national antipathies sometimes are, and how long they last, but not to be wondered at that profane Edomites hate pious Israelites, since the old enmity that was put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent (Gen iii. 15) will continue to the end. "Marvel not if the world hate you." 2. Because of the injuries they had done to the people of God. They shed their blood "by the force of the sword, in the time of their calamity." They did not attack them as fair and open enemies, but laid wait for them, to cut off those of them that had escaped, Oba. 14. Or, they drove them back upon the swords of the pursuers, by which they fell. It was cowardly as well as barbarous to take advantage of their distress, and for neighbours with whom they had lived peaceably to smite them secretly when strangers openly invaded them. It was in the time that their iniquity had an end, that is, when the measure of it was full, and destruction came. Note, Even those that suffer justly, and for their sins, yet are to be pitied, and not trampled upon. If the father corrects one child, he expects the rest should tremble at it, not triumph in it.

Secondly. What should be the effect and issue of that controversy. If God stretch out his hand against the country of Edom, he will make it "most desolate," ver. 3,—desolation and desolation. 1. The inhabitants shall be slain with the sword; ver. 6, "I will prepare thee unto blood." Edom shall be gradually weakened, and so be the more easily conquered, and the enemy shall gather strength the more effectually to subdue it. Thus preparation is in the making a great while before for this destruction. "Thou hast not hated blood;" it implies, thou hast delighted in it, and thirsted after it. Those that do not keep a rooted hatred of sin, when a temptation to it is very strong will be in danger of yielding to it. Some read it, 'Unless thou hatest blood,' that is, unless thou dost repent, and put off this bloody disposition, "blood shall pursue thee." And then it is an intimation that the judgment may yet be prevented by a thorough reformation. "If he turn not, he will whet his sword," Ps. vii. 12; but if he turn, he will lay it by. "Blood shall pursue thee," that is, the guilt of the blood which thou hast shed, or the judgment of blood; thy bloodthirsty enemies shall pursue thee, which way soever thou seekest to make thy escape. A great and general slaughter shall be made of the Idumeans, such as had been foretold, Isa. xxxiv. 6; the mountains and hills, the valleys and rivers, shall be filled with the slain, ver. 8. The pursuers shall overtake those that flee, and shall give no quarter, but put them all to the sword. Note, When God comes to make inquisition for blood, those that have shed the blood of his Israel shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy. Satia te sanguine quem sitisti,—'Glut thyself with blood, after which thou hast thirsted.' 2. The country shall be laid waste. The cities shall be destroyed, ver. 4; the country made "most desolate," ver. 7; for God will cut off both him that passeth out and him that returneth; and, when the inhabitants are cut off that should keep the cities in repair, they will decay and go into ruins; and those that should till the land, that will soon be overrun with briers and thorns, and become a wilderness. Note, Those who help forward the desolations of Israel may expect to be themselves made desolate. And that which completes the judgment is, that Edom shall be made "perpetual desolations," ver. 9; and the cities shall never return to their former state, nor the inhabitants of them come back from their captivity and dispersion. Note, Those that have a perpetual enmity to God and his people, as the carnal mind has, can expect no other but to be made a perpetual desolation. Implacable malice will justly be punished with irreparable ruin.

10 Because thou hast said,
These two nations and these two countries shall be mine,
And we will possess it;
Whereas the LORD was there:
11 Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD,
I will even do according to thine anger, and according to thine envy
Which thou hast used out of thy hatred against them;
And I will make myself known among them, when I have judged thee.
12 And thou shalt know that I am the LORD,
And that I have heard all thy blasphemies which thou hast spoken
Against the mountains of Israel, saying,
They are laid desolate, they are given us to consume.
13 Thus with your mouth ye have boasted against me,
And have multiplied your words against me: I have [heard them.
14 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
When the whole earth rejoiceth, I will make thee desolate.
15 As thou didst rejoice at the inheritance of the house of [Israel,
Because it was desolate,
So will I do unto thee:
Thou shalt be desolate, O mount Seir, and all Idumea, even all of it:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

Here is, First. A farther account of the Edomites, and their ill carriage towards the people of God. We find the church complaining of them for setting on the Babylonians, and irritating them against Jerusalem, saying, "Rase it, rase it," down with it, down with it, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, inflaming a rage that needed no spur; here it is farther charged upon them that they triumphed in Jerusalem's ruin, and in the desolations of the country. Many blasphemies they spoke against "the mountains of Israel," saying, with pride and pleasure, "They are laid desolate," ver. 12. Note, The troubles of God's church, as they give proofs of the constancy and fidelity of its friends, so they discover and draw out the corruptions of its enemies, in whom there then appears more brutish malice than one would have thought of. Now their triumphing in Jerusalem's ruin is here said to proceed,

1. From a sinful passion against the people of Israel; from anger and envy, and "hatred against them," ver. 11, and that "perpetual hatred" spoken of, ver. 5. Though they were not a match for them, and therefore could not do them a mischief themselves, yet they were glad when the Chaldeans did them a mischief.

2. From a sinful appetite to the land of Israel. They pleased themselves with hopes that when the people of Israel were destroyed they should be let into the possession of their country, which they had so often grudged and envied them. They thought they could make out something of a title to it, ob defectum sanguinis,—'for want of other heirs.' If Jacob's issue fail, they think they are next in the entail, and that the remainder will be to his brother's issue; "These two nations" of Judah and Israel "shall be mine;" now is the time for me to put in for them. However, they hope to come in as first occupants, being near neighbours; We will possess it, when it is deserted. Ceditur occupanti,—'Let us get possession, and that will be title enough.' Note, Those have the spirit of Edomites who desire the deaths of others because they hope to get by them, or are pleased with others failing because they expect to come into their business. When we see the vanity of the world in the disappointments, losses, and crosses that others meet with in it, instead of shewing ourselves upon such an occasion greedy of it we should rather be made thereby to sit more loose to it, and both take our affections off it and lower our expectations from it. But, in this case of the Edomites coveting the land of Israel, and gaping for it, there was a particular affront to God, when they said, These lands are given us to devour, and we shall have our bellies full of their riches. God saith, "You have boasted against me, and have multiplied your words against me;" for they expected possession upon a vacancy, because Israel was driven out, "whereas the Lord was still there," ver. 10. His temple indeed was burnt, and other the tokens of his presence gone; but his promise to give that land to the seed of Jacob for an inheritance was not made void, but remained in full force and virtue; and by that promise he did in effect still keep possession for Israel till they should in due time be restored to it. That was Immanuel's land, Isa. viii. 8; in that land he was to be born, and therefore that people shall continue in it of whom he is to be born till he has passed his time in it, and then let who will take it. "The Lord is there," that is, the Lord Jesus is to be there; and therefore Israel's discontinuance of possession is no defeasance of their right, but it shall be kept for them; and they shall have, hold, and enjoy it, by virtue of the Divine grant, till the promise of this Canaan shall by the Messiah be changed into the promise of a far better. Note, It is a piece of presumption highly offensive to God for Edomites to lay claim to those privileges and comforts that are peculiar to God's chosen Israel, and are reserved for them. It is blasphemy against the mountains of Israel, the holy mountains, (as they are here called, ver. 12,) to say, because they are for the present made a prey of, and "trodden under foot of the Gentiles," Rev. xi. 2, even the holy city itself, that therefore the Lord has forsaken them, their God has forgotten them. The apostle will by no means admit such a thought as this, that "God hath cast away his people," Rom. xi. 1. No; though they are cast down for a time, they are not cast off for ever. Those reproach the Lord who say they are.

Secondly. The notice God took of the barbarous insolence of the Edomites, and the doom passed upon them for it. "I have heard all thy blasphemies," ver. 12; and again, ver. 13, "You have multiplied your words against me," and I have heard them, I have observed them, I have kept an account of them. Note, In the multitude of words none escape God's cognizance; let men speak never so much, never so fast, though they multiply words which they themselves regard not, but forget immediately, yet none of them are lost in the crowd, not the most idle words; but God hears them, and will be able to charge the sinner with them. All the haughty and hard speeches particularly which are spoken against the God of Israel, the words that are magnified, as it is in the margin, ver. 13, as well as the words that are multiplied, God takes notice of. For, as the trifling words are not below his cognizance, so the daring are not above his rebuke; "I have heard all thy blasphemies." This is good reason why we should bear reproach as if we heard it not, because God will hear, Ps. xxxviii. 13, 15, God has heard the Edomites' blasphemy, let them therefore hear their doom, ver. 14, 15. It was a national sin; the blasphemies charged upon them were the sense and language of all the Edomites, and therefore shall be punished with a national desolation. And, 1. It shall be a distinguishing punishment. As God has peculiar favours for Israelites, so he has peculiar plagues for Edomites; so that "when the whole earth rejoiceth I will make thee desolate," when other nations have their desolations repaired to their joy, thine shall be perpetual, ver. 9. 2. The punishment shall answer the sin. As thou didst rejoice in the desolation of the house of Israel, God will give thee enough of desolation; since thou art so fond of it, thou shalt be desolate, I will make thee so. Note, Those who, instead of weeping with the mourners, make a jest of their grievances, may justly be made to weep like the mourners, and themselves to feel the weight, to feel the smart of those grievances they set so light by. Some read ver. 14 so as to complete the resemblance between the sin and the punishment, 'The whole earth shall rejoice when I make thee desolate, as thou didst rejoice when Israel was made desolate.' Those that are glad at the death and fall of others may expect that others will be glad of their death, of their fall.

Thirdly. In the destruction of the enemies of the church God designs his own glory, and we may be sure he will not come short of his design. 1. That which he intends is to manifest himself, as a just and jealous God, firm to his covenant, and faithful to his people and their injured cause; ver. 11, "I will make myself known among them when I have judged thee." The Lord is and will be known by the judgments which he executeth. 2. His intention shall be fully answered, not only his own people shall be made to know it to their comfort, but even the Edomites themselves, and all other the enemies of his name and people, shall know that he is the Lord, ver. 4, 9, 15. As the works of creation and common providence demonstrate that there is a God, so the care taken of Israel shews that Jehovah the God of Israel is that God alone, the true and living God.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

We have done with mount Seir, and left it desolate, and likely to continue so, and must now turn ourselves with the prophet to the mountains of Israel, which we find desolate too, but hope before we have done with the chapter to leave in better plight. Here are two distinct prophecies in this chapter, I. Here is one that seems chiefly to relate to the temporal estate of the Jews, wherein their present deplorable condition is described, and the triumphs of their neighbours in it; but it is promised that their grievances shall be all redressed, and that in due time they should be settled again in their own land in the midst of peace and plenty, ver. 1—15. II. Here is another that seems chiefly to concern their spiritual estate; wherein they are minded of their former sins, and God's judgments upon them, to humble them for their sins and under God's mighty hand, ver. 16—20. But it is promised, 1. That God would glorify himself in shewing mercy to them, ver. 21—24; 2. That he would sanctify them by giving them his grace, and fitting them for his service, and this for his own name's sake, and in answer to their prayers, ver. 25—38.

ALSO, thou son of man, prophesy unto the mountains of Israel, and say,

Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the LORD:

2 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because the enemy hath said against you,
Aha, even the ancient high places are our's in possession:

3 Therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because they have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, [heathen,
That ye might be a possession unto the residue of the
And ye are taken up in the lips of talkers,
And are an infamy of the people:

4 Therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord GOD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD to the mountains, and to the hills,
To the rivers, and to the valleys,

THE PLAIN AND MOUNTAINS OF THE JORDAN.

To the desolate wastes, and to the cities that are forsaken,
Which became a prey and derision
To the residue of the heathen that are round about;

5 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken
Against the residue of the heathen, and against all Idumea,
Which have appointed my land into their possession
With the joy of all their heart,
With despiteful minds, to cast it out for a prey.

6 Prophesy therefore concerning the land of Israel,
And say unto the mountains, and to the hills,
To the rivers, and to the valleys,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I have spoken in my jealousy and in my fury,
Because ye have borne the shame of the heathen:

7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; I have lifted up mine hand,
Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame.

8 But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches,
And yield your fruit to my people of Israel;
For they are at hand to come.

9 For, behold, I am for you, and I will turn unto you,
And ye shall be tilled and sown:

10 And I will multiply men upon you,
All the house of Israel, even all of it: [builded:
And the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be 11 And I will multiply upon you man and beast;

And they shall increase and bring fruit:
And I will settle you after your old estates,
And will do better unto you than at your beginnings:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD. [Israel;

12 Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people
And they shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance,
And thou shalt no more henceforth bereave them of men.

13 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because they say unto you,
Thou land devourest up men, and hast bereaved thy 14 Therefore thou shalt devour men no more, [nations;

Neither bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord GOD.

15 Neither will I cause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more, [more,
Neither shalt thou bear the reproach of the people any Neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more, saith the Lord GOD.

CITADEL OF EDOM.—ver. 5.

The prophet had been ordered to set his face towards the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them, ch. vi. 2. Then God was coming forth to contend with his people; but, now God is returning in mercy to them, he must speak good words and comfortable words to these mountains, ver. 1. And again, ver. 4, "Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord;" and what he saith to them, he saith "to the hills, to the rivers, to the valleys, to the desolate wastes" in the country, "and to the cities that are forsaken," ver. 4; and again, ver. 6. The people were gone, some one way, and some another; nothing remained there to be spoken to but the places, the mountains and valleys. These the Chaldeans could not carry with them; the earth abideth for ever. Now, to shew the mercy God had in reserve for the people, he is to speak of him as having a dormant kindness for the place, which, if the Lord had been pleased for ever to abandon, he would not have called upon it to hear the word of the Lord, nor would, as at this time, have shewed it such things as these. Here is,

First. The compassionate notice God takes of the present deplorable condition of the land of Israel; it is become both a "prey and a derision to the heathen that are round about," ver. 4. 1. It is become a prey to them; and they are all enriched with the plunder of it. When the Chaldeans had conquered them, all their neighbours flew to the spoil, as to a shipwreck, every one thinking all his own that he could lay his hands on; ver. 3, "They have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession to the heathen;" to the residue of them, even such as had themselves narrowly escaped the like desolation. No one thought it any crime to strip an Israelite; turba Romæ sequitur fortunam ut semper,—'the mob of Rome still praise the elevated, and despise the fallen.' It is the common cry, when a man is down, Down with him. 2. It is become a derision to them. They took all they had, and laughed at them when they had done; the enemy said, "Aha, even the ancient high places are ours in possession," ver. 2. Neither the antiquity, nor the dignity, nor the sanctity, nor the fortifications of the land of Israel are its security; but we are become masters of it all. The more honours that land had been adorned with, and the greater figure it had made among the nations, the more pride and pleasure did they take in making a spoil of it, which is an instance of a base and sordid spirit, for the more glorious the prosperity was the more piteous is the adversity. God takes notice of it here as an aggravation of the present calamity of Israel; "Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people," ver. 3. All the talk of the country about was concerning the overthrow of the Jewish nation, and every one that spoke of it had some peevish, ill-natured reflection or other upon them. They were "the scorning of them that were at ease, and the contempt of the proud," Ps. cxxiii. 4. There are some that are noted for talkers, that have something to say of everybody, but cannot find in their hearts to speak well of anybody; God's people, among such people, were sure to be a reproach, when the crown was fallen from their head. Thus it was the lot of Christianity in its suffering days to be everywhere spoken against.

Secondly. The expressions of God's just displeasure against those who triumphed in the desolations of the land of Israel, as many of its neighbours did, even the residue of the heathen, and Idumea particularly. Let us see,

1. How they dealt with the Israel of God. They carved out larger possessions to themselves out of the land, out of God's land, for so indeed it was. "They have appointed my land into their possession," ver. 5; and so not only invaded their neighbours' property but intrenched upon God's prerogative. It was the holy land which they laid their sacrilegious hands upon. They did not own any dependence upon God, as the God of that land, nor acknowledge any remaining interest that Israel had in it, but cast it out for a prey, as if they had won it in a lawful war. And this they did without any dread of God and his judgments, and without any compassion for Israel and their calamities, but with the "joy of all their hearts;" because they got by it, and with despiteful minds to Israel that lost by it. Increasing wealth, by right or wrong, is all the joy of a worldly heart, and the calamities of God's people all the joy of a despiteful mind; and those that had not an opportunity of making a prey of God's people made a reproach of them, so that they were "the shame of the heathen," ver. 6. Everybody ridiculed them and made a jest of them; and the truth is they had, by their own sin, made themselves vile, so that God was righteous herein, but men were unrighteous and very barbarous.

2. How God would deal with them who were thus in word and deed abusive to his people. He hath spoken against the heathen, that is, he hath passed sentence upon them, he hath determined to reckon with them for it, and this in the fire of his jealousy, both for his own honour and for the honour of his people, ver. 5. Having a love for both strong as death, he hath a jealousy for both cruel as the grave. They spoke in their malice against God's people, and he will speak in his jealousy against them; and it is easy to say which will speak most powerfully. God will speak in his jealousy and in his fury, ver. 6. Fury is not in God, but he will exert his power against them, and handle them as severely as men do when they are in a fury. He will so speak to them in his wrath as to vex them in his sore displeasure. What he saith he will stand to, for it is backed with an oath; he hath lifted up his hand, and sworn by himself, hath sworn, and will not repent. And what is it that is said with so much heat, and yet with so much deliberation? It is this, ver. 7, "Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame." Note, The righteous God, to whom vengeance belongs, will render shame for shame. Those that put contempt and reproach upon God's people sooner or later will have it turned upon themselves; perhaps in this world, either their follies or their calamities, their miscarriages or their mischances, shall be their reproach—at least in that day when all the impenitent shall rise to shame and everlasting contempt.

3. The promises of God's favour to his Israel, and assurances given of great mercy God had in store for them. God takes occasion from the outrage and insolence of their enemies to shew himself so much the more concerned for them, and ready to do them good, as David hoped that God would recompense him good for Shimei's cursing him: "Let them curse, but bless thou." In this way, as well as others, the enemies of God's people do them real service, even by the injuries they do them, against their will, and beyond their intention. We shall have no reason to complain, if, the more unkind men are, the more kind God is—if the more kindly he speaks to us by his word and Spirit, and the more kindly he acts for us in his providence. The prophet must say to the mountains of Israel, which were now desolate and despised, that God is for them, and will turn to them, ver. 9. As the curse of God reacheth the ground for man's sake, so doth the blessing. Now that which is promised is,

1st. That their rightful owners should return to the possession of them. "My people Israel are at hand to come," ver. 8. Though they are at a great distance from their own country, though they are dispersed in many countries, and though they are detained by the power of their enemies, yet they "shall come again to their own border," Jer. xxxi. 17. The time is at hand for their return. Though there were about forty years of the seventy (perhaps fifty) yet remaining, it is spoken of as near, because it is sure, and there were some among them that should live to see it. A thousand years are with God but as one day. The mountains of Israel are now desolate; but God will cause men to walk upon them again, even his people Israel, not as travellers passing over them, but as inhabitants, not tenants, but freeholders; They shall possess thee, not for term of life, but for themselves and their heirs; thou shalt be their inheritance. It was a type of the heavenly Canaan, to which all God's children are heirs, every Israelite indeed, and into which they shall shortly be all brought together, out of the countries where they are now scattered.

2nd. That they should afford a plentiful comfortable maintenance for their owners at their return. When the land had enjoyed her sabbaths for so many years, it should be so much the more fruitful afterwards, as we should be after rest, especially a sabbath rest; "Ye shall be tilled and sown," ver. 9; and shall "yield your fruit to my people Israel," ver. 8. Note, It is a blessing to the earth to be made serviceable to men, especially to good men, that will serve God with cheerfulness in the use of those good things which the earth serves up to them.

3rd. That the people of Israel should have not only a comfortable sustenance, but a comfortable settlement in their own land. "The cities shall be inhabited, the wastes shall be builded," ver. 10; and "I will settle you after your old estates," ver. 11. Their own sin had unsettled them, but now God's favour shall resettle them. When the prodigal son is become a penitent he is settled again in his father's house according to his former estate; "Bring hither the best robe, and put it on him." Nay, "I will do better unto you" now "than at your beginnings." There is more joy for the sheep that is brought back than there would have been if it had never gone astray. And God sometimes multiplies his people's comforts in proportion to the time that he has afflicted them. Thus God blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, and doubled to him all he had.

4th. That the people after their return should be fruitful and multiply, and replenish this land, so that it should not only be inhabited again, but as thickly inhabited and as well peopled as ever. God will bring back to it all the house of Israel, even all of it, (observe what an emphasis is laid upon that, ver. 10;) all whose spirits God stirred up to return, and those only were reckoned of the house of Israel, the rest had cut themselves off from it. Or, though but few in comparison returned at first, yet afterwards, at divers times, they all returned; and then (saith God) "I will multiply these men," ver. 10; "multiply man and beast, and they shall increase," ver. 11. Note, God's kingdom in the world is a growing kingdom; and his church, though for a time it may be diminished, yet shall recover itself and be again replenished.

5th. That the reproach long since cast upon the land of Israel by the evil spies, and of late revived, that it was a land that eat up the inhabitants of it, by famine, sickness, and the sword, should be quite rolled away, and there should never be any more occasion for it. Canaan was got into an ill name; it had of old "spewed out the inhabitants," Lev. xviii. 28, the natives, the aborigines, which was turned to its reproach by those that should have put another construction upon it, Num. xiii. 32. It had of late devoured the Israelites and spewed them out too; so that it was commonly said of it, It is a land that, instead of supporting its nations or tribes that inhabited it, bereaves them, overthows them, and causes them to fall. It is a tenement that breaks all the tenants that come upon it. This character it had got among the neighbours, but God now promiseth it shall be so no more; "Thou shalt no more bereave them of men," ver. 12; shalt "devour men no more," ver. 14. But the inhabitants shall live to a good old age, and not have the number of their months cut off in the midst: compare this with that promise, Zec. viii. 4. Note, God will take away the reproach of his people, by taking away that which was the occasion of it; when the nation is made to flourish in peace, plenty, and power, then they hear no more the shame of the heathen, ver. 15, especially when it is reformed. When sin, which is the reproach of any people, particularly of God's professing people, is taken away, then they hear no more the reproach of the people. Note, When God returns in mercy to a people that return to him in duty, all their grievances will be soon redressed, and their honour retrieved.

16 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 17 Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land,
They defiled it by their own way and by their doings:
Their way was before me as the uncleanness of a removed [woman.
18 Wherefore I poured my fury upon them
For the blood that they had shed upon the land,
And for their idols wherewith they had polluted it:
19 And I scattered them among the heathen,
And they were dispersed through the countries:
According to their way and according to their doings I judged them. [went,
20 And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they
They profaned my holy name, when they said to them,
These are the people of the LORD, and are gone forth out of his land.
21 But I had pity for mine holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned
Among the heathen, whither they went.
22 Therefore say unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel,
But for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned
Among the heathen, whither ye went.
23 And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned
among the heathen,
Which ye have profaned in the midst of them;
And the heathen shall know that I am the LORD, Saith the Lord GOD, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes.
24 For I will take you from among the heathen,
And gather you out of all countries,
And will bring you into your own land.

When God promised the poor captives a glorious return in due time to their own land, it was a great discouragement to their hopes that they were unworthy, utterly unworthy, of such a favour; therefore, to remove that discouragement, God here shews them that he would do it for them purely for his own name's sake, that he might be glorified in them and by them, that he might manifest and magnify his mercy and goodness, that attribute which of all others is most his glory; and, the restoration of that people being typical of our redemption by Christ, this here is intended farther to shew that the ultimate end aimed at in our salvation, to which all the steps of it were made subservient, was the glory of God. To this end Christ directed all he did in that short prayer, "Father, glorify thy name;" and God declared it was his end in all he did in the immediate answer given to that prayer, by a voice from heaven, "I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again," Jno. xii. 28. Now observe here,

First. How God's name had suffered, both by the sins and by the miseries of Israel; and this was more to be regretted than all their sorrow, which they had brought upon themselves, for the honour of God lies nearer the hearts of good men than any interests of their own.

1. God's glory had been injured by the sin of Israel when they were in their own land, ver. 17. It was a good land, a holy land, a land that had the eye of God upon it; but "they defiled it by their own way," their wicked way; that is, our own way, the way of our own choice, and we ourselves must bear the blame and shame of it. The sin of a people defiles their land, renders it abominable to God, and uncomfortable to themselves, so that they cannot have any holy communion with him, or with one another. What was unclean might not be made use of: by the abuse of the gifts of God's bounty to us we forfeit the use of them, and, the mind and conscience being defiled with guilt, no comfort is allowed us, nothing is pure to us. Their way in the eye of God was like the pollution of a woman during the days of her separation, which shut her out from the sanctuary, and made every thing she touched ceremonially unclean, Lev. xv. 19. Sin is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which he cannot endure to look upon. They shed blood, and worshipped idols, ver. 18; and with those sins defiled the land. For this God poured out his fury upon them, scattered them among the heathen; their own land was sick of them, and they were sent into other lands. Herein God was righteous, and was justified in what he did; none could say that he did them any wrong; nay, he did justice to his own honour, for he judged them "according to their way, and according to their doings," ver. 19; and yet, the matter being not rightly understood, he was not glorified in it, for the enemies did say, as Moses pleaded the Egyptians would say, if he had destroyed them in the wilderness, that for mischief he brought them forth. Their neighbours considered them rather as a holy people than as a sinful people, and therefore took occasion from the calamities they were in, instead of glorifying God, as they might justly have done, to reproach him, and put contempt upon him; and God's name was "continually every day blasphemed" by their oppressors, Isa. lii. 5.

2. When they entered into the land of the heathen God had no glory by them there; but, on the contrary, his holy name was profaned, ver. 20. 1st. It was profaned by the sins of Israel. They were no credit to their profession, wherever they went, but, on the contrary, a reproach to it; the name of God and his holy religion was blasphemed through them, Rom. ii. 24. When those that pretended to be in relation to God, in covenant and communion with him, were found corrupt in their morals, slaves to their appetites and passions, dishonest in their dealings, and false to their words and the trusts reposed in them, the enemies of the Lord had thereby great occasion given them to blasphemy, especially when they quarrelled with their God for correcting them, than which nothing could be more scandalous. 2nd. It was profaned by the sufferings of Israel; for from them the enemies of God took occasion to reproach God, as unable to protect his own worshippers, and to make good his own grants. They said in scorn, "These are the people of the land," these wicked people,—you see he could not keep them in their obedience to his precepts; these miserable people,—you see he could not keep them in the enjoyment of his favours. These are the people that came out of Jehovah's land; they are the very scum of the nations. Are these they that had statutes so righteous, whose lives are so unrighteous? Is this a nation that is so much celebrated for a wise and understanding people? and that is said to have God so nigh unto them? Do these belong to that brave, that holy nation, that appear here so vile, so abject? Thus God sold his people, and did not "increase his wealth by their price," Ps. xliv. 12. The reproach they were under reflected upon him.

Secondly. Let us now see how God will retrieve his honour, secure it, and advance it, by working a great reformation upon them, and then working a great salvation for them. He would have scattered them among the heathen, were it not that he "feared the wrath of the enemy," Deu. xxxii. 26, 27; but, though they were unworthy of his compassion, yet he had pity for his own holy name, and a thousand pities it was that that should be trampled upon and abused. He looked with compassion on his own honour, which lay bleeding among the heathen, on that jewel which was trodden into the dirt, which the house of Israel, even in the land of their captivity, had profaned, ver. 21. In pity to that God brought them out from the heathen, because their sins were more scandalous there than they had been in their own land; therefore, "I will gather you out of all countries, and bring you into your own land," ver. 24. Not "for your sakes," because you are worthy of such a favour, for you are most unworthy, but "for my holy name's sake," ver. 22; that "I may sanctify my great name," ver. 23. Observe, by the way, God's holy name is his great name, his holiness is his greatness; so he reckons it himself. Nor doth any thing make a man truly great but being truly good, and partaking of God's holiness. God will magnify his name as a holy name, for he will sanctify it; I will sanctify my name which you have profaned. When God performs that which he hath sworn by his holiness, then he sanctifies his name. The effect of this shall be very happy. "The heathen shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes" and yours. When God proves his own holy name, and his saints praise it, then he is sanctified in them, and this contributes to the propagating of the knowledge of him. Observe, 1. God's reasons of mercy are all fetched from within himself. He will bring his people out of Babylon, not for their sakes but for his own name's sake, because he will be glorified. 2. God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious; therefore he will sanctify his name by the pardon of sin, because it has been profaned by the commission of sin.

25 Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean:
From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you.
26 A new heart also will I give you,
And a new spirit will I put within you:
And I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh,
And I will give you an heart of flesh.
27 And I will put my spirit within you,
And cause you to walk in my statutes,
And ye shall keep my judgments, and do them.
28 And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers;
And ye shall be my people, and I will be your God.
29 I will also save you from all your uncleannesses:
And I will call for the corn, and will increase it,
And lay no famine upon you.
30 And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field,
That ye shall receive no more reproach of famine among the heathen.
31 Then shall ye remember your own evil ways,
And your doings that were not good,
And shall lothe yourselves in your own sight
For your iniquities and for your abominations.
32 Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord GOD,
Be it known unto you:
Be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.
33 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities
I will also cause you to dwell in the cities,
And the wastes shall be builded.
34 And the desolate land shall be tilled,
Whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by.
35 And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden;
And the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become And are inhabited. [fenced,
36 Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know
That I the LORD build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate:
I the LORD have spoken it, and I will do it.
37 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them;
I will increase them with men like a flock.
38 As the holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts;
So shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The people of God might be discouraged in their hopes of a restoration, by the sense not only of their unworthiness of such a favour, (which was answered in the foregoing verses with this, that God in doing it would have an eye to his own glory, not to their worthiness,) but their unfitness for such a favour, being still corrupt and sinful; and that is answered in these verses, with a promise that God would by his grace prepare and qualify them for the mercy, and then bestow it on them; and this was in part fulfilled in that wonderful effect which the captivity in Babylon had upon the Jews there, that it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. But it is farther intended as a draught of the covenant of grace, and a specimen of those spiritual blessings with which we are blessed in heavenly things by that covenant. As, ch. xxxiv., after a promise of their return, the prophecy insensibly slid into a promise of the coming of Christ, the great Shepherd, so here it insensibly slides into a promise of the Spirit, and his gracious influences and operations, which we have as much need of for our sanctification, as we have of Christ's merit for our justification.

First. God here promiseth that he will work a good work in them, to qualify them for the good work he intended to bring about for them, ver. 25—27. We had promises to the same purpose, ch. xi. 18—20.

1. That God would cleanse them from the pollutions of sin; ver. 25, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you," which signifies both the blood of Christ sprinkled upon the conscience to purify that and to take away the sense of guilt, as those that were sprinkled with the water of purification were thereby discharged from their ceremonial uncleanness, and the grace of the Spirit sprinkled on the whole soul to purify it from all corrupt inclinations and dispositions, as Naaman was cleansed from his leprosy by dipping in Jordan. Christ was himself clean, else his blood could not have been cleansing to us; and it is a Holy Spirit that makes us holy. "From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you," and, ver. 29, "I will save you from all your uncleannesses." Sin is defiling, idolatry particularly is so; it renders sinners odious to God, and burthensome to themselves. When guilt is pardoned, and the corrupt nature sanctified, then we are cleansed from our filthiness, and there is no other way of being saved from it. This God promiseth his people here, in order to his being sanctified in them, ver. 23. We cannot sanctify God's name unless he sanctify our hearts; nor live to his glory, but by his grace.

2. That God would give them a new heart, a disposition of mind excellent in itself, and vastly different from what it was before. God will work an inward change in order to an universal change. Note, All that have an interest in the new covenant, and a title to the new Jerusalem, have a new heart and a new spirit, and that is necessary in order to their walking in newness of life. This is that Divine nature which believers are, by the promises, make partakers of.

3. That instead of a heart of stone, insensible and inflexible, unapt to receive any Divine impressions, and to return any devout affections, God would give a heart of flesh, a soft and tender heart, that has spiritual senses exercised, conscious to itself of spiritual pains and pleasures, and complying in every thing with the will of God. Note, Renewing grace works as great a change in the soul as the turning of a dead stone into living flesh.

4. That since, besides our inclination to sin, we complain of an inability to do our duty, God will cause them to walk in his statutes, will not only shew them the way of his statutes before them, but incline them to walk in it, and thoroughly furnish them with wisdom, and will, and active powers for every good work. In order to this he will put his Spirit within them, as a teacher, guide, and sanctifier. Note, God doth not force men to walk in his statutes by external violence, but causes them to walk in his statutes by an internal principle. And observe what use we ought to make of this gracious power and principle promised us, and put within us, "Ye shall keep my judgments." If God will do his part according to the promise, we must do ours according to the precept. Note, The promise of God's grace to enable us for our duty should engage and quicken our constant care and endeavour to do our duty. God's promises must drive us to his precepts as our rule, and then his precepts must send us back to his promises for strength, for without his grace we can do nothing.

Secondly, God here promiseth that he will take them into covenant with himself. The sum of the covenant of grace we have, ver. 28, "Ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." It is not, If you will be my people I will be your God, though it is very true that we cannot expect to have God to be to us a God unless we be to him a people; but he hath chosen us and loved us first, not we him. Therefore the condition is of grace, is by promise, as well as the reward; not of merit, not of works; "Ye shall be my people," I will make you so; I will give you the nature and spirit of my people, and then I will be your God. And this is the foundation and topstone of a believer's happiness; it is heaven itself, Rev. xxi. 3, 7.

Thirdly. He promiseth that he will bring about all that good for them which the exigence of their case calls for. When they are thus prepared for mercy,

1. Then they shall return to their possessions, and be settled again in them; ver. 28, "Ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers." God will, in bringing them back to it, have an eye not to any merit of theirs, but to the promise made to the fathers; for therefore he gave it them at first, Deu. vii. 7, 8. Therefore he is gracious, because he hath said he will be so. This shall follow upon the blessed reformation God would work among them; ver. 33, "In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities," and so shall have made you meet for the inheritance, I will cause you to dwell in the cities, and so put you in possession of the inheritance. This is God's method of mercy indeed, first to part men from their sins, and then restore them to their comforts.

2. Then they shall enjoy a plenty of all good things, when they are saved from their uncleanness, from their sins which kept good things from them; then "I will call for the corn, and will increase it," ver. 29. Plenty comes at God's call, and the plenty he calls for shall be still growing; and when he speaks the word the fruit both of the tree and of the field shall multiply. As the inhabitants multiply, the products shall multiply for their maintenance, for he that sends mouths will send meat. Famine was one of the judgments which they had laboured under, and it had been as much as any other a reproach to them that they should be starved in a land so famed for fruitfulness. But now I will "lay no famine upon you." And none are under that rod but it is God that lays it on. Then they "shall receive no more reproach of famine," shall never be again upbraided with that; nor shall it ever be said that God is a Master that keeps his servants to short allowance; nay, they shall not only be cleared from the reproach of famine, but they shall have the credit of abundance. The land that had long lain desolate in the sight of all that passed by, that looked upon it, some with contempt and some with compassion, shall again be tilled, ver. 34, and, having long lain fallow, it will now be the more fruitful. Observe, God will call for the corn, and yet they must till the ground for it. Note, Even promised mercies must be laboured for, for the promise is not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, our industry and endeavours. And such a blessing will God command on the hand of the diligent that all who pass by shall take notice of it with wonder, ver. 35. They shall say, See what a blessed change here is, how "this land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden," this desert turned again into a paradise. Note, God has honours in reserve for his people to be crowned with sufficient to balance the contempt they are now loaded with, and in them he will be honoured. This wonderful increase, both of the people of the land and of its products, is compared, ver. 38, to the large flocks of cattle that are brought to Jerusalem to be sacrificed at one of the solemn feasts. Even the cities that now lie waste shall be filled with flocks of men, not like the flocks with which the pastures are covered over, Ps. lxv. 13, but like the holy flock which is brought to the courts of the Lord's house. Note, Then the increase of the numbers of a people is honourable and comfortable indeed when they are all dedicated to God as a holy flock, to be presented to him for living sacrifices. Crowds are a lovely sight in God's temple.

Fourthly. He shews what shall be the happy effects of this blessed change.

1. It shall have a happy effect upon the people of God themselves, for it shall bring them to an ingenuous repentance of their sins; ver. 31, "Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and shall loathe yourselves." See here what sin is; it is an abomination, a loathsome thing, that abominable thing which the Lord hates. See what is the first step towards repentance; it is remembering our own evil ways, reflecting seriously upon the sins we have committed, and being particular in recapitulating them. We must remember against ourselves not only our gross enormities, our own evil ways, but our defects and infirmities, our doings that were not good, not so good as they should have been; not only our direct violations of the law, but our coming short of it. See what is evermore a companion of true repentance, and that is self-loathing, a holy shame and confusion of face; You shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, seeing how loathsome you have made yourselves in the sight of God. Self-love is at the bottom of sin, which we cannot but blush to see the absurdity of, but our quarrelling with ourselves is in order to our being upon good grounds reconciled to ourselves. And, lastly, see what is the most powerful inducement to an evangelical repentance, and that is, a sense of the mercy of God; when God settles them in the midst of plenty then they shall loathe themselves for their iniquities. Note, The goodness of God should overcome our badness, and lead us to repentance. The more we see of God's readiness to receive into favour upon our repentance, the more reason we shall see to be ashamed of ourselves that we could ever sin against so much love. That heart is hard indeed that will not be thus melted.

2. It shall have a happy effect upon their neighbours, for it shall bring them to a more clear knowledge of God; ver. 36, "Then the heathen that are left round about you," that spoke ignorantly of God (for so all those do that speak ill of him) when they saw the land of Israel desolate, shall begin to know better things, and to speak more intelligently of God, being convinced that he is able to rebuild the most desolate cities and to replant the most desolate countries; and that, though the course of his favours to his people may be obstructed for a time, they shall not be cut off for ever. They shall be made to know the truth of Divine revelation by the exact agreement which they shall discern between God's word which he has spoken to Israel, and his works which he hath done for them; "I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it." With us saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God.

Fifthly. He proposeth these things to them, not as the recompense of their merits, but as the return of their prayers.

1. Let them not think that they have deserved it; "Not for your sakes do I this, be it known to you," ver. 32; as before, ver. 22. No; be you "ashamed and confounded for your own ways." God is doing this, all this which he hath promised; it is as sure to be done as if it were done already, and present events have a tendency towards it. But then, 1st. They must renounce the merit of their own good works, and be brought to acknowledge that it is not for their sakes that it is done. So, when God brought Israel into Canaan the first time, an express caveat was entered against this thought, Deu. ix. 4—6, It is "not for thy righteousness." It is not for the sake of any of their good qualities or good deeds, not because God had any need of them, or expected any benefit by them; no, in shewing mercy he acts by prerogative, not for our deserts but his own honour. See how emphatically this is expressed, "Be it known to you," it is "not for your sakes," which intimates that we are apt to entertain a good conceit of our own merits, and are hardly persuaded to disclaim a confidence in them. But one way or other God will make all his favourites to know and own that it is his grace, and not their goodness,—his mercy, and not their merit,—that made them so; and that, therefore, not unto them, not unto them, but unto him is all the glory due. 2nd. They must repent of the sin, of their own evil ways. They must own that the mercies they receive from God are not only not merited, but they are a thousand times forfeited, and therefore they must be so far from boasting of their good works, that they must be ashamed and confounded for their evil ways, and then they are best prepared for mercy.

2. Yet let them know that they must desire and expect it; ver. 37, "I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel." God hath spoken, and he will do it, and he will be sought unto for it, that is, he requires that his people should seek unto him, and he will incline their hearts to do it, when he is coming towards them in the ways of mercy. 1st. They must pray for it, for by prayer God is sought unto, and inquired after. What is the matter of God's promises must be the matter of our prayers. By asking for the mercy promised we must give glory to the donor, express a value for the gift, own our dependence, and put honour upon prayer, which God has put honour upon. Christ himself must ask, and then God will "give him the heathen for his inheritance;" must "pray the Father," and then he will "send the Comforter," much more must we ask that we may receive. 2nd. They must consult the oracles of God, and thus also God is sought unto and inquired after. The mercy must not be an act of providence only, but a child of promise, and therefore the promise must be looked at, and prayer made for it with an eye of faith fastened upon the promise, which must be both the guide and the ground of our expectations. Both these ways we find God inquired of by Daniel, in the name of the house of Israel, when he was about to do those great things for them; he consulted the oracles of God, for he understood by books, the book of the prophet Jeremiah, both what was to be expected and when; and then he set his face to seek God by prayer, Dan. ix. 2, 3. Note, Our communion with God must be kept up by the word and prayer in all the operation of his providence concerning us, and in both he must be inquired of.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The threatenings of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, which we had in the former part of this book, were not so terrible, but the promises of their restoration and deliverance for the glory of God, which we have here in the latter part of the book, are as comfortable; and, as those were illustrated with many visions and similitudes for the awakening of a holy fear, so are these for the encouraging of an humble faith. God had assured them, in the foregoing chapter, that he would gather the house of Israel, even all of it, and would bring them out of their captivity, and return them to their own land; but there were two things that rendered this very unlikely. I. That they were so dispersed among their enemies, so destitute of all helps and advantages which might favour or further their return, and so dispirited likewise in their own minds; upon all these accounts they are here in vision compared to a valley full of the dry bones of dead men, which should be brought together, and raised to life. The vision of this we have, ver. 1—10; and the explication of it, with its application to the present case, ver. 11—14. II. That they were so divided among themselves; too much of the old core between Judah and Ephraim remaining, even in their captivity. But as to this, by a sign of two sticks made one in the hand of the prophet, is foreshewed the happy coalition that should be at their return between the two nations of Israel and Judah, ver. 15—22; in which there was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, Jews and Samaritans, in Christ and his church. And so the prophet slides into a prediction of the kingdom of Christ, which should be set up in the world with God's tabernacle in it, and of the glories and graces of that kingdom, ver. 23—28.

THE hand of the LORD was upon me, and carried me out in the spirit of the LORD, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones, 2 And caused me to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord GOD, thou knowest. 4 Again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the LORD. 5 Thus saith the Lord GOD unto these bones; Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: 6 And I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. 7 So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. 8 And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above: but there was no breath in them. 9 Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. 10 So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army. 11 Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts. 12 Therefore prophesy and say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, O my people, I will open your graves,
And cause you to come up out of your graves,
And bring you into the land of Israel.
13 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have opened your graves, O my people,
And brought you up out of your graves,
14 And shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live,
And I shall place you in your own land:
Then shall ye know that I the LORD have spoken it,
and performed it,
Saith the LORD.

Here is, First. The vision of a resurrection from death to life, and it is a glorious resurrection. This is a thing so utterly unknown to nature, and so contrary to its principles, (a privatione ad habitum non datur regressus,—'from privation to possession there is no return,') that we could have no thought of it but by the word of the Lord; and that it is certain by that word that there shall be a general resurrection of the dead some have urged from this vision; for, say they, otherwise it would not probably be made a sign for the confirming of their faith in the promise of their deliverance out of Babylon, as the coming of the Messiah is mentioned for the confirming of their faith, touching a former deliverance, Isa. vii. 14. But, whether it be a confirmation or no, it is without doubt a most lively representation of a threefold resurrection, besides that which it is primarily intended to be the sign of. 1st. The resurrection of souls from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, to a holy, heavenly, spiritual, and Divine life, by the power of Divine grace going along with the word of Christ, Jno. v. 24, 25. 2nd. The resurrection of the gospel church, or any part of it, from an afflicted, persecuted state, especially under the yoke of the New Testament Babylon, to liberty and peace. 3rd. The resurrection of the body at the great day, especially the bodies of believers that shall rise to life eternal. Let us observe the particulars of this vision.

1. The deplorable condition of these dead bones. The prophet was made, 1st. To take an exact view of them. By a prophetical impulse and a Divine power he was in vision carried out and set "in the midst of a valley," probably that plain spoken of ch. iii. 22, where God then talked with him, and it was full of bones, of dead men's bones; not piled up on a heap, as in a charnel-house, but scattered upon the face of the ground, as if some bloody battle had been fought there, and the slain left unburied, till all the flesh was devoured or putrefied, and nothing left but the bones, and those disjointed from one another and dispersed. He passed "by them round about," and he observed not only that they were very many, (for there are multitudes gone to the congregation of the dead,) but that "lo, they were very dry," having been long exposed to the sun and wind. The bones that had been "moistened with marrow," Job xxi. 24, when they have been any while dead lose all their moisture, and are dry as dust; the body is now fenced with bones, Job x. 11, but then they will themselves be defenceless. The Jews in Babylon were like those dead and dry bones, unlikely ever to come together, to be so much as a skeleton, less likely to be formed into a body, and least of all to be a living body. However, they lay unburied in the open valley, which encouraged the hopes of their resurrection, as of the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 8, 9. The bones of Gog and Magog shall be buried, ch. xxxix. 12, 15, for their destruction is final, but the bones of Israel are in the open valley, under the eye of heaven, for there is hope in the end. 2nd. He was made to own their case deplorable, and not to be helped by any power less than that of God himself; ver. 3, "Son of man, can these bones live?" Is it a thing likely? Canst thou devise how it should be done? Can thy philosophy reach to put life into dry bones, or thy politics to restore a captive nation? No, saith the prophet, I know not how it should be done, but thou knowest. He doth not say they cannot live, lest he should seem to limit the Holy One of Israel; but, Lord, thou knowest whether they can and whether they shall; and if thou dost not put life into them for certain they cannot live. Note, God is perfectly acquainted with his own power and his own purposes, and will have us to refer all to them, and to see and own that his wondrous works are such as could not be effected by any counsel or power but his own.

2. The means used for the bringing of these dispersed bones together, and these dead and dry bones to life. It must be done by prophecy. Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy upon these bones, ver. 4, and again, ver. 9, "Prophesy to the wind;" so he prophesied as he was commanded, ver. 7, and again, ver. 10. 1st. He must preach, and he did so, and the dead bones lived by a power that went along with the word of God which he preached. 2nd. He must pray, and he did so, and the dead bones were made to live in answer to prayer, for a spirit of life entered into them. See the efficacy of the word and prayer, and the necessity of both for the raising of dead souls. God bids his ministers, "prophesy upon the dry bones," say unto them, Live, yea, say unto them, Live; and they do as they are commanded, calling to them again and again, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." But we call in vain, still they are dead, still they are very dry; we must therefore be earnest with God in prayer for the working of the Spirit with the word; "Come, O breath," and breathe upon them. God's grace can save souls without our preaching, but our preaching cannot save them without God's grace, and that grace must be sought by prayer. Note, Ministers must faithfully and diligently use the means of grace, even with those that there seems little probability of gaining upon. To prophesy upon dry bones seems as great a penance as to water a dry stick; and yet, whether they will hear or forbear, we must discharge our trust, must prophesy as we are commanded, in the name of him who raiseth the dead and is the fountain of life.

3. The wonderful effect of these means. Those that do as they are commanded, as they are commissioned, in the face of the greatest discouragements, need not doubt of success, for God will own and enrich his own appointments.

1st. Ezekiel looked down, and prophesied upon the bones in the valley, and they became human bodies. First. That which he had to say to them was, that God would infallibly raise them to life: "Thus saith the Lord God unto those bones, Ye shall live," ver. 5, and again, "Ye shall live," ver. 6; and he that speaks the word will thereby do the work; he that saith they shall live will make them alive. He will clothe them with skin and flesh, ver. 6, as he did at first, Job x. 11. He that made us so fearfully and wonderfully, and curiously wrought us, can in like manner new-make us, for his arm is not shortened. Secondly. That which was presently done for them was, that they were moulded anew into shape. We may well suppose it was with great liveliness and vigour that the prophet prophesied, especially when he found what he said begin to take effect. Note, The opening, sealing, and applying of the promises, are the ordinary means of our participation in a new and Divine nature. As Ezekiel prophesied in this vision there was a noise, a word of command from heaven, seconding what he said; or, it signified the motion of the angels that were to be employed as the ministers of the Divine providence in the deliverance of the Jews, and we read of the noise of their wings, Eze. i. 24, and the sound of their going, 2 Sam. v. 24. And behold a shaking or commotion among the bones; even dead and dry bones begin to move when they are called to hear the word of the Lord. This was fulfilled upon Cyrus's proclamation of liberty; those whose spirits God had stirred up began to think of making use of that liberty, and getting ready to be gone. When there was a noise, behold a shaking. When David heard the sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry trees, then he bestirred himself, then there was a shaking. When Paul heard the voice saying, "Why persecutest thou me?" behold a shaking of the dry bones; he trembled, and was astonished. But this was not all: "the bones came together, bone to his bone," under a Divine direction; and, though there are in man a multitude of bones, yet of all the bones of all those numerous slain not one was missing, not one missed its way, not one missed its place, but, as it were by instinct, each knew and found its fellow. The dispersed bones came together, and the displaced bones were knit together; the Divine power supplying that to these dry bones which in a living body every joint supplies. Thus shall it be in the resurrection of the dead, the scattered atoms shall be ranged and marshalled in their proper place and order, and "every bone come to his bone," by the same wisdom and power by which the bones were first formed in the womb of her that is with child. Thus it was in the return of the Jews; they that were scattered in several parts of the province of Babylon came to their respective families, and all, as it were by consent, to the general rendezvous, in order to their return. By degrees sinews and flesh came upon these bones, and the "skin covered them," ver. 8. This was fulfilled when the captives got their effects about them, and the men of their place helped them with silver and gold, and whatever they needed for their remove, Ezr. i. 4. But still there was no breath in them; they wanted spirit and courage for such a difficult and hazardous enterprise as this was of returning to their own land.

2nd. Ezekiel then looked up, and prophesied to the wind, or breath, or spirit, and said, "Come, O breath, and breathe upon these slain." As good have been still dry bones as dead bodies. But as for God his work is perfect; he is not the God of the dead but of the living, therefore, "breathe upon them that they may live." In answer to this request the breath presently came into them, ver. 10. Note, The spirit of life is from God: he at first in the creation breathed into man the breath of life, and so he will at last in the resurrection. The dispirited despairing captives were wonderfully animated with resolution to break through all the discouragements that lay in the way of their return, and applied themselves to it with all imaginable vigour; and then they "stood up upon their feet an exceeding great army," not only living men, but effective men, fit for service in the wars, and formidable to all that gave them any opposition. Note, With God nothing is impossible; he can out of "stones raise up children unto Abraham," and out of dead and dry bones levy an exceeding great army, to fight his battles, and plead his cause.

Secondly. The application of this vision to the present calamitous condition of the Jews in captivity. "These bones are the whole house of Israel," both the ten tribes and the two. See in this what they are and what they shall be.

1. The depth of despair to which they are now reduced, ver. 11. They all give up themselves for lost and gone; they say, Our bones are dried, our strength exhausted, our spirits gone, our hope is all lost, every thing we looked for succour and relief from fails us, and "we are cut off from our parts;" let who will cherish some hope, we see no ground for any. Note, When troubles continue long, hopes have been often frustrated, and all creature confidences fail, it is not strange if the spirits sink; and nothing but an active faith in the power, promise, and providence of God will keep them from dying away quite.

2. The height of prosperity to which, notwithstanding this, they shall be advanced. Therefore, because things are come thus to the last extremity, prophesy to them, and tell them, now is God's time to appear for them: Jehovah Jireh, in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen, ver. 12—14. Tell them, 1st. That they shall be brought out of the land of their enemies, where they are, as it were, buried alive; "I will open your graves." Those shall be restored, not only whose bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7, but who are buried in the grave. Though the power of the enemy is like the bars of the pit, which one would think it impossible to break through, strong as death, and cruel as the grave, yet it shall be conquered. God can bring his people up from the depths of the earth, Ps. lxxi. 20. 2nd. That they shall be brought into their own land, where they shall live in prosperity. "I will bring you into the land of Israel," ver. 12, and place you there, ver. 14, and will "put my spirit in you," and then "ye shall live." Note, Then God puts spirit in us to good purpose, and so that we shall indeed live, when he puts his Spirit in us. And, 3rd. In all this God will be glorified: "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 13; that I have "spoken it, and performed it," ver. 14.

Note, God's quickening the dead redounds more than anything to his honour, and to the honour of his word, which he has magnified above all his name, and will magnify more and more by the punctual accomplishment of every tittle of it.

15 The word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 16 Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: 17 And join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. 18 And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not shew us what thou meanest by these? 19 Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. 20 And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. 21 And say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will take the children of Israel
From among the heathen, whither they be gone,
And will gather them on every side,
And bring them into their own land:
22 And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel;
And one king shall be king to them all:
And they shall be no more two nations,
Neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all:
23 Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols,
Nor with their detestable things,
Nor with any of their transgressions:
But I will save them out of all their dwellingplaces, wherein they have sinned,
And will cleanse them:
So shall they be my people, and I will be their God.
24 And David my servant shall be king over them;
And they all shall have one shepherd:
They shall also walk in my judgments,
And observe my statutes, and do them.
25 And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant,
Wherein your fathers have dwelt;
And they shall dwell therein,
Even they, and their children, and their children's children for ever:
And my servant David shall be their prince for ever.
26 Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them;
It shall be an everlasting covenant with them:
And I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore.
27 My tabernacle also shall be with them:
Yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people.
28 And the heathen shall know that I the LORD do sanctify Israel,
When my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore.

Here are more exceeding great and precious promises made of the happy state of the Jews after their return to their own land; but they have a farther reference to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the glories of gospel times.

First. It is here promised that Ephraim and Judah shall be happily united in brotherly love and mutual serviceableness; so that, whereas ever since the desertion of the ten tribes from the house of David, under Jeroboam, there had been continual feuds and animosities between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah,—and it is to be feared there had been some clashings between them even in the land of their captivity,—Ephraim upon all occasions envying Judah, and Judah vexing Israel, that now it should be no longer, but there shall be a coalition between them, and, notwithstanding the old differences that had been between them, they should agree to love one another, and to do one another all good offices. This is here illustrated by a sign: the prophet was to take two sticks, and write upon one for Judah, including Benjamin, those of the children of Israel that were his companions; upon the other for Joseph, including the rest of the tribes, ver. 16. These two sticks must be so framed as to fall into one hand, ver. 17. The people took notice of this, and desired him to tell them the meaning of it, for they knew he did not play with sticks for his diversion, as children do. Those that would know the meaning should ask the meaning of the word of God, which they read and hear, and of the instituted signs by which spiritual and Divine things are represented to us; the ministers' lips should keep the knowledge hereof, and the people should ask it at their mouth, Mal. ii. 7. It is a necessary question for grown people, as well as children, to ask, "What mean ye by this service," by this sign? Ex. xii. 26. The meaning was, that Judah and Israel should become one in the hand of God, ver. 19.

1. They shall be one, one nation, ver. 22. They shall have no separate interests, and consequently no divided affections. There shall be no mutual jealousies and animosities, no remembrance, no remains of their former discord. But there shall be a perfect harmony between them, a good understanding one of another, a good disposition one to another, and a readiness to all good offices and services for one another's credit and comfort. They had been two sticks crossing and thwarting one another, nay, beating and bruising one another; but now they shall become one, supporting and strengthening one another; vis unita fortior,—'force added to force is proportionally more efficient.' "Behold how good and how pleasant a thing it is" to see Judah and Israel, that had long been at variance, now "dwelling together in unity." Then they shall become acceptable to their God, amicable to their friends, and formidable to their enemies, Isa. xi. 13, 14.

2. They shall be one in God's hand. By his power they shall be united; and, being by his hand brought together, his hand shall keep them together, so that they shall not fly off to be separated again. They shall be one in his hand, for his glory shall be the centre of their unity, and his grace the cement of it. In him, in a regard to him, and in his service and worship, they shall unite, and so shall become one. Both sides shall agree to put themselves into his hand, and so they shall be one: qui conveniunt in aliquo tertio inter se conveniunt,—'those who agree with a third agree with each other.' Note, Those are best united that are one in God's hand, whose union with each other results from their union with Christ and their communion with God through him, Eph. i. 10; one in us, Jno. xvii. 21.

3. They shall be one in their return out of captivity; ver. 21, "I will take them from among the heathen, and gather them on every side," and bring them together incorporated into one body to their own land. They shall be one in their separation from the heathen, with whom they had mingled themselves. They shall both agree to part from them, and take their affections off from them, and no longer comply with their usages; and then they will soon agree to join together in walking according to the rule of God's word. Their having been joint sufferers will contribute to this blessed comprehension, when they begin to come to themselves, and to consider things. Put many pieces of metal together into the furnace, and when they are melted they will run all together. It was time for them to strengthen one another when their oppressors were so busy to weaken and ruin them all. Likewise, their being joint sharers in the favour of God, and the great and common deliverance wrought out for them all, should help to unite them. God's loving them all was a good reason why they should love one another. Times of common joy, as well as times of common suffering, should be healing, loving times.

4. They shall all be the subjects of one king, and so they shall become one. The Jews after their return were under one government, and not divided as formerly. But this certainly looks farther, to the kingdom of Christ: he is that one King, in allegiance to whom all God's spiritual Israel shall cheerfully unite, and under whose protection they shall all be gathered. All believers unite in one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; and the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, their becoming one fold under Christ, the one great Shepherd, is doubtless the union that is chiefly looked at in this prophecy. By Christ the partition-wall between them was taken down, and the enmity slain, and of them twain was made "one new man," Eph. ii. 14, 15.

Secondly. It is here promised that the Jews shall by their captivity be cured of their inclination to idolatry. This shall be the happy fruit of that affliction, even the taking away of their sin; ver. 23, "Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols," those detestable, defiling things; no, nor with any of their former transgressions. Note, When one sin is sincerely parted with, all sin is abandoned too, for he that hates sin as sin will hate all sin. And those that are cured of their spiritual idolatry, their inordinate affection to the world and the flesh, that no longer make a god of their money or their belly, have a happy blow given to the root of all their transgressions. Two ways God will take to cure them of their idolatry: 1. By bringing them out of the way of temptation to it; "I will save them out of all their dwellingplaces wherein they have sinned," because there they met with the occasion of sin, and allurements to it. Note, It is our wisdom to avoid the places where we have been overcome by temptations to sin, not to remain in them, or return to them, but to save ourselves out of them, as we would out of infected places: see Zec. ii. 7; Rev. xviii. 4. And it is a great mercy when God in his providence saves us out of the dwelling-places where we have sinned, and keeps us from harm by keeping us out of harm's way—in answer to our prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." 2. By changing the disposition of their mind; "I will cleanse them," that is, (ver. 28,) I will sanctify them, will work in them an aversion to the pollutions of sin, and a complacency in the pleasures of holiness; and then you may be sure they will not defile themselves any more with their idols. Whom God hath cleansed he will keep clean.

Thirdly. It is here promised that they shall be the people of God, as their God, and the subjects and sheep of Christ their King and Shepherd. These promises we had before, and they are here repeated, ver. 23, 24, for the encouragement of the faith of Israel. "They shall be my people," to serve me, and "I will be their God," to serve them, and to make them happy. "David my servant shall be king over them," to fight their battles, to protect them from injury, and to rule them, and overrule all things that concern them for their good. He shall be their shepherd to guide them, and to provide for them. Christ is this David, Israel's king of old; and those whom he subdues to himself, and makes willing in the day of his power, he makes them to walk in his judgments and to keep his statutes.

Fourthly. It is here promised that they shall dwell comfortably, ver. 25, 26. They shall dwell in the land of Israel; for where else should Israelites dwell? And many things will concur to make their dwelling agreeable. 1. They shall have it by covenant, they shall come in again upon their old title by virtue of the grant made unto Jacob, God's servant. As Christ was David, God's servant, so the church is Jacob, his servant too; and the members of the church shall come in for a share, as born in God's house. He will make a covenant of peace with them, ver. 26; and in pursuance of that covenant he will place them, and multiply them. Note, Temporal mercies are then doubly sweet when they come from the promise of the covenant, and not merely from common providence. 2. They shall come to it by prescription. It is "the land wherein your fathers have dwelt," and for that reason you cannot but have a special kindness for it, which God will graciously gratify. It was the inheritance of their ancestors, and therefore shall be theirs; they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. 3. They shall have it entailed upon them and the heirs of their body, and shall have their families built up, so that it shall not be lost for want of heirs. They shall dwell therein all their time, and never be turned out of possession; and they shall leave it for an inheritance to "their children, and their children's children for ever," who shall enjoy it when they are gone—the prospect of which will be a satisfaction to them. 4. They shall live under a good government, which will contribute very much to the comfort of their lives; "My servant David shall be their prince for ever." This can be no other than Christ, of whom it was said, when he was brought into the world, "He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever," Lu. i. 33. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all Christ's faithful subjects that, as his kingdom is everlasting, so he is an everlasting king, he lives to reign for ever; and as sure, and as long, as he lives and reigns they shall live and reign also. 5. The charter by which they hold all their privileges is indefeasible. God's covenant with them shall be an everlasting covenant; so the covenant of grace is, for it secures to us an everlasting happiness.

Fifthly. It is here promised that God will dwell among them, and this will make them dwell comfortably indeed. I "will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore; my tabernacle also shall be with them," ver. 26, 27. 1. They shall have the tokens of God's special presence with them, and his gracious residence among them. God will in very deed dwell with them upon the earth, for where his sanctuary is he is. When they profaned his sanctuary he took it from them, Isa. lxiv. 11; but now they are purified God will dwell with them again. 2. They shall have an opportunity of conversing with God, of hearing from him, speaking to him, and so keeping up communion with him, which will be the comfort of their lives. 3. They shall have the means of grace. By the oracles of God in his tabernacle they shall be made wiser and better, and all their children shall be taught of the Lord. 4. Thus their covenant relation to God shall be improved, and the bond of it strengthened; "I will be their God, and they shall be my people," and they shall know it by having my sanctuary among them, and shall have the comfort of it.

Sixthly. Both God and Israel shall have the honour of this among the heathen, ver. 26. Now the heathen observe how Israel had profaned their own crown by their sins, and God had profaned it by his judgments; but then, when Israel is reformed, and God is returned in mercy to them, the very heathen shall be made to know that "the Lord doth sanctify Israel," has a title to them, and an interest in them, more than any other people, because his sanctuary is and shall be in the midst of them. Note, God designs the sanctification of those among whom he sets up his sanctuary; and blessed and holy are they who, enjoying the privileges of the sanctuary, give such proofs and evidences of their sanctification as that the heathen may know it is no less than the almighty grace of God that sanctifies them. Such have God's sanctuary in the midst of them, the kingdom of God with them, in the principles of the spiritual life, and shall have it so for evermore in the enjoyments of an eternal life.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

This chapter and that which follows it are concerning Gog and Magog, a powerful enemy to the people of Israel, that should make a formidable descent upon them, and put them into a mighty fright, but their army should be routed, and their design defeated; and this prophecy, it is most probable, had its accomplishment some time after the return of the people of Israel out of their captivity; whether in the struggles they had with the kings of Syria, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, or perhaps in some other way not recorded, we cannot tell. If the sacred history of the Old Testament had reached as far as the prophecy, we should have been better able to understand these chapters; but for the want of that key we are locked out of the meaning of them. God had, by the prophet, assured his people of happy times after their return to their own land; but, lest they should mistake the promises which related to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the spiritual privileges of that kingdom, as if from them they might promise themselves an uninterrupted temporal prosperity, he here tells them, as Christ told his disciples, to prevent the like mistake, that in the world they shall have tribulation, but they may be of good cheer, for they shall be victorious at last. This prophecy here of Gog and Magog is without doubt alluded to in that prophecy which relates to the latter days, and which seems to be yet unfulfilled, Rev. xx. 8, that Gog and Magog shall be gathered to battle against the camp of the saints, as the Old Testament prophecies of the destruction of Babylon are alluded to, Rev. xviii. But in both the Old Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in the Jewish church, as the New Testament prophecies shall have, when the time comes, in the Christian church. In this chapter we have intermixed, I. The attempts that Gog and Magog should make upon the land of Israel, the vast army they should bring into the field, and their vast preparations, ver. 4—7; their project and design in it, ver. 8—13; God's hand in it, ver. 4. II. The great terror that this should strike upon the land of Israel, ver. 15, 16, 18—20. III. The Divine restraint that these enemies should be under, and the Divine protection that Israel should be under, ver. 2—4; and again, ver. 14. IV. The defeat that should be given to those enemies by the immediate hand of God, ver. 21—23; which we shall hear more of in the next chapter.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him, 3 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Gog,
The chief prince of Meshech and Tubal:
4 And I will turn thee back,
And put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth,
And all thine army, horses and horsemen,
All of them clothed with all sorts of armour,
Even a great company with bucklers and shields,
All of them handling swords:

TARTAR AND SCYTHIAN CAVALRY.

5 Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them;
All of them with shield and helmet:
6 Gomer, and all his bands; [bands:
The house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his
And many people with thee.
7 Be thou prepared, and prepare for thyself,
Thou, and all thy company that are assembled unto thee,
And be thou a guard unto them.
8 After many days thou shalt be visited:
In the latter years thou shalt come into the land
That is brought back from the sword,
And is gathered out of many people,
Against the mountains of Israel, which have been always
But it is brought forth out of the nations, [waste:
And they shall dwell safely all of them.
9 Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm,
Thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land,
Thou, and all thy bands, and many people with thee.
10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
It shall also come to pass,
That at the same time shall things come into thy mind,
And thou shalt think an evil thought: [villages;
11 And thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwalled
I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely,
All of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates,
12 To take a spoil, and to take a prey;
To turn thine hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, [nations,
And upon the people that are gathered out of the
Which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land.
13 Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish,
With all the young lions thereof, shall say unto thee,
Art thou come to take a spoil?
Hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey?

To carry away silver and gold,
To take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil?

The critical expositors have enough to do here to inquire out Gog and Magog; we cannot pretend either to add to their observations, or to determine their controversies. Gog seems to be the king, and Magog the kingdom; so that Gog and Magog are like Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Some think they find them afar off, in Scythia, Tartary, and Russia. Others think they find them nearer the land of Israel, in Syria and Asia the Less. Ezekiel is appointed to prophesy against Gog, and to tell him that God is against him, ver. 2, 3. Note, God doth not only see those that are now the enemies of his church, and set himself against them, but he foresees those that will be so, and lets them know by his word that he is against them too, and yet is pleased to make use of them to serve his own purposes, for the glory of his own name; surely their wrath shall praise him, and the "remainder thereof he will restrain," Ps. lxxvi. 10. Let us observe here,

First. The confusion which God designed to put this enemy to. It is remarkable that this is put first in the prophecy; before it is foretold that God will bring him forth against Israel, it is foretold that God will put hooks into his jaws, and turn him back, ver. 4, that they might have assurance of their deliverance before they had the prospect given them of their danger. Thus tender is God of the comfort of his people, thus careful that they may not be frightened; even before the trouble begins he tells them it will end well.

Secondly. The undertaking which he designed to engage him in, in order to this defeat and disappointment.

1. The nations that shall be confederate in this enterprise against Israel are many, and great, and mighty, ver. 5, 6, Persia, Ethiopia, &c. Antiochus had an army made up of all the nations here named, and many others. These people had been at variance with one another, and yet in combination against Israel. How are they increased that trouble God's people!

2. They are well furnished with arms and ammunition, bring a good train of artillery into the field, horses and horsemen, ver. 4, bravely equipped with all sorts of armour, bucklers, and shields for defence, and all handling swords for offence. Orders are given to make all imaginable preparation for this expedition; ver. 7, "Be thou prepared," and do thou prepare. See what warlike preparations thou hast already in store, and, lest that should not suffice, make farther preparation, thou and all thy company. Let Gog himself be a guard to the rest of the confederates; as commander-in-chief let him engage to take care of them and their safety; let him pass his word for their security, and take them under his particular protection. The leaders of an army, instead of exposing their soldiers needlessly and presumptuously, and throwing away their lives upon desperate undertakings, should study to be a guard to them; and whenever they send them forth in danger, should contrive to support and cover them. This call to prepare seems to be ironical; Do thy worst, but I will turn thee back, like that, Isa. viii. 9, "Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces."

3. Their design is against the mountains of Israel; ver. 8, against "the land that is brought back from the sword." It is not long since it was harassed with the sword of war, and it has been always wasted, more or less, with one judgment or other; it is but newly gathered out of many people, and brought forth out of the nations; it has enjoyed, comparatively, but a short breathing time, has scarce recovered any strength since it was brought down by war and captivity, and therefore its neighbours need not fear its being too great; nay, and therefore it is very barbarous to pick a quarrel with it so soon; it is a people that "dwells safely, all of them" in "unwalled villages," very secure, and "having neither bars nor gates," ver. 11. It is a certain sign they intend no mischief to their neighbours, for they fear no mischief from them. It cannot be thought they will offend others who do not take care to defend themselves, and it aggravates the sin of these invaders. It is base and barbarous to devise "evil against thy neighbour" while he "dwells securely by thee," and has no distrust of thee, Pr. iii. 29. But see here how the clouds return after the rain in this world, and what little reason we have ever to be secure till we come to heaven. It is not long since Israel was brought back from the sword of one enemy, and behold the sword of another is drawn against it. Former troubles will not excuse us from farther troubles; but when we think we have put off the harness, at least for some time, by a fresh and sudden alarm we may be called to gird it on again, and therefore we must never boast, or be off our guard.

4. That which the enemy has in view in forming this project is to enrich himself, and to make himself master, not of the country, but of the wealth of it; to spoil and plunder it, and make a prey of it. At the same time that God intends to bring this matter about, things shall come into the mind of this enemy, and he shall "think an evil thought," ver. 10. Note, All the mischief men do, and particularly the mischief they do to the church of God, ariseth from evil thoughts that come into their mind—ambitious thoughts, covetous thoughts, spiteful thoughts to those that are good, for the sake of their goodness. It came into Antiochus's mind what a singular people these religious Jews were, and how their worship witnessed against, and condemned, the idolatries of their neighbours, and therefore in enmity to their religion he would plague them. It came into his mind what a wealthy people they were, that they had "gotten cattle and goods in the midst of the land," ver. 12; and withal how weak they were, and how unable to make any resistance, and how easy it would be to carry off what they had, and how much glory this rapine would add to his victorious sword. These things coming into his mind, and one evil thought drawing on another, he came at last to this resolve, ver. 11, 12, "I will go up to the land of unwalled villages," yea, that I will; it will cost me nothing to make them all my own. I will go and disturb them that are at rest, without giving them any notice; not to crush their growing greatness, or chastise their insolence, or make reprisals upon them for any wrong they have done us, (they had none of these pretences to make war upon them,) but purely "to take a spoil, and to take a prey," ver. 12, in open defiance to all the laws of justice and equity, as much as the highwayman's killing the traveller that he may take his money. These were the thoughts that came into the mind of this wicked prince, and God knew them; nay, he knew them before they came into his mind, for he "understandeth our thoughts afar off," Ps. cxxxix. 2.

5. According to the project thus formed he pours in all his forces upon the land of Israel, and finds those that are ready to come in to his assistance upon the same prospects; ver. 9, "Thou shalt ascend, and come like a storm," with all the force, and fury, and fierceness imaginable, and thou shalt be "like a cloud to cover the land," to darken it, and to threaten it; thou, and not only all thy bands, all the force thou canst bring into the field, but many people with thee, such as are spoken of ver. 13; Sheba and Dedan, the Arabians and Edomites, and the merchants of Tarshish, of Tyre and Sidon, and other maritime cities, they and their young lions, that are greedy of spoil, and live upon it, they shall say, "Art thou come to take the spoil" of this land? Yes, he is; and therefore they wish him success; or perhaps they envy him, or grudge it him. Art thou come for riches, who art thyself so rich already? Or, knowing that God was on Israel's side, they thus ridicule his attempts, foreseeing they would be baffled, and that he would be disappointed of the prey he promised himself. Or, if he be come to take the prey, they will come and join with him, and add to his forces. When Lysias, that was general of Antiochus's army, came against the Jews, the neighbour nations joined with him, 1 Mac. iii. 24, to share in the guilt, in hopes to share in the prey. "When thou sawest a thief then thou consentedst with him."

14 Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely,
Shalt thou not know it?
15 And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts,
Thou, and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses,
A great company, and a mighty army:
16 And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel,
As a cloud to cover the land;
It shall be in the latter days,
And I will bring thee against my land,
That the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee,
O Gog, before their eyes.
17 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time
By my servants the prophets of Israel,
Which prophesied in those days many years
That I would bring thee against them?
18 And it shall come to pass at the same time
When Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord GOD,
That my fury shall come up in my face. [spoken,
19 For in my jealousy and in the fire of my wrath have I
Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel;
20 So that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven,
And the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth,
And all the men that are upon the face of the earth,
Shall shake at my presence,
And the mountains shall be thrown down,
And the steep places shall fall,
And every wall shall fall to the ground.
21 And I will call for a sword against him
Throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord GOD:
Every man's sword shall be against his brother.
22 And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood;
And I will rain upon him, and upon his bands,
And upon the many people that are with him,
An overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone.
23 Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself;
And I will be known in the eyes of many nations,
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

This latter part of the chapter is a repetition of the former. The dream is doubled, for the thing is certain, and to be very carefully regarded.

First. It is here again foretold that this spiteful enemy should make a formidable descent upon the land of Israel; ver. 15, "Thou shalt come out of the north parts (Syria lay on the north of Canaan) with a mighty army," shalt come like a cloud, and "cover the land of my people Israel," ver. 16. These words, ver. 14, "When my people of Israel dwell safely, shalt thou not know it?" may be taken two ways; either,

1. As speaking his inducements to this attempt. Thou shalt have intelligence brought thee how securely, and therefore how carelessly, the people of Israel dwell, which shall give rise to thy project against them; for when thou knowest not only what a rich, but what an easy prey they are likely to be, thou wilt soon determine to fall upon them. Note, God's providence is to be acknowledged in the occasion, the small occasion perhaps that is given, and that not designedly neither, to those first thoughts from which great enterprises take their original. God, to bring about his own purposes, lets men know that which yet he knows they will make an ill use of, as here. Or, meddles with them meddles to his own hurt; and it is for the demonstrating of this to all the world that God will bring this mighty enemy against his people. They that gathered themselves against Israel said, Let us take the spoil, and take the prey; but they "knew not the thoughts of the Lord," Mic. iv. 11, 12. "I will bring thee against my land." This is strange news, that God will not only permit his enemies to come against his own children, but will himself bring them. But if we understand what he aims at we shall be well reconciled even to this; it is, "That the heathen may know me" to be the only living and true God, "when I shall be sanctified in thee," O Gog; that is, in thy defeat and destruction "before their eyes," that all the nations may see and say, "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, that rides on the heavens for the help of his people." Note, God therefore brings his people into danger and distress that he may have the honour of bringing about their deliverance; and therefore suffers the enemies of his church to prevail awhile, though they profane his name by their sin, that he may have the honour of prevailing at last, and sanctifying his own name in their ruin. Now it is said this shall be in the latter days, namely, in the latter days of the Old Testament church; so the mischief Antiochus did to Israel was; but in the latter days of the New Testament church another like enemy should arise, that should in like manner be defeated. Note, Effectual securities are treasured up in the word of God against the troubles and dangers the church may be brought into a great while hence, even in the latter days.

2. As speaking his disappointment in this attempt, which here, as before, the prophecy begins with. "When my people Israel dwell safely," not in their own apprehension only, but in reality, forasmuch as they dwell safely under the Divine protection, shall not thou be made to know it by the fruitlessness of thine endeavours to destroy them; thou shalt soon find that there is no enchantment against Jacob, that no weapon formed against them shall prosper. Thou shalt know to thy cost, shalt know to thy shame, that though they have no walls, nor bars, nor gates, they have God himself, a wall of fire round about them, and he that toucheth them toucheth the apple of his eye. Whosoever

Secondly. Reference is herein had to the predictions of the former prophets; ver. 17, "Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old times," of whom Moses spoke in his prophecy of the latter days, Deu. xxxii. 43, "He will render vengeance to his adversaries;" and David, Ps. ix. 15, "The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made;" and often elsewhere in the Psalms. This is the leviathan of whom Isaiah spake, Isa. xxvii. 1; that congress of the nations of which Joel spake, Joel iii. 1. Many of the prophets had perhaps spoken particularly of this event, though it be not written, as they all had spoken and written too that which is applicable to it. Note, There is an amiable, admirable harmony and agreement between the Lord's prophets, though they lived in several ages; for they were all guided by one and the same Spirit.

Thirdly. It is here foretold that this furious, formidable enemy should be utterly cut off in this attempt upon Israel, and it should issue in his own ruin. This is supposed by many to have its accomplishment in the many defeats given by the Maccabees to the forces of Antiochus, and the remarkable judgments of God executed upon his own person, for he died of sore diseases; but these things are here foretold, as usual, in figurative expressions, which we are not to look for the literal accomplishment of, and yet they might be fulfilled nearer the letter than we know of.

1. God will be highly displeased with this bold invader. When he comes up in pride and anger against the land of Israel, and thinks to carry all before him with a high hand, then God's fury shall come up in his face, which is an allusion to the manner of men whose colour riseth in their faces when some high affront is offered them, and they are resolved to shew their resentment of it, ver. 18; God will speak against them, in his jealousy for his people, and in the fire of his wrath, against his and their enemies, ver. 19. See how God's permitting sin, his laying occasions of sin before men, and his making use of it to serve his own purposes, is very well consistent with his hatred of sin, and his displeasure against it. God brings this enemy against his land, letting him know what an easy prey it might be, and determining thereby to glorify himself, and yet, when he comes against the land, God's fury comes up, and he speaks to him in the fire of his wrath. If any ask, Why doth he thus find fault, for who hath resisted his will? it is easy to answer, "Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?"

2. His forces shall be put into the greatest confusion and consternation imaginable; ver. 19, "There shall be a great shaking" of them "in the land of Israel," an universal concussion, ver. 20, such as shall affect the fishes and fowls, the beasts and creeping things, and much more "the men that are upon the face of the earth," who sooner receive impressions of fear. There shall be such an earthquake as shall throw down the mountains, those natural heights, and the steep places, towers, and walls, those artificial heights; they shall all fall to the ground. Some understand this of the fright which the land of Israel should be put into by the fury of the enemy; but it is rather to be understood of the fright which the enemy should be put into by the wrath of God. All those things which they both raise themselves and stay themselves upon shall be shaken down, and their hearts shall fail them.

3. He shall be routed, and utterly ruined; both earth and heaven shall be armed against him. 1st. The earth shall muster up its forces to destroy him. If the people of Israel have not strength and courage to resist him, God will "call for a sword against him," ver. 21; and he hath swords always at command, that are "bathed in heaven," Isa. xxxv. 5. Throughout all the mountains of Israel, where he hoped to meet with spoil to enrich him, he shall meet with swords to destroy him; and, rather than fail, "every man's sword shall be against his brother," as in the day of Midian, Ps. lxxxiii. 9. The great men of Syria shall undermine and overthrow one another, shall accuse one another, shall fight duels with one another. Note, God can, and often doth, make the destroyers of his people to be their own destroyers, and the destroyers of one another. However, he will himself be their destroyer, will take the work into his own hand, that it may be done thoroughly; ver. 22, "I will plead against him with pestilence and blood." Note, Whom God acts against he pleads against; he shews them the ground of his controversy with them, that their mouths may be stopped, and he may be clear when he judgeth. 2nd. The artillery of heaven shall also be drawn out against them; "I will rain upon him an overflowing rain," ver. 22. He comes like a storm upon Israel, ver. 9; but God will come like a storm upon him, will rain upon him great hailstones, as upon the Canaanites, Jos. x. 11; fire and brimstone, as upon Sodom, and a horrible tempest, Ps. xi. 6. Thus the Gog and Magog in the New Testament shall be devoured with fire from heaven, and cast into the lake of brimstone, Rev. xx. 9, 10. That will be the everlasting portion of the impenitent, implacable enemies of God's church and people.

4. God in all this will be glorified; the end he aimed at (ver. 16) shall be accomplished; ver. 23, "Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself." Note, In the destruction of sinners God makes it to appear that he is a great and holy God, and will do so to eternity; and if men do not magnify and sanctify him as they ought, he will magnify himself, and sanctify himself. And this we should desire and pray for daily, "Father, glorify thy own name."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

This chapter continues and concludes the prophecy against Gog and Magog, in whose destruction God crowns his favour to his people Israel, which shines very bright after the scattering of that black cloud in the close of this chapter. Here is, I. An express prediction of the utter destruction of Gog and Magog, agreeing with what we had before, ver. 1—7. II. An illustration of the vastness of that destruction, in three consequences of it, the burning of their weapons, ver. 8—10; the burying of their slain, ver. 11—16; and the feasting of the fowls with the dead bodies of those that were unburied, ver. 17—22. III. A declaration of God's gracious purposes concerning his people Israel, in this and other his providences concerning them, and a promise of farther mercy he had yet in store for them, ver. 23—29.

THEREFORE, thou son of man, prophesy against Gog, and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Gog,
The chief prince of Meshech and Tubal:
2 And I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part of thee,
And will cause thee to come up from the north parts,
And will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel:
3 And I will smite thy bow out of thy left hand,
And will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand.

TARTAR PRINCE, ARMED WITH BOW AND ARROWS.

4 Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou,
And all thy bands, and the people that is with thee:
I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort,
And to the beasts of the field to be devoured.
5 Thou shalt fall upon the open field:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.
6 And I will send a fire on Magog,
And among them that dwell carelessly in the isles:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.
7 So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people Israel;
And I will not let them pollute my holy name any more:
And the heathen shall know that I am the LORD, the Holy One in Israel.

This prophecy begins as that before, ch. xxxviii. 3, 4, "I am against thee, and I will turn thee back;" for there is need of line upon line, both for the conviction of Israel's enemies and the comfort of Israel's friends. Here, as there, it is foretold that God will bring this enemy "from the north parts," as formerly the Chaldeans were fetched from the north, Jer. i. 14, (omne malum ab aquilone, —'every evil comes from the north,') and, long after, the Roman empire was overrun by the northern nations; that he will bring him "upon the mountains of Israel," ver. 2, first, as a place of temptation, where the measure of his iniquity shall be filled up, and then as a place of execution, where his ruin shall be completed. And that is it that is here enlarged upon.

First. His soldiers shall be disarmed, and so disabled to carry on their enterprise. Though the men of might may find their hands, yet to what purpose, when they find it is put out of their power to do mischief; when God shall smite their bow out of their left hand, and their arrow out of their right? ver. 3. Note, The weapons formed against Zion shall not prosper.

Secondly. He and the greatest part of his army shall be slain in the field of battle; ver. 4, "Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel;" there they sinned, and there they shall perish, even upon the holy mountains of Israel; for "there brake he the arrows of the bow," Ps. lxxvi. 3. The mountains of Israel shall be moistened and fattened, and made fruitful with the blood of the enemies. "Thou shalt fall upon the open field," ver. 5, and shalt not be able even there to make thy escape; even upon the mountains he shall not find a pass that he shall be able to maintain, and upon the open field he shall not find a road that he shall be able to make his escape by. He and his bands, his regular troops, and the people that are with him, that follow the camp to share in the plunder, these shall all fall with him. Note, Those that cast in their lot among wicked people, (Pr. i. 14,) that they may have one purse with them, must expect to take their lot with them, and fare as they fare, taking the worse with the better. There shall be such a general slaughter made that but a sixth part shall be left, ver. 2; the other five shall all be cut off. Never was army so totally routed as this. And, for its greater infamy and reproach, their bodies shall be a feast to the birds of prey, ver. 5; compare with ver. 17, "Thou shalt fall, for I have spoken it." Note, Rather shall the most illustrious princes, (Antiochus was called Epiphanes, the illustrious) and the most numerous armies, fall to the ground, than any word of God; for he that hath spoken will make it good.

Thirdly. His country also shall be made desolate. "I will send a fire on Magog," ver. 6, and "among them that dwell carelessly," or confidently, in the isles, that is, the nations of the Gentiles. He designed to destroy the land of Israel, but shall not only be defeated in that design, but shall have his own destroyed by some fire, some consuming judgment or other. Note, Those who invade other people's rights justly lose their own.

Fourthly. God will by all this advance the honour of his own name, 1. Among his people Israel. They shall hereby know more of God's name, of his power and goodness; his care of them, his faithfulness to them, his providence concerning them, shall lead them into a better acquaintance with him. Every providence should do so, as well as every ordinance. "I will make my holy name known in the midst of my people." In Judah is God known; but those that know much of God should know more of him; we should especially increase in the knowledge of his name, as a holy name; know him as a God of perfect rectitude and that hates all sin. And then it follows, "I will not let them pollute my holy name any more." Note, Those that rightly know God's holy name will not dare to profane it; for it is through ignorance of it that men make light of it, and make bold with it. And this is God's method of dealing with men, first to enlighten their understandings, and by that means to influence the whole man. He first makes us to know his holy name, and so keeps us from polluting it, and engageth us to honour it. And this is here the blessed effect of God's glorious appearances on the behalf of his people. Thus he completes his favours, thus he sanctifies them, thus he makes them blessings indeed; by them he instructs his people and reforms them. "When the Almighty scattered kings for her, she was white as snow in Salmon," Ps. lxviii. 14. 2. Among the heathen. Those that never knew it, or would not own it, shall "know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel." They shall be made to know by dear-bought experience that he is a God of power, and his people's God and Saviour; and it is in vain for the greatest potentates to contend with him; none ever hardened their heart against him and prospered.

8 Behold, it is come, and it is done, saith the Lord GOD;
This is the day whereof I have spoken.
9 And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth,
And shall set on fire and burn the weapons,
Both the shields and the bucklers,
The bows and the arrows, and the handstaves, and the spears,
And they shall burn them with fire seven years:
10 So that they shall take no wood out of the field,
Neither cut down any out of the forests;
For they shall burn the weapons with fire:
And they shall spoil those that spoiled them,
And rob those that robbed them, saith the Lord GOD.

11 And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel, the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea: and it shall stop the noses of the passengers: and there shall they bury Gog and all his multitude: and they shall call it The valley of Hamon-gog. 12 And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them, that they may cleanse the land. 13 Yea, all the people of the land shall bury them; and it shall be to them a renown the day that I shall be glorified, saith the Lord GOD. 14 And they shall sever out men of continual employment, passing through the land to bury with the passengers those that remain upon the face of the earth, to cleanse it: after the end of seven months shall they search. 15 And the passengers that pass through the land, when any seeth a man's bone, then shall he set up a sign by it, till the buriers have buried it in the valley of Hamon-gog. 16 And also the name of the city shall be Hamonah. Thus shall they cleanse the land. 17 And, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD; Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field,

Assemble yourselves, and come;
Gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice that I do sacrifice for you,
Even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel,
That ye may eat flesh, and drink blood.
18 Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty,
And drink the blood of the princes of the earth,
Of rams, of lambs, and of goats, of bullocks,
All of them fatlings of Bashan.

19 And ye shall eat fat till ye be full,
And drink blood till ye be drunken,
Of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you.
20 Thus ye shall be filled at my table with horses and chariots,
With mighty men, and with all men of war,
Saith the Lord GOD.
21 And I will set my glory among the heathen,
And all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed,
And my hand that I have laid upon them.
22 So the house of Israel shall know that I am the LORD their God
From that day and forward.

Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment in the latter days, yet it is here spoken of as if it were already accomplished, because it is certain; ver. 8, "Behold, it is come, and it is done," it is as sure to be done, when the time is come, as if it were done already. "This is the day, whereof I have" long and often "spoken," and though it has been long in coming, yet at length it is come. Thus it was said unto John, Rev. xxi. 6, "It is done." To represent the routing of the army of Gog as very great, here are three things instanced as the consequences of it. It was God himself that gave them the defeat, we do not find that the people of Israel drew a sword, or struck a stroke. But,

First. They shall burn their weapons, their bows and arrows, which fell out of their hands, ver. 3, their shields and bucklers, their javelins, spears, their leading staves, truncheons, and half-pikes, every thing that is combustible. They shall not lay them up in their armouries, or reserve them for their own use, lest they should be tempted to put a confidence in them, but burn them. Not all at once for a bonfire—to what purpose would be that waste? but as they had occasion to use them, for fuel in their houses, instead of other firewood, so that they should have no occasion to take wood out of the field or forests for seven years together, ver. 10; such vast quantities of weapons shall there be left upon the open field, where the enemy fell, and in the roads which they passed in their flight. The weapons were dry and fitter for fuel than green wood; and by saving the wood in their coppices and forests they gave it time to grow. Though the mountains of Israel produce plenty of good things, yet it becomes the people of Israel to be good husbands of their plenty, and to save what they can for the benefit of those that come after them, as Providence shall give them opportunity to do so. We may suppose, when they that dwelt in the cities of Israel came forth to "spoil those that spoiled them," and make reprisals upon them, they found upon them silver, and gold, and ornaments; yet no mention is made of any thing particularly that they converted to their own use, but the wood of the weapons for fuel, which is one of the necessaries of human life, to teach us to think it enough if we be well supplied with those, though we have but little of the delights and gaieties of it, and of those things which we may very well live without. And every time they put fuel to the fire, and warmed themselves at it, they would be put in mind of the number and strength of their enemies, and the imminent peril they were in of falling into their hands, which would help to enlarge their hearts in thankfulness to that God who had so wonderfully, so seasonably, delivered them. As they sat by the fire with their children about them, (their fireside,) they might from it take occasion to tell them what great things God had done for them.

Secondly. They shall bury their dead. Usually, after a battle, when many are slain, the enemy desire time to bury their own dead; but here the slaughter shall be so general that there shall not be enough of the enemies left alive to bury the dead; and besides, the slain lie so dispersed on the mountains of Israel that it would be a work of time to find them out; and therefore it is left to the house of Israel to bury them, as a piece of triumph in their overthrow.

1. A place shall be appointed on purpose for the burying of them, namely, "the valley of the passengers, on the east of the sea," either the Salt sea, or the sea of Tiberias,—a valley through which there was great passing and repassing of travellers between Egypt and Chaldea. There shall be such a multitude of dead bodies putrefying above ground, with such a loathsome stench, that the travellers that go that way shall be forced to stop their noses. See what vile bodies ours are: when the soul has been a little while from them the smell of them becomes offensive, no smell more nauseous or more noxious. There, therefore, where the greatest number lay slain, shall the burying-place be appointed. In the place where the tree falls there let it lie. And it shall be called, "The valley of Hamon-gog;" that is, of the multitude, for that was the thing which was in a particular manner to be had in remembrance,—how numerous the forces of the enemies were which God defeated and destroyed for the defence of his people Israel.

2. A considerable time shall be spent in burying them—no less than seven months, ver. 22, which is a farther intimation that the slain of the Lord in this action should be many, and that great care should be taken by the house of Israel to leave none unburied, that so they may cleanse the land from the ceremonial pollution it contracted by the lying of so many dead corpses unburied in it, for the prevention of which it was appointed that those who were hanged on a tree should be speedily taken down and buried, Deu. xxi. 23. This is an intimation that times of eminent deliverances should be times of reformation. The more God has done for the saving of a land from ruin, the more the inhabitants should do for the cleansing of the land from sin.

3. Great numbers shall be employed in this work. All the people of the land shall be ready to lend a helping hand to it, ver. 13. Note, Every one should contribute the utmost he can in his place towards the cleansing of the land from the pollutions of it, and from every thing that is a reproach to it. Sin is a common enemy, which every man should take up arms against. In publico discrimine unusquisque homo miles est,—'In the season of public danger every man becomes a soldier;' and whoever shall assist in this work, "it shall be to them a renown." Though the office of grave-makers, or common scavengers of the country, seem but mean, yet, when it is for the cleansing and purifying of the land from dead works, it shall be mentioned to their honour. Note, Acts of humanity add much to the renown of God's Israel. It is a credit to religion when those that profess it are ready to every good work, and a good work it is to bury the dead, yea, though they be strangers and enemies to the commonwealth of Israel, for even they shall rise again. It shall be a renown to them in the day when God will be glorified. Note, It is for the glory of God when his Israel do that which adorns their profession; others will "see their good works, and glorify their Father," Mat. v. 16. And when God is honoured he will put honour upon his people. His glory is their renown.

4. Some particular persons shall make it their business to search out the dead bodies, or any part of them, that should remain unburied. The people of the land will soon grow weary of burying the pollutions of the country, and therefore they shall appoint "men of continual employment," that should apply themselves to it, and do nothing else till the land was thoroughly cleansed; for otherwise that which is every one's work would soon become nobody's work. Note, Those that are engaged in public work, especially for the cleansing and reforming a land, ought to be "men of continual employment," men that will stick to what they undertake, and go through with it, men that will apply themselves to it; and those that will do good according to their opportunities will find themselves continually employed.

5. Even the passengers shall be ready to give information to those whose business it is to cleanse the land of what public nuisances they meet with, which call for their assistance. They that pass through the land, though they will not stay to bury the dead themselves, lest they should contract a ceremonial pollution, yet they will give notice of those they find unburied. If they but discover a bone, they will set up a sign, that the buriers may come and bury it, and that till it is buried others may take heed of touching it; for which reason their sepulchres among the Jews were whited, that people might keep at a distance from them. Note, When good work is to be done, every one should lend a hand to further it, even the passengers themselves, who must not think themselves unconcerned in a common calamity, or a common iniquity, to put a stop to it. Those whose work it is to cleanse the land must not countenance any thing in it that is defiling; though it were not the body, but only the bone of a man, that was found unburied, they must encourage those who will give information of it, private information, by a sign, concealing the informer, that they may take it away, and bury it out of sight. Nay, "after the end of seven months," which was allowed them for this work, when all is taken away that appeared at first view, they shall search for more, that what is hidden may be brought to light; they shall search out iniquity till they find none. In memory of this they shall give a new name to their city; it shall be called "Hamonah, the multitude." O what a multitude of our enemies have we of this city buried! "Thus shall they cleanse the land," with all this care, with all this pains, ver. 16. Note, After conquering there must be cleansing. Moses appointed those Israelites that had been employed in the war with the Midianites to purify themselves, Num. xxxi. 24. Having received special favours from God, "let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness."

Thirdly. The birds and beasts of prey shall rest upon the carcases of the slain, while they remain unburied, and it shall be impossible to prevent it, ver. 17, &c. We find a great slaughter represented by this figure, Rev. xix. 17, &c., which is borrowed from this.

1. There is a general invitation given, ver. 17. It is to the fowl of every wing, and to every beast of the field, from the greatest to the least, that preys upon carcases, from the eagle to the raven, from the lion to the dog; let them all gather themselves on every side, here is meat enough for them, and they are all welcome. Let them come to God's sacrifice, to his feast, so the margin reads it. Note, The judgments of God executed upon sin and sinners are both a sacrifice and a feast; a sacrifice to the justice of God, and a feast to the faith and hope of God's people. When God "brake the head of leviathan," he gave him to be meat to Israel, Ps. lxxiv. 14. "The righteous shall rejoice," as at a feast, "when he sees the vengeance," and shall "wash his foot," as at a feast, "in the blood of the wicked." This sacrifice is upon the mountains of Israel; these are the high places, the altars, where God had been dishonoured by the idolatries of the people, but where he will now glorify himself in the destruction of his enemies.

2. There is great preparation made. They shall "eat the flesh of the mighty," and "drink the blood of the princes of the earth," ver. 18, 19. 1st. It is the flesh and blood of men that they shall be treated with. This has sometimes been an instance of the rebellion of the inferior creatures against man their master, which is an effect of his rebellion against God his Maker. 2nd. It is the flesh and blood of great men, here called rams and bullocks, and great goats, "all of them "fatlings of Bashan." It is the blood of the princes of the earth that they shall regale themselves with. What a mortification is this to the princes of the blood, as they called themselves, that God can make that blood, that royal blood, which swells their veins, a feast for the birds and beasts of prey? 3rd. It is the flesh and blood of wicked men, the enemies of God's church and people, that they are invited to. They had accounted the Israel of God as "sheep for the slaughter," and now they shall themselves be so accounted; they had thus used the "dead bodies of God's servants," Ps. lxxix. 2, or would have done, and now it shall come upon themselves.

3. They shall all be fed, they shall all be feasted to the full; ver. 19, 20, "Ye shall eat fat, and drink blood," which are satiating, surfeiting things. The sacrifice is great, and the feast upon the sacrifice is accordingly. "You shall be filled at my table." Note, God keeps a table for the inferior creatures; he provideth food for all flesh, and the eyes of all wait upon him; and he satisfies their desires, for he keeps a plentiful table. And if the birds and beasts shall be filled at God's table, which he hath prepared for them, much more shall his children be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple. They shall be filled with horses and chariots; that is, those that ride in the chariots, mighty men, and men of war, who triumphed over nations, are now themselves triumphed over by the ravens of the valley, and the young eagles, Pr. xxx. 17. They thought to have made an easy prey of God's Israel, and now they are themselves an easy prey to the birds and beasts. See how evil pursues sinners, even after death. This exposing of their bodies to be a prey is but a type and sign of those terrors that after death shall prey upon their consciences, (which the poetical fiction represented by a vulture continually pecking at the heart,) and this shame but an earnest of the everlasting shame and contempt they shall rise to.

Fourthly. This shall redound very much both to the glory and to the comfort and satisfaction of his people.

1. It shall be much to the honour of God, for the heathen shall hereby be made to know that he is the Lord; ver. 21, "All the heathen shall see" and observe "my judgments, that I have executed," and thereby my glory shall be set among them. This principle shall be admitted and established among them more than ever, that the God of Israel is a great and glorious God. He is known to be so even among the heathen, that have not, or read not, his written word, by the judgments which he executed.

2. It shall be much for the satisfaction of his people, for they shall hereby be made to know that he is their God; ver. 22, "The house of Israel shall know" abundantly to their comfort that "I am the Lord their God from that day and forward." 1st. He will be so "from that day and forward." God's present mercies are pledges and assurances of farther mercies. If God evidence to us that he is our God, he assures us that he will never leave us; "This God is our God for ever and ever." 2nd. They shall know it with more satisfaction "from that day and forward." They had sometimes been ready to question whether the Lord was with them or no; but the events of this day shall silence their doubts, and the matter being thus settled, and made clear, it shall not be doubted of for the future. As boasting in themselves is hereby for ever excluded, so boasting in God is hereby for ever secured.

23 And the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity:
Because they trespassed against me, therefore hid I my face from them,
And gave them into the hand of their enemies:
So fell they all by the sword.
24 According to their uncleanness and according to their transgressions have I done unto them,
And hid my face from them.
25 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob,
And have mercy upon the whole house of Israel,
And will be jealous for my holy name;
26 After that they have borne their shame,
And all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me,
When they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid.
27 When I have brought them again from the people,
And gathered them out of their enemies' lands,
And am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations;
28 Then shall they know that I am the LORD their God,
Which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen:
But I have gathered them unto their own land,
And have left none of them any more there.
29 Neither will I hide my face any more from them:
For I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel,
Saith the Lord GOD.

This is the conclusion of the whole matter going before, and hath reference not only to the predictions concerning Gog and Magog, but to all the prophecies of this book concerning the captivity of the house of Israel, and then concerning their restoration and return out of their captivity.

First. God will let the heathen know the meaning of his people's troubles, and rectify their mistake concerning them who took occasion from the troubles of Israel to reproach the God of Israel as unable to protect them, and untrue to his covenant with them. When God, upon their reformation and return to him, turned again their captivity, and brought them back to their own land, and, upon their perseverance in their reformation, wrought such great salvations for them as that from the attempts of Gog upon them, then it will be made to appear, even to the heathen, that will but consider and compare things, that there was no ground at all for their reflection; that Israel went into captivity, not because God could not protect them, but because they had by sin forfeited his favour, and thrown themselves out of his protection; ver. 23, 24, "The heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity," that iniquity which they learned from the heathen their neighbours, because they trespassed against God. That was the true reason why God hid his face from them, and "gave them into the hand of their enemies." It was "according to their uncleanness, and according to their transgressions." Now the evincing of this will not only silence their reflections on God, but will redound greatly to his honour. When the troubles of God's people are over, and we see the end of them, we shall better understand them than we did at first. And it will appear much for the glory of God when the world is made to know, 1. That God punisheth sin even in his own people, because he hates it most in those that are nearest and dearest to him, Am. iii. 2. It is the praise of justice to be impartial. 2. That when God gives up his people for a prey, it is to correct them and reform them, not to gratify their enemies, Isa. x. 7; xlii. 24. Let not them therefore exalt themselves. 3. That no sooner do God's people humble themselves under the rod but he returns in mercy to them.

Secondly. God will give his own people to know what great favour he has in store for them, notwithstanding the troubles he had brought them into; ver. 25, 26, "Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob."

1. Why now? Now God will "have mercy upon the whole house of Israel," 1st. Because it is time for him to stand up for his own glory, which suffers in their sufferings; Now will I "be jealous for my holy name," that that may no longer be reproached. 2nd. Because now they repent of their sins; they have borne their shame and all their trespasses. When sinners repent and take shame to themselves, God will be reconciled and put honour upon them. It is particularly pleasing to God that these penitents look a great way back in their penitential reflections, and are ashamed of all their trespasses which they were guilty of "when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid." The remembrance of the mercies they enjoyed in their own land, and the Divine protection they were under there, shall be improved as an aggravation of the sins they committed in that land. They dwelt safely, and might have continued to dwell so, and none should have given them any disquiet or disturbance if they had continued in the way of their duty; nay, therefore they trespassed because they dwelt safely. Outward safety is often a cause of inward security, and that is an inlet to all sin, Ps. lxxiii. Now this they are willing to bear the blame of, and acknowledge that God hath justly brought them into a land of trouble, where every one makes them afraid, because they had trespassed against him in a land of peace, where none made them afraid. And when they thus humble themselves under humbling providences God will bring again their captivity.

2. What then? When God has gathered them out of their enemies' hands, and brought them home again, 1st. Then God will have the praise of it. I will be "sanctified in them in the sight of many nations," ver. 27. As God was reproached in the reproach they were under during their captivity, so he will be sanctified in their reformation, and the making of them a holy people again; and will be glorified in their restoration, and the making of them a happy, glorious people again. 2nd. Then they shall have the benefit of it; ver. 28, "They shall know that I am the Lord their God." Note, The providences of God concerning his people that are designed for their good have the grace of God going along with them to teach them to eye God as the Lord, and their God in all, and then they do them good. They shall eye him as the Lord, and their God, First. In their calamities; that it was he that "caused them to be led into captivity," and therefore they must not only submit to his will, but endeavour to answer his end in it. Secondly. In their comfort; that it is he that has "gathered them to their own land," and left none of them among the heathen. Note, By the variety of events that are concerning us, if we look up to God in all, we may come to acquaint ourselves better with his various attributes and designs. 3rd. Then God and they will never part, ver. 29. First. God will pour out his Spirit upon them, to prevent their departures from him, and returns to folly again, and to keep them close to their duty. And then, Secondly. He will never hide his face any more from them, will never suspend his favour as he had done. He will never turn from doing them good; and, in order to that, he will effectually provide that they shall never turn from doing him service. Note, The indwelling of the Spirit is an infallible pledge of the continuance of God's favour. He will hide his face no more from those on whom he has poured out his Spirit. When therefore we pray that God would never cast us away from his presence, we must as earnestly pray that, in order to that, he would never take his Holy Spirit away from us, Ps. li. 11.

CHAPTER XL.

The waters of the sanctuary which this prophet saw in vision, ch. xlvii. 1., are a proper representation of this prophecy. Hitherto the waters have been sometimes but to the ankles, in other places to the knees, or to the loins, but now the waters are risen, and are become a river which cannot be passed over. Here is one continual vision, beginning at this chapter to the end of the book, which is justly looked upon to be one of the most difficult portions of scripture in all the book of God. The Jews will not allow any to read it till they are thirty years old, and tell those who do read it, that, though they cannot understand every thing in it, yet when Elias comes he will explain it. Many commentators, both ancient and modern, have owned themselves at a loss what to make of it, and what use to make of it: but because it is hard to be understood we must not therefore throw it by, but humbly search concerning it, get as far as we can into it, and as much as we can out of it; and when we despair of satisfaction in every difficulty we meet with, bless God that our salvation doth not depend upon it, but things necessary are plain enough, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us. These chapters are the more to be regarded, because the two last chapters of the Revelation seem to have a plain allusion to them, as Rev. xx. has to the foregoing prophecy of Gog and Magog. Here is the vision of a glorious temple in this chapter, and ch. xli. xlii.; of God's taking possession of it, ch. xliii.; orders concerning the priests that are to minister in this temple, ch. xliv.; the divisions of the land, what portion should be allotted for the sanctuary, what for the city, and what for the prince, both in his government of the people and his worship of God, ch. xlv.; and farther instructions for him and the people, ch. xlvi.; and, after the vision of the holy waters, we have the borders of the holy land, and the portions assigned to the tribes, and the dimensions and gates of the holy city, ch. xlvii., xlviii. Some make this to represent what had been during the flourishing state of the Jewish church; how glorious Solomon's temple was in its best days, that the captives might see what they had lost by sin, and might be the more humbled. But that seems not probable. The general scope of it I take to be, I. To assure the captives that they should not only return to their land, and be settled there, which had been often promised in the foregoing chapters, but that they should have, and therefore should be encouraged, to build another temple, which God would own, and where he would meet them, and bless them. That the ordinances of worship should be revived, and the sacred priesthood should there attend; and, though they should not have a king to live in such splendour as formerly, yet they should have a prince or ruler (who is often spoken of in this vision) that should countenance the worship of God amongst them, and should himself be an example of diligent attendance upon it; and that prince, priests, and people, should have a very comfortable settlement and subsistence in their own land. II. To direct them to look farther than all this, and to expect the coming of the Messiah, who had before been prophesied of under the name of David, because he was the man that projected the building of the temple; and who should set up a spiritual temple, even the gospel church, the glory of which should far exceed that of Solomon's temple, and which should continue to the end of time. And the dimensions of these visionary buildings being so large, the new temple bigger than all the old Jerusalem, and the new Jerusalem bigger than all the land of Canaan, plainly intimates, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, that these things cannot be literally, but must be spiritually, understood. And the gospel temple erected by Christ and his apostles was so closely connected with the second material temple, was erected so carefully just at the time when that fell into decay, that it might be ready to receive its glories when it resigned them, it was proper enough that they should both be referred to in one and the same vision. Under the type and figure of a temple and altar, priests and sacrifices, is foreshewed the spiritual worship that should be performed in gospel times more agreeably to the nature both of God and man, and that perfected at last in the kingdom of glory, in which perhaps these visions will have their full accomplishment; and, some think, in some happy and glorious state of the gospel church on this side heaven, in the latter days. In this chapter we have, I. A general account of this vision of the temple and city, ver. 1—4. II. A particular account of it entered upon, and a description given, 1. Of the out-wall, ver. 5; 2. Of the east gate, ver. 6—19; 3. Of the north gate, ver. 20—23; 4. Of the south gate, ver. 24—31; and the chambers, and other appurtenances belonging to these gates; 5. Of the inner court, both towards the east and towards the south, ver. 32—38; 6. Of the tables, ver. 39—43; 7. Of the lodgings for the singers and the priests, ver. 44—47; 8. Of the porch of the house, ver. 48, 49.

IN the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the city was smitten, in the selfsame day the hand of the LORD was upon me, and brought me thither. 2 In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city on the south. 3 And he brought me thither, and, behold, there was a man, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed; and he stood in the gate. 4 And the man said unto me,

Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears,
And set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee;
For to the intent that I might shew them unto thee
Art thou brought hither:
Declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.

Here is, First. The date of this vision. It was in the twenty-fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, ver. 1, which some compute to be the thirty-third year of the first captivity, and is here said to be the "fourteenth year after the city was smitten." See how seasonably the clearest and fullest prospects of their deliverance were given them, when they were in the depths of their distress; and an assurance of the return of the morning when they were in the midnight of their captivity; then "the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brought me thither" to Jerusalem. Now it was in ruins, desolate and deserted, a piteous sight to the prophet.

Secondly. The scene where it was laid. The prophet was brought "in the visions of God to the land of Israel," ver. 2. And it was not the first time he had been brought thither in vision; we had him carried to Jerusalem to see it in its iniquity and shame, ch. viii. 3, here he is carried thither to have a pleasing prospect of it in its glory, though its present aspect, now it was quite depopulated, was dismal. He was set "upon a very high mountain," as Moses upon the top of Pisgah, to view the land which was now a second time a land of promise, not yet in possession. From the top of this mountain he saw "as the frame of a city," the plan and model of it; but this city was a temple as large as a city. The New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 22, had no temple therein; this here is all temple, which comes much to the same. It is a city for men to dwell in; it is a temple for God to dwell in; for in the church on earth God dwells with men, in that in heaven men dwell with God. Both these are framed in the counsel of God,—framed by Infinite Wisdom, and all very good.

Thirdly. The particular discoveries of this city, (which he had at first a general view of,) were made to him by "a man whose appearance was like the appearance of brass," ver. 3; not a created angel, but Jesus Christ, who should be found in fashion as a man, that he might both discover and build the gospel temple. He brought him to this city; for it is through Christ that we have both acquaintance with, and access to, the benefits and privileges of God's house; he it is that "shall build the temple of the Lord," Zec. vi. 13. His appearing like brass speaks both his brightness and his strength. John in vision saw "his feet like unto fine brass," Rev. i. 15.

Fourthly. The dimensions of this city or temple, and the several parts of it, were taken with a line of flax and a measuring reed or rod, ver. 3, as carpenters have both their line and a wooden measure. The temple of God is built by line and rule, and those that would let others into the knowledge of it must do it by that line and rule. The church is formed according to the Scripture, the pattern in the Mount. That is the line and the measuring reed that is in the hand of Christ. With that doctrine and laws ought to be measured, and examined by that; for then peace is upon the Israel of God when they walk according to that rule.

Fifthly. Directions are here given to the prophet to receive this revelation from the Lord, and transmit it pure and entire to the church, ver. 4. 1. He must carefully observe everything that was said and done in this vision. His attention is raised and engaged; ver. 4, "Behold with thine eyes" all that is shewed thee; do not only see it, but look intently upon it; and "hear with thine ears" all that is said to thee, diligently hearken to it, and be sure to "set thine heart upon it;" attend with a fixedness of thought and a close application of mind. What we see of the works of God, and what we hear of the word of God, will do us no good unless we set our hearts upon it, as those that reckon ourselves nearly concerned in it, and expect advantage to our souls by it. 2. He must faithfully declare it to the house of Israel, that they may have the comfort of it; therefore he receives that he may give. Thus the revelation of Jesus Christ was lodged in the hands of John that he might signify it to the churches, Rev. i. 1. And, because he is to declare it as a message from God, he must therefore be fully apprised of it himself, and much affected with it. Note, Those who are to preach God's word to others ought to study it well themselves, and set their hearts upon it. Now the reason given why he must both observe it himself and declare it to the house of Israel is, because to this intent he is brought hither, and has it shewed him. Note, When the things of God are shewn us it concerns us to consider to what intent they are shewn us; and when we are sitting under the ministry of the word to consider to what intent we are brought thither, that we may answer the end of our coming, and may not receive the grace of God in shewing us such things in vain.

5 And behold a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring reed of six cubits long by the cubit and an hand breadth: so he measured the breadth of the building, one reed; and the height, one reed. 6 Then came he unto the gate which looketh toward the east, and went up the stairs thereof, and measured the threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad; and the other threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad. 7 And every little chamber was one reed long, and one reed broad; and between the little chambers were five cubits; and the threshold of the gate by the porch of the gate within was one reed. 8 He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed. 9 Then measured he the porch of the gate, eight cubits; and the posts thereof, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was inward. 10 And the little chambers of the gate eastward were three on this side, and three on that side; they three were of one measure: and the posts had one measure on this side and on that side. 11 And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits; and the length of the gate, thirteen cubits. 12 The space also before the little chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side: and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side. 13 He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door. 14 He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of the court round about the gate. 15 And from the face of the gate of the entrance unto the face of the porch of the inner gate were fifty cubits. 16 And there were narrow windows to the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the arches: and windows were round about inward: and upon each post were palm trees. 17 Then brought he me into the outward court, and, lo, there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: thirty chambers were upon the pavement. 18 And the pavement by the side of the gates over against the length of the gates was the lower pavement. 19 Then he measured the breadth from the forefront of the lower gate unto the forefront of the inner court without, an hundred cubits eastward and northward. 20 And the gate of the outward court that looked toward the north, he measured the length thereof, and the breadth thereof. 21 And the little chambers thereof were three on this side and three on that side; and the posts thereof and the arches thereof were after the measure of the first gate: the length thereof was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 22 And their windows, and their arches, and their palm trees, were after the measure of the gate that looketh toward the east; and they went up unto it by seven steps; and the arches thereof were before them. 23 And the gate of the inner court was over against the gate toward the north, and toward the east; and he measured from gate to gate an hundred cubits. 24 After that he brought me toward the south, and behold a gate toward the south: and he measured the posts thereof and the arches thereof according to these measures.

25 And there were windows in it and in the arches thereof round about, like those windows: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 26 And there were seven steps to go up to it, and the arches thereof were before them: and it had palm trees, one on this side, and another on that side, upon the posts thereof.

The measuring reed, which was in the hand of the surveyor-general, was mentioned before, ver. 3. Here we are told, ver. 5, what was the exact length of it, which must be observed, because the house was measured by it. It was six cubits long, reckoning, not by the common cubit, but the cubit of the sanctuary, the sacred cubit, by which it was fit this holy house should be measured, and that was a hand-breadth, that is, four inches longer than the common cubit. The common cubit was eighteen inches, this twenty-two: see ch. xliii. 13. Yet some of the critics contend that this measuring reed was but six common cubits in length, and one hand-breadth added to the whole. The former seems more probable. Here is an account,

First. Of the outer wall of the house, which compassed it round, which was three yards thick, and three yards high; which notes the separation between the church and the world on every side, and the Divine protection which the church is under. If a wall of this vast thickness will not secure it, God himself will be a wall of fire round about it. Whoever attacks it, it is at their peril.

Secondly. Of the several gates, with the chambers adjoining to them. Here is no mention of the outer court of all, which was called the court of the Gentiles. Some think because in gospel times there should be such a vast confluence of Gentiles to the church that their court should be left unmeasured, to signify that the worshippers in that court should be unnumbered, Rev. vii. 9, 11, 12.

1. He begins with the east gate, because that was the usual way of entering into the lower end of the temple, the holy of holies being at the west end, in opposition to the idolatrous heathen, that worshipped towards the east. Now in the account of this gate observe, 1st. That he went up to it by stairs, ver. 6; for the gospel church was exalted above that of the Old Testament, and when we go to worship God we must ascend: so is the call, Rev. iv. 1. Come up hither; Sursum corda,—'Up with your hearts.' 2nd. That the chambers adjoining to the gates were but little chambers about ten feet square, ver. 7; these were for those to lodge in who attended the service of the house. And it becomes such who are made spiritual priests to God to content themselves with little chambers, and not to seek great things to themselves. So that we may but have a place within the verge of God's court we have reason to be thankful, though it be in a little chamber, a mean apartment, though we be but doorkeepers there. 3rd. The chambers, as they were each of them four-square, noting their stability and due proportion, and their exact agreement with the rule, for they were each of them one reed long and one reed broad, so they were all of one measure, that there might be an equality among the attendants on the service of the house. 4th. The chambers were very many; for in our Father's house there are many mansions, Jno. xiv. 2, in his house above and in that here on earth. In the secret of his tabernacle shall those be hid, and in a safe pavilion, whose desire is to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of their life, Ps. xxvii. 4, 5. Some make these chambers to represent the particular congregations of believers which are parts of the great temple, the universal church, which are and must be framed by the Scripture line and rule, and which Jesus Christ takes a measure of, that is, takes cognizance of, for he walks in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks. 5th. It is said, ver. 14, "He made also the posts." He that now measured them was the same that made them; for Christ is the builder of his church, and therefore is best able to give us the knowledge of it; and his reducing them to the rule and standard is called his making of them, for no account is made of them farther than they agree with that; "To the law and to the testimony." 6th. Here are posts of sixty cubits, which some think was literally fulfilled, when Cyrus, in his edict for rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, ordered that the height thereof should be sixty cubits, that is, thirty yards and more, Ezr. vi. 3. 7th. Here were windows to the little chambers, and windows to the posts and arches, that is, to the cloisters below, and windows round about, ver. 16, to signify the light from heaven with which the church is illuminated. Divine revelation is let into it for instruction, direction, and comfort to those that dwell in God's house; light to work by, light to walk by, light to see themselves and one another by. There were lights to the little chambers; even the least, and least considerable parts and members of the church, shall have light afforded them; "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord." But they are narrow windows, as those in the temple, 1 Kin. vi. 4. The discoveries made to the church on earth are but narrow and scanty compared with what shall be in the future state, when we shall no longer see through a glass darkly. 8th. Divers courts are here spoken of, an outermost of all, then an outer court, then an inner, and then the innermost of all, into which the priests only entered, which some think may put us in mind 'of the diversities of gifts, and graces, and offices, in the several members of Christ's mystical body here, as also of the several degrees of glory in the courts and mansions of heaven, as there are stars in several spheres, and stars of several magnitudes in the fixed firmament,' Engl. Annot. Some draw nearer to God than others, and have a more intimate acquaintance with Divine things; but to a child of God a day in any of his courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. These courts had porches or piazzas round them, for the shelter of those that attended in them from wind and weather; for when we are in the way of our duty to God we may believe ourselves to be under his special protection; that he will graciously provide for us, nay, that he will himself be to us a covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. iv. 5, 6. 9th. On the posts were palm-trees engraven, ver. 16, to signify that the righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree in the courts of God's house, Ps. xcii. 12. The more they are depressed with the burthen of affliction the more strongly do they grow, as they say of the palm-tree. It likewise intimates the saints' victory and triumph over their spiritual enemies. They have palms in their hands, Rev. vii. 4; but, lest they should drop these, or have them snatched out of their hands, they are here engraven upon the posts of the temple, as perpetual monuments of their honour; "Thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph." Nay, believers shall themselves be made pillars in the temple of our God, and shall go no more out, and shall have his name engraven on them, which will be their brightest ornament and honour, Rev. iii. 12. 10th. Notice is here taken of the pavement of the court, ver. 17, 18. The word intimates that the pavement was made of porphyry stone, which was of the colour of burning coals; for the brightest and most sparkling glories of this world should be put and kept under our feet when we draw near to God, and are attending upon him. The stars are, as it were, the burning coals, or stones of a fiery colour, with which the pavement of God's celestial temple is laid; and if the pavement of the court be so bright and glittering, how glorious must we conclude the mansions of that house to be!

2. The gates that looked towards the north, ver. 20, and towards the south, ver. 24, with their appurtenances, are much the same with that towards the east, after the measure of the first gate, ver. 21. But the description is repeated very particularly. And thus largely was the structure of the tabernacle related in Exodus, and of the temple, in the books of the Kings and Chronicles, to signify the special notice God doth take, and his ministers should take, of all that belong to his church. His delight is in them, his eye is upon them; he knows all that are his, all his living temples, and all that belongs to them. Observe, 1st. This temple had not only a gate toward the east, to let into it the children of the east, that were famous for their wealth and wisdom; but it had a gate to the north, and another to the south, for the admission of the poorer and less civilized nations. The New Jerusalem has twelve gates, three towards each quarter of the world, Rev. xxi. 13; for many shall come from all parts to sit down there, Mat. viii. 11. 2nd. To those gates they went up by seven steps, ver. 22—26, which, as some observe, may remind us of the necessity of advancing in grace and holiness, adding one grace to another, going from step to step, from strength to strength, still pressing forwards towards perfection—upwards, upwards towards heaven, the temple above.

27 And there was a gate in the inner court toward the south: and he measured from gate to gate toward the south an hundred cubits. 28 And he brought me to the inner court by the south gate: and he measured the south gate according to these measures; 29 And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, according to these measures: and there were windows in it and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 30 And the arches round about were five and twenty cubits long, and five cubits broad. 31 And the arches thereof were toward the utter court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof: and the going up to it had eight steps. 32 And he brought me into the inner court toward the east: and he measured the gate according to these measures. 33 And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, were according to these measures: and there were windows therein and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 34 And the arches thereof were toward the outward court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 35 And he brought me to the north gate, and measured it according to these measures; 36 The little chambers thereof, the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, and the windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 37 And the posts thereof were toward the utter court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 38 And the chambers and the entries thereof were by the posts of the gates, where they washed the burnt offering.

In these verses we have a delineation of the "inner court." The survey of the outer court ended with the south side of it; this of the inner court begins with the south side, ver. 27, proceeds to the east, ver. 32, and so to the north, ver. 35, for there is no gate, either of the outer or inner court, towards the west. It should seem that in Solomon's temple there were gates westward, for we find porters towards the west, 1 Chr. ix. 24; xxvi. 18; but Josephus saith that in the second temple there was no gate on the west side. Observe,

First. These gates into the inner court were exactly uniform with those into the outer court; the dimensions the same, the chambers adjoining the same, and the galleries or rows round the court the same, the very engraving on the posts the same. The work of grace and its workings are the same, for substance, in grown Christians that they are in young beginners, only that the former are got so much nearer their perfection. The faith of all the saints is alike precious, though it be not alike strong. There is a great resemblance between one child of God and another; for "all they are brethren," and bear the same image.

Secondly. The ascent into the outer court at each gate was by seven steps, but the ascent into the inner court at each gate was by eight steps. This is expressly taken notice of, ver. 31, 34, 37, to signify that the nearer we approach to God the more we should rise above this world and the things of it. The people that worshipped in the outer court must rise seven steps above other people, but the priests that attended in the inner court must rise eight steps above them, must exceed them at least one step more than they exceed other people.

39 And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, to slay thereon the burnt offering and the sin offering and the trespass offering. 40 And at the side without, as one goeth up to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the porch of the gate, were two tables. 41 Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate; eight tables, whereupon they slew their sacrifices. 42 And the four tables were of hewn stone for the burnt offering, of a cubit and an half long, and a cubit and an half broad, and one cubit high: whereupon also they laid the instruments wherewith they slew the burnt offering and the sacrifice. 43 And within were hooks, an hand broad, fastened round about: and upon the tables was the flesh of the offering. 44 And without the inner gate were the chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south: one at the side of the east gate having the prospect toward the north. 45 And he said unto me, This chamber, whose prospect is toward the south, is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the house. 46 And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the altar: these are the sons of Zadok among the sons of Levi, which come near to the LORD to minister unto him. 47 So he measured the court, an hundred cubits long, and an hundred cubits broad, foursquare; and the altar that was before the house. 48 And he brought me to the porch of the house, and measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side: and the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side. 49 The length of the porch was twenty cubits, and the breadth eleven cubits; and he brought me by the steps whereby they went up to it: and there were pillars by the posts, one on this side, and another on that side.

In these verses we have an account,

First. Of the tables that were in the porch of the gates of the "inner court." We find no description of the altars of burnt offerings in the midst of that court till ch. xliii. 13. But, because the one altar under the law was to be exchanged for a multitude of tables under the Gospel, here is early notice taken of the tables at our entrance into the inner court; for till we come to partake of the table of the Lord we are but professors at large; our admission to that is our entrance into the inner court. But in this gospel temple we meet with no altar, till after the glory of the Lord has taken possession of it, for Christ is our altar, that sanctifies every gift. Here were eight tables provided, whereon to slay the sacrifices, ver. 41. We read not of any tables for this purpose, either in the tabernacle or in Solomon's temple; but here they are provided to intimate the multitude of spiritual sacrifices that should be brought to God's house in gospel times, and the multitude of hands that should be employed in offering up those sacrifices. Here were the shambles for the altar; here were the dressers on which they laid the flesh of the sacrifice, the knives with which they cut it up, and the hooks on which they hung it up, that it might be ready to be offered on the altar, ver. 43, and there also they washed the burnt offerings, ver. 38; to intimate that, before we draw near to God's altar, we must have every thing in readiness, must wash our hands, our hearts, those spiritual sacrifices, and so compass God's altar.

Secondly. The use that some of the chambers mentioned before were put to. 1. Some were for the singers, ver. 44. It should seem they were first provided for before any other that attended this temple service, to intimate not only that singing of psalms should still continue a gospel ordinance, but that the Gospel should furnish all that embrace it with abundant matter for joy and praise, and give them occasion to break forth into singing, which is often foretold concerning gospel times, Ps. xcvi. 1; xcviii. 1. Christians should be singers; "Blessed are they that dwell in God's house," they will be "still praising him." 2. Others of them were for the priests, both those that kept the charge of the house to cleanse it, and to see that none came into it to pollute it, and to keep it in good repair, ver. 45, and those that kept "the charge of the altar," ver. 46, that "came near to the Lord to minister unto him." God will find convenient lodging for all his servants. Those that do the work of his house shall enjoy the comforts of it.

Thirdly. Of the inner court, the court of the priests, which was fifty yards square, ver. 47. The altar that was "before the house" was placed in the midst of this court, over against the three gates, which, standing in a direct line with the three gates of the outer court, when the gates were set open all the people in the outer court might, through them, be spectators of the service done at the altar. Christ is both our altar and our sacrifice, to whom we must look with an eye of faith in all our approaches to God, and he is salvation in the midst of the earth, Ps. lxxiv. 12, to be looked unto from all quarters.

Fourthly. Of the porch of the house. The temple is called the house emphatically, as if no other house were worthy to be called so. Before this house there was a porch, to teach us not to rush hastily and inconsiderately into the presence of God, but gradually, that is, gravely, and with solemnity, passing first through the outer court, then the inner, then the porch, ere we enter into the house. Between this porch and the altar was a place where the priests used to pray, Joel ii. 17. In the porch, besides the posts on which the doors were hung, there were pillars, probably for state and ornament, like Jachin and Boaz, ("He will establish; in him is strength,") ver. 49. In the gospel church every thing is strong and firm, and every thing ought to be kept in its place, and to be done decently and in order.

CHAPTER XLI.

An account was given of the porch of the house in the close of the foregoing chapter; this brings us to the temple itself, the description of which here given creates much difficulty in the critical expositors, and occasions differences among them. Those must consult them who are nice in their inquiries into the meaning of the particulars of this delineation; it shall suffice us to observe, I. The dimensions of the house: the posts of it, ver. 1; the door, ver. 2; the wall and the side-chambers, ver. 5, 6; the foundations and wall of the chambers, and their doors, ver. 8—11; the house itself, ver. 13. II. The dimensions of the oracle, or most holy place, ver. 3, 4. III. An account of another building over against the separate place, ver. 12—15. IV. The manner of the building of the house, ver. 7, 16, 17. V. The ornaments of the house, ver. 18—20. VI. The altar of incense, and the table, ver. 22. VII. The doors between the temple and the oracle, ver. 23, 26. There is so much difference, both in the terms and in the rules of architecture, between one age and another, one place and another, that it ought not to be any stumblingblock to us that there is so much in these descriptions dark and hard to be understood, about the meaning of which the learned are not agreed. To one not skilled in mathematics the mathematical description of a modern structure would be scarce intelligible; and yet to a common carpenter or mason among the Jews at that time we may suppose all this, in the literal sense of it, was easy enough.

AFTERWARD he brought me to the temple, and measured the posts, six cubits broad on the one side, and six cubits broad on the other side, which was the breadth of the tabernacle. 2 And the breadth of the door was ten cubits; and the sides of the door were five cubits on the one side, and five cubits on the other side: and he measured the length thereof, forty cubits: and the breadth, twenty cubits. 3 Then went he inward, and measured the post of the door, two cubits; and the door, six cubits; and the breadth of the door, seven cubits. 4 So he measured the length thereof, twenty cubits; and the breadth, twenty cubits, before the temple: and he said unto me, This is the most holy place. 5 After he measured the wall of the house, six cubits; and the breadth of every side chamber, four cubits, round about the house on every side. 6 And the side chambers were three, one over another, and thirty in order; and they entered into the wall which was of the house for the side chambers round about, that they might have hold, but they had not hold in the wall of the house. 7 And there was an enlarging, and a winding about still upward to the side chambers: for the winding about of the house went still upward round about the house: therefore the breadth of the house was still upward, and so increased from the lowest chamber to the highest by the midst. 8 I saw also the height of the house round about: the foundations of the side chambers were a full reed of six great cubits. 9 The thickness of the wall, which was for the side chamber without, was five cubits: and that which was left was the place of the side chambers that were within.

10 And between the chambers was the wideness of twenty cubits round about the house on every side. 11 And the doors of the side chambers were toward the place that was left, one door toward the north, and another door toward the south: and the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.

We are still attending a prophet that is under the conduct of an angel, and therefore attend with reverence, though we are often at a loss to know both what this is, and what it is to us. Observe here,

First. After the prophet has observed the courts he was at length brought to the temple, ver. 1. If we diligently attend to the instructions given us in the plainer parts of religion, and profit by them, we shall be led farther into an acquaintance with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. They that are willing to dwell in God's courts shall at length be brought into his temple. Ezekiel was himself a priest, but by the iniquity and calamity of the times was cut short of his birthright privilege of ministering in the temple; but God makes up the loss to him by introducing him into this prophetical, evangelical, celestial temple, and employing him to transmit a description of it to the church, in which he was dignified above all the rest of his order.

Secondly. When our Lord Jesus spoke of the destroying of this temple, which his hearers understood of this second temple at Jerusalem, he spake of the temple of his body, Jno. ii. 19, 21; and with good reason might he speak so ambiguously, when Ezekiel's vision had a joint respect to them both together, including also his mystical body the church, which is called the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15, and all the members of that body, which are living temples, in whom the Spirit dwells.

Thirdly. The very posts of this temple, the doorposts, were as far one from the other, and consequently the door was as wide, as the whole breadth of the tabernacle of Moses, ver. 1, namely, twelve cubits, Ex. xxvi. 16, 22, 25. In comparison with what had been under the law we may say that wide is the gate which leads into the church, the ceremonial law, that wall of partition which had so much straitened the gate, being taken down.

Fourthly. The most holy place was an exact square, twenty cubits each way, ver. 4. For the New Jerusalem is exactly foursquare, Rev. xxi. 16, noting its stability; for we look for a city that cannot be moved.

Fifthly. The upper stories were larger than the lower, ver. 7. The walls of the temple were six cubits thick at the bottom, five in the middle story, and four in the highest, which gave room to enlarge the chambers the higher they went; but care was taken that the timber might have fast hold. Though God builds high, yet he builds firm, yet so as not to weaken one part for the strengthening another; they had hold, but not "in the wall of the house." By this spreading gradually, the side chambers that were on "the height of the house," that is, in the uppermost story of all, were six cubits, whereas the lowest were but four; they gained a cubit every story. The higher we build up ourselves in our most holy faith, the more should our hearts, those living temples, be enlarged.

12 Now the building that was before the separate place at the end toward the west was seventy cubits broad; and the wall of the building was five cubits thick round about, and the length thereof ninety cubits. 13 So he measured the house, an hundred cubits long; and the separate place, and the building, with the walls thereof, an hundred cubits long; 14 Also the breadth of the face of the house, and of the separate place toward the east, an hundred cubits. 15 And he measured the length of the building over against the separate place which was behind it, and the galleries thereof on the one side and on the other side, an hundred cubits, with the inner temple, and the porches of the court; 16 The door posts, and the narrow windows, and the galleries round about on their three stories, over against the door, cieled with wood round about, and from the ground up to the windows, and the windows were covered; 17 To that above the door, even unto the inner house, and without, and by all the wall round about within and without, by measure. 18 And it was made with cherubims and palm trees, so that a palm tree was between a cherub and a cherub; and every cherub had two faces; 19 So that the face of a man was toward the palm tree on the one side, and the face of a young lion toward the palm tree on the other side: it was made through all the house round about. 20 From the ground unto above the door were cherubims and palm trees made, and on the wall of the temple. 21 The posts of the temple were squared, and the face of the sanctuary; the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other. 22 The altar of wood was three cubits high, and the length thereof two cubits; and the corners thereof, and the length thereof, and the walls thereof, were of wood: and he said unto me, This is the table that is before the LORD. 23 And the temple and the sanctuary had two doors. 24 And the doors had two leaves apiece, two turning leaves; two leaves for the one door, and two leaves for the other door. 25 And there were made on them, on the doors of the temple, cherubims and palm trees, like as were made upon the walls; and there were thick planks upon the face of the porch without. 26 And there were narrow windows and palm trees on the one side and on the other side, on the sides of the porch, and upon the side chambers of the house, and thick planks

Here is, First. An account of a building that was before the separate place; that is, before the temple, "at the end towards the west," ver. 12, which is here measured and compared (ver. 13) with the measure of the house, and appears to be of equal dimensions with it. This stood in a court by itself, which is measured, ver. 15, and its galleries or chambers belonging to it, its posts and windows, and the ornaments of them, ver. 15—17. But what use was to be made of this other building we are not told; perhaps in this vision it signified the setting up of a church among the Gentiles, not inferior to the Jewish temple, but of quite another nature, and which should soon supersede it.

Secondly. A description of the ornaments of the temple and the other building. The walls on the inside from top to bottom were adorned with cherubims and palm-trees, placed alternately, as in Solomon's temple, 1 Kin. vi. 29. Each cherub is here said to have two faces, the face of a man towards the palm-tree on one side, and the face of a young lion towards the palm-tree on the other side, ver. 16. These seem to represent the angels, that have more than the wisdom of a man and the courage of a lion; and in both they have an eye to the palms of victory and triumph which are set before them, and which they are sure of in all their conflicts with the powers of darkness. And in the assemblies of the saints angels are in a special manner present, 1 Cor. xi. 10.

Thirdly. A description of the posts of the doors, both of the temple and of the sanctuary. They were squared, ver. 21, not round, like pillars, and "the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other." In the tabernacle, and in Solomon's temple, the door of the sanctuary, or most holy, was narrower than that of the temple, but here it was fully as broad; for in gospel times "the way into the holiest of all is made" more "manifest" than it had been under the Old Testament, Heb. ix. 8, and therefore the door wider. These doors are described, ver. 23, 24. The temple and the sanctuary had each of them their door, and they were two-leaved, folding doors.

Fourthly. We have here the description of the altar of incense, here said to be an "altar of wood," ver. 22. No mention is made of its being overlaid with gold; but sure it was intended to be so, else it would not bear the fire with which the incense was to be burned, unless we will suppose that it served only to put the censers upon. Or else it intimates that the incense to be offered in the gospel temple shall be purely spiritual, and the fire spiritual, which will not consume an altar of wood. Therefore this altar is called a table; "This is the table that is before the Lord." Here, as before, we find the altar turned into a table; for the great sacrifice being now offered, that which we have to do is to feast upon the sacrifice at the Lord's table.

Fifthly. Here is the adorning of the doors and windows with palm-trees, that they might be of a piece with the walls of the house, ver. 25, 26. Thus the living temples are adorned, not with gold, or silver, or costly array, but with "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible."

CHAPTER XLII.

This chapter continues and concludes the describing and measuring of this mystical temple, which it is very hard to understand the particular architecture of, and yet more hard to comprehend the mystical meaning of. Here is, I. A description of the chambers that were about the courts, their situation and structure, ver. 1—13; and the uses for which they were designed, ver. 13, 14. II. A survey of the whole compass of ground which was taken up with the house, and the courts belonging to it, ver. 15—20.

THEN he brought me forth into the utter court, the way toward the north: and he brought me into the chamber that was over against the separate place, and which was before the building toward the north. 2 Before the length of an hundred cubits was the north door, and the breadth was fifty cubits. 3 Over against the twenty cubits which were for the inner court, and over against the pavement which was for the utter court, was gallery against gallery in three stories. 4 And before the chambers was a walk of ten cubits breadth inward, a way of one cubit; and their doors toward the north. 5 Now the upper chambers were shorter: for the galleries were higher than these, than the lower, and than the middlemost of the building. 6 For they were in three stories, but had not pillars as the pillars of the courts: therefore the building was straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground. 7 And the wall that was without over against the chambers, toward the utter court on the forepart of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits. 8 For the length of the chambers that were in the utter court was fifty cubits: and, lo, before the temple were an hundred cubits. 9 And from under these chambers was the entry on the east side, as one goeth into them from the utter court. 10 The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court toward the east, over against the separate place, and over against the building. 11 And the way before them was like the appearance of the chambers which were toward the north, as long as they, and as broad as they: and all their goings out were both according to their fashions, and according to their doors. 12 And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them. 13 Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers, which are before the separate place, they be holy chambers, where the priests that approach unto the LORD shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay the most holy things, and the meat offering, and the sin offering, and the trespass offering; for the place is holy. 14 When the priests enter therein, then shall they not go out of the holy place into the utter court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister; for they are holy; and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to those things which are for the people.

The prophet hath taken a very exact view of the temple and the buildings belonging to it, and is now brought again into the outer court to observe the chambers that were in that square.

First. Here is a description of these chambers, which, as that which went before, seems to us very perplexed and intricate, through our unacquaintedness with the Hebrew language, and the rules of architecture at that time. We shall only observe in general,

1. That about the temple, which was the place of public worship, there were private chambers, to teach us that our attendance upon God in solemn ordinances will not excuse us from the duties of the closet. We must not only worship in the courts of God's house, but must, both before and after our attendance there, enter into our chambers, enter into our closets, and read, and meditate, and "pray to our Father in secret;" and a great deal of comfort the people of God have found in their communion with God in solitude.

2. That these chambers were many. There were three stories of them; and though the higher stories were not so large as the lower, yet they served as well for retirement, ver. 5, 6. There were many, that there might be conveniences for all such people as Anna the prophetess, who "departed not from the temple night or day," Lu. ii. 37. "In my Father's house are many mansions;" in his house on earth there are so. Multitudes by faith have taken lodgings in his sanctuary, and yet there is room.

3. That these chambers, though they were private, yet were near the temple, within view of it, within reach of it, to teach us to prefer public worship before private—"The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and so must we—and to refer our private worship to the public; our religious performances in our chambers must be to prepare us for the exercises of devotion in public, and to further us in our improvement of them, as our opportunities are.

4. That before these chambers there were walks of five yards broad, ver. 4, in which those that had lodgings in these chambers might meet for conversation, might walk and talk together for their mutual edification, might communicate their knowledge and experiences; for we are not to spend all our time between the church and the chamber, though a great deal of time may be spent to very good purpose in both; but man is made for society, and Christians for the communion of saints; and the duties of that communion we must make conscience of, and the privileges and pleasures of that communion we must take the comfort of. It is promised to Joshua, who was high priest in the second temple, that God will "give him places to walk in among them that stand by," Zec. iii. 7.

Secondly. Here is the use of these chambers appointed, ver. 13, 14.

1. They were for the priests that approach unto the Lord, that they may be always near their business, and may not be non-residents. Therefore they are called holy chambers, because they were for the use of them that ministered in holy things, during their ministration. Those that have public work to do for God and the souls of men have need to be much in private, to fit themselves for it. Ministers should spend much time in their chambers, in reading, meditation, and prayer, that their profiting may appear; and they ought to be provided with conveniences for this purpose.

2. There the priests were to deposit the most holy things, that is, those parts of the offerings which fell to their share, and there they were to eat them, they and their families, in a religious manner, for the place is holy; and thus they must make a difference between those feasts upon the sacrifice and other meals.

3. There (among other uses) they were to lay their vestments, which God had appointed them to wear when they ministered at the altar, their linen ephods, coats, girdles, and bonnets. We read of the providing of priest's garments after their return out of captivity, Neh. vii. 70, 72. When they had ended their service at the altar they must lay by those garments, to signify that the use of them should continue only during that dispensation. But they must put on other garments, such as other people wear, when they approached to those things which were for the people; that is, to do that part of their service which related to the people, to teach them the law, and to answer their inquiries. Their holy garments must be laid up, that they may be kept clean and decent for the credit of their service.

15 Now when he had made an end of measuring the inner house, he brought me forth toward the gate whose prospect is toward the east, and measured it round about. 16 He measured the east side with the measuring reed, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about. 17 He measured the north side, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about. 18 He measured the south side, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed. 19 He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds with the measuring reed. 20 He measured it by the four sides: it had a wall round about, five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place.

We have attended the measuring of this mystical temple, and are now to see how far the holy ground on which we tread doth extend; and that also is here measured, and found to take in a great compass. Observe,

First. What the dimensions of it were. It extended each way five hundred reeds, ver. 16—19, each reed above three yards and a half, so that it reached every way about an English measured mile, which, the ground lying square, was above eight miles round. Thus large were the suburbs (as I may call them) of this mystical temple, signifying the great extent of the church in Gospel times, when all nations should be discipled, and the kingdoms of the world made Christ's kingdoms. Room should be made in God's courts for the numerous forces of the Gentiles that shall flow into them, as was foretold, Isa. xlix. 18; lx. 4. It is in part fulfilled already in the accession of the Gentiles to the church; and we trust it shall have a more full accomplishment when the "fulness of the Gentiles shall come in," and "all Israel shall be saved."

Secondly. Why the dimensions of it were made thus large. It was to make a separation, by putting a very large distance between the sanctuary and the profane place; and therefore there was a wall surrounding it, to keep off those that were unclean, and to separate between the precious and the vile. Note,

A difference is to be put between common and sacred things; between God's name and other names, between his day and other days, his book and other books, his institutions and other observances; and a distance to be put between our worldly and religious actions, so as still to go about the worship of God with a solemn pause.

CHAPTER XLIII.

The prophet having given us a view of the mystical temple, the gospel church, as he received it from the Lord, that it might appear not to be erected in vain, comes to describe in this and the next chapter the worship that should be performed in it, but under the type of the old services. In this chapter we have, I. Possession taken of this temple, by the glory of God filling it, ver. 1—6. II. A promise given of the continuance of God's presence with his people, upon condition of their return to, and continuance in, the instituted way of his worship, and their abandoning of idols and idolatry, ver. 7—12. III. A description of the altar of burnt offerings, ver. 13—17. IV. Directions given for the consecration of that altar, ver, 18—27. And Ezekiel seems here to stand between God and Israel, as Moses, the servant of the Lord, did, when the sanctuary was first set up.

AFTERWARD he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east: 2 And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters: and the earth shined with his glory. 3 And it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw, even according to the vision that I saw when I came to destroy the city: and the visions were like the vision that I saw by the river Chebar; and I fell upon my face. 4 And the glory of the LORD came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. 5 So the spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and, behold, the glory of the LORD filled the house. 6 And I heard him speaking unto me out of the house; and the man stood by me.

After Ezekiel had patiently surveyed the temple of God, the greatest glory of this earth, he is admitted to a higher form, and honoured with a sight of the glories of the upper world; it is said to him, Come up hither. He hath seen the temple, and sees it to be very spacious and splendid; but till the glory of God comes into it it, is but like the dead bodies he had seen in vision, ch. xxxvii., that had no breath till the spirit of life entered into them. Here therefore he sees the house filled with God's glory.

First. He has a vision of the glory of God; ver. 2, "The glory of the God of Israel," that God who is in covenant with Israel, and whom they serve and worship. The idols of the heathen have no glory but what they owe to the goldsmith or the painter; but this is the glory of the God of Israel. This glory came from the way of the east, and therefore he was brought to the gate that leads towards the east, to expect the appearance and approach of it. Christ's star was seen in the east, and he is that other Angel that ascendeth out of the east, Rev. vii. 2; for he is the Morning Star, he is the Sun of Righteousness. Two things he observed in this appearance of the glory of God. 1. The power of his word which he heard. His voice was like a noise of many waters, which is heard very far, and makes impressions; the noise of purling streams is grateful, of a roaring sea dreadful, Rev. i. 15; xiv. 2. Christ's Gospel, in the glory of which he shines, was to be proclaimed aloud, the report of it to be heard far; to some it is a savour of life, to others of death, according as they are. 2. The brightness of his appearance which he saw; "The earth shined with his glory;" for God is light, and none can bear the lustre of his light, none hath seen or can see it. Note, That glory of God which shines in the church shines on the world. When God appeared for David, "the brightness that was before him" dispersed the clouds, Ps. xviii. 12.

This appearance of the glory of God to Ezekiel here he observed to be the same with the vision he saw when he first received his commission, ch. i. 4; according to that by the river Chebar, ver. 3. Because God is the same he was pleased to manifest himself in the same manner, for with him is no variableness. It was the same (saith he) with that which I saw when I came to destroy the city, that is, to foretell the city's destruction; which he did with such authority and efficacy, and the event did so certainly answer the prediction, that he might be said to destroy it. As a judge, in God's name, he passed his sentence upon it, which was soon executed. God appeared in the same manner when he sent him to speak words of terror, and when he sent him to speak words of comfort; for in both God is and will be glorified. "He kills and he makes alive," he "wounds and he heals," Deu. xxxii. 39. To the same hand that destroyed we must look for deliverance; "he hath smitten, and he will bind up." Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'The same hand inflicted the wound and healed it.'

Secondly. He has a vision of the entrance of this glory into the temple. When he saw this glory he fell upon his face, ver. 3, as not able to bear the lustre of God's glory, or rather, as one willing to give him the glory of it by an humble and reverend adoration; but the Spirit took him up, ver. 5, when the glory of the Lord was come into the house, ver. 4, that he might see how the house was filled with it. He saw how the glory of the Lord, in this same appearance, departed from the temple, because it was profaned, to his great grief; now he shall see it return to the temple, to his great satisfaction: see ch. x. 18, 19; xi. 23. Note, Though God may forsake his people for a small moment, he will return with everlasting loving-kindness. God's glory filled the house as it had filled the tabernacle which Moses set up, and the temple of Solomon, Ex. xl. 34; 1 Kin. viii. 10. Now we do not find that ever the Shechinah did in that manner take possession of the second temple, and therefore this was to have its accomplishment in that glory of the Divine grace which shines so bright in the gospel church, and fills it. Here is no mention of a cloud filling the house as formerly, for we now "with open face behold the glory of the Lord," in the face of Christ, and not as of old through the cloud of types.

Thirdly. He receives instructions more immediately from the glory of the Lord, as Moses did when God had taken possession of the tabernacle, Lev. i. 1; "I heard him speaking to me out of the house," ver. 6. God's glory shining in the church, we must from thence expect to receive Divine oracles. "The man stood by me;" we could not bear to hear the voice of God, any more than to see the face of God, if Jesus Christ did not stand by us as Mediator. Or, if this was a created angel, it is observable that when God began to speak to Ezekiel, he stood by, and gave way, having no more to say. Nay, he stood by the prophet, as a learner with him; for to the principalities and powers, to the angels themselves, who desire to look into these things, "is known by the church the manifold wisdom of God," Eph. iii. 10. The man stood by him to conduct him thither where he might receive farther discoveries, ch. xliv. 1.

7 And he said unto me,
Son of man, [feet,
The place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my
Where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, [defile,
And my holy name, shall the house of Israel no more
Neither they, nor their kings, by their whoredom,
Nor by the carcases of their kings in their high places.
8 In their setting of their threshold by my thresholds,
And their post by my posts,
And the wall between me and them,
They have even defiled my holy name
By their abominations that they have committed:
Wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger.
9 Now let them put away their whoredom,
And the carcases of their kings, far from me,
And I will dwell in the midst of them for ever.
10 Thou son of man, shew the house to the house of Israel,
That they may be ashamed of their iniquities:
And let them measure the pattern.
11 And if they be ashamed of all that they have done,
Shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof,
And the goings out thereof, and the comings in thereof,
And all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof,
And all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof:
And write it in their sight,
That they may keep the whole form thereof,
And all the ordinances thereof, and do them.
12 This is the law of the house; Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house.

God doth here, in effect, renew his covenant with his people Israel, upon his retaking possession of the house; and Ezekiel negotiates the matter, as Moses formerly. This would be of great use to the captives at their return, both for direction and encouragement. But look farther, to those that are blessed with the privileges of the gospel temple, that they may understand how they are before him on their good behaviour.

First. God, by the prophet, puts them in mind of their former provocations, for which they had long lain under the tokens of his displeasure. This conviction is spoken to them to make way for the comforts designed them. Though God gives and upbraids not, it becomes us, when he forgives, to upbraid ourselves with our unworthy carriage towards him. Let them now remember, therefore, 1. That they had formerly "defiled God's holy name," had profaned and abused all those sacred things by which he had made himself known among them, ver. 7. They and their kings had brought contempt on the religion they professed, and their relation to God, by their spiritual whoredom, their idolatry, and by worshipping images, which they called their kings, for so Moloch signifies—or lords, for so Baal signifies—but were really the carcases of kings, not only lifeless and useless, but loathsome and abominable, as dead carcases, in their high places, set up in honour of them. They had defiled God's name by their abominations. And what were they? It was "in setting their threshold by my thresholds, and their post by my posts," that is, adding their own inventions to God's institutions, and urging all to a compliance with them, as if they had been of equal authority and efficacy, "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men," Isa. xxix. 13. Or, rather, setting up altars to their idols even in the courts of the temple, than which a more impudent affront could not be put upon the Divine majesty. Thus they set up a separation wall between him and them, which stopped the current of his favours to them, and spoiled the acceptableness of their services to him. See what an indignity sinners do to God, setting up their walls in opposition to his, and thrusting him out from what is his right. And see what injury they do to themselves, for the nearer any come to God with their sins, the farther they set him at a distance from them. Some give this sense of it: Though their houses joined close to God's house, their posts and thresholds to his, so that they were in a manner his next neighbours, ("There was but a wall between me and them," so it is in the margin,) so that it might have been expected they should have acquainted themselves with him, and been in care to please him, yet they were not so much as neighbourly. Note, It often proves too true, 'The nearer the church the farther from God.' They were by profession in covenant with God, and yet they had "defiled the place of his throne," and of the soles of his feet; that is, his temple, where he did both reside and reign. Jerusalem is called the "city of the great King," Ps. xlviii. 2; and his footstool, Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7. Note, When God's ordinances are profaned his holy name is polluted. 2. That for this God had had a controversy with them in their late troubles. They could not condemn him, for he had but brought upon them the desert of their sins; "Wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger." Note, Those that pollute God's holy name fall under his just displeasure.

Secondly. He calls upon them to repent and reform, and, in order to that, to be ashamed of their iniquities; ver. 9, "Now let them put away their whoredom." Now they have smarted so severely for it, and now God is returning in mercy to them, and setting up his sanctuary again in the midst of them, now let them cast away their idols, and have no more to do with them, that they may not again forfeit the privileges which they have been taught to know the worth of by the want of. Let them put away their idols, those lothhsome "carcases of their kings, far from me," from being a provocation to me. This was seasonable counsel now the prophet had the platform of the temple to set before them; for, 1. If they see that platform they will surely be ashamed of their sins, ver. 10; when they see what mercy God has in store for them, notwithstanding their utter unworthiness of it, they will be ashamed to think of their disingenuous carriage towards him. Note, The goodness of God to us should lead us to repentance, especially to a penitential shame. Let them measure the pattern themselves, and see how much it exceeds the former pattern, and guess by that what great things God has in store for them, and surely it will put them out of countenance to think what the desert of their sins was. And then, 2. If they be ashamed of their sins, they shall surely see more of the platform, ver. 11; if they be ashamed of all that they have done, upon a general view of the goodness of God, let them have a more distinct, particular account of it. Note, Those that improve what they see and know of the goodness of God shall see and know more of it. And then, and not till then, we are qualified for God's favours, when we are truly humbled for our own follies. "Shew them the form of the house," let them see what a stately structure it will be, and withal shew them the ordinances and laws of it. Note, With the foresights of our comforts it is fit we should get the knowledge of our duty; with the privileges of God's house we must acquaint ourselves with the rules of it. Shew them these ordinances that they may keep them and do them. Note, Therefore we are made to know our duty, that we may do it, and be blessed in our deed.

Thirdly. He promiseth that they shall be such as they should be, and then he will be to them such as they would have him to be, ver. 7. 1. The house of Israel "shall no more defile my holy name." This is pure gospel. The precept of the law saith, You must not defile my name. The grace of the Gospel saith, You shall not. Thus what is required in the covenant is promised in the covenant, Jer. xxxii. 40. 2. Then "I will dwell in the midst of them for ever," and the same again, ver. 9. God secures to us his good-will by confirming in us his good work. If we do not defile his name we may be sure he will not depart from us.

Fourthly. The general law of God's house is laid down, ver. 12: that, whereas formerly only the chancel or sanctuary was most holy, now the whole mountain of the house shall be so; the whole limit thereof, including all the courts, and all the chambers, shall be as the most holy place; signifying that in gospel times, 1. The whole church shall have the privilege of the holy of holies, that of a near access to God. All believers have now, under the Gospel, "boldness to enter into the holiest," Heb. x. 19, with this advantage, that whereas the high priest entered in the virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, we enter in the virtue of the blood of Jesus, and wherever we are we have through him access to the Father. 2. The whole church shall be under a mighty obligation to press towards the perfection of holiness, as he who hath called us is holy. All must now be "most holy." Holiness becomes God's house for ever, and in gospel times more than ever. Behold, this is the law of the house, let none expect the protection of it who will not submit to this law.

13 And these are the measures of the altar after the cubits: The cubit is a cubit and an hand breadth; even the bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and the border thereof by the edge thereof round about shall be a span: and this shall be the higher place of the altar. 14 And from the bottom upon the ground even to the lower settle shall be two cubits, and the breadth one cubit; and from the lesser settle even to the greater settle shall be four cubits, and the breadth one cubit. 15 So the altar shall be four cubits; and from the altar and upward shall be four horns. 16 And the altar shall be twelve cubits long, twelve broad, square in the four squares thereof. 17 And the settle shall be fourteen cubits long and fourteen broad in the four squares thereof; and the border about it shall be half a cubit; and the bottom thereof shall be a cubit about; and his stairs shall look toward the east. 18 And he said unto me, Son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD; These are the ordinances of the altar in the day when they shall make it, to offer burnt offerings thereon, and to sprinkle blood thereon. 19 And thou shalt give to the priests the Levites that be of the seed of Zadok, which approach unto me, to minister unto me, saith the Lord GOD, a young bullock for a sin offering. 20 And thou shalt take of the blood thereof, and put it on the four horns of it, and on the four corners of the settle, and upon the border round about: thus shalt thou cleanse and purge it. 21 Thou shalt take the bullock also of the sin offering, and he shall burn it in the appointed place of the house, without the sanctuary. 22 And on the second day thou shalt offer a kid of the goats without blemish for a sin offering; and they shall cleanse the altar, as they did cleanse it with the bullock. 23 When thou hast made an end of cleansing it, thou shalt offer a young bullock without blemish, and a ram out of the flock without blemish. 24 And thou shalt offer them before the LORD, and the priests shall cast salt upon them, and they shall offer them up for a burnt offering unto the LORD. 25 Seven days shalt thou prepare every day a goat for a sin offering: they shall also prepare a young bullock, and a ram out of the flock, without blemish. 26 Seven days shall they purge the altar and purify it; and they shall consecrate themselves. 27 And when these days are expired, it shall be, that upon the eighth day, and so forward, the priests shall make your burnt offerings upon the altar, and your peace offerings; and I will accept you, saith the Lord GOD.

This is concerning the altar in this mystical temple; and that is mystical too, for Christ is our altar. The Jews, after their return out of captivity, had an altar long before they had a temple, Ezr. iii. 3; but this was an altar in the temple. Now here we have,

First. The measures of the altar, ver. 13. It was six yards square at the top, and seven yards square at the bottom; it was four yards and a half high. It had a lower bench or shelf, here called a settle, a yard from the ground, on which some of the priests stood to minister; and another two yards above that, on which others of them stood; and these were each of them half a yard broad, and had ledges on either side, that they might stand firm upon them. The sacrifices were killed at the table, spoken of before, ch. xl. 39. What was to be burnt on the altar was given up to those on the lower bench, and handed by them to those on the higher, and they laid it on the altar. Thus, in the service of God, we must be assistant to one another.

Secondly. The ordinances of the altar. Directions are here given,

1. Concerning the dedication of the altar at first. Seven days were to be spent in the dedication of it, and every day sacrifices were to be offered upon it, and particularly a goat for a sin offering, ver. 25; besides a young bullock for a sin offering on the first day, ver. 19; which teacheth us, in all our religious services, to have an eye to Christ, the great sin offering. Neither our persons nor our performances can be acceptable to God unless sin be taken away; and that cannot be taken away but by the blood of Christ, which both sanctifies the altar, (for Christ entered by his own blood, Heb. ix. 12,) and the gift upon the altar. There were also to be a bullock and a ram offered for a burnt offering, ver. 24, which was intended purely for the glory of God, to teach us to have an eye to that in all our services. We present ourselves as living sacrifices, and our devotions as spiritual sacrifices, that we and they may be to him for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory. The dedication of the altar is here called the cleansing and purging of it, ver. 20, 26. Christ our altar, though he had no pollution to be cleansed from, yet sanctified himself, Jno. xvii. 19; and when we consecrate the altars of our hearts to God, to have the fire of holy love always burning upon them, we must see that they be purified and cleansed from the love of the world and the lusts of the flesh. It is observable that there are several differences between the rites of dedication here and those which were appointed, Ex. xxix., to intimate that the ceremonial institutions were mutable things, and the changes in them were earnests of their period in Christ. Only here, according to the general law, that all the sacrifices must be seasoned with salt, Lev. ii. 13, particular orders are given, ver. 24, that the priests shall cast salt upon the sacrifices. Grace is the salt with which all our religious performances must be seasoned, Col. iv. 6. An everlasting covenant is called a covenant of salt, because it is incorruptible. The glory reserved for us is incorruptible and undefiled; and the grace wrought in us is the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible.

2. Concerning the constant use that should be made of it when it was dedicated. From henceforward the priests shall make their burnt offerings and peace offerings upon this altar, ver. 27; for therefore it was sanctified, that it might sanctify the gift that was offered upon it.

Thirdly. Observe farther, 1. Who were to serve at the altar; the priests "of the seed of Zadok," ver. 19. That family was substituted in the room of Abiathar by Solomon, and God confirms it. His name signifies righteous, for they are the righteous seed that are priests to God through Christ, "the Lord our righteousness." 2. How they should prepare for this service; ver. 26, "They shall consecrate themselves;" shall fill their hand with the offerings, in token of the giving up of themselves with their offerings to God, and to his service. Note, Before we minister to the Lord in holy things we must consecrate ourselves by getting our hands and hearts filled with those things. 3. How they should speed in it; ver. 27, "I will accept you;" and if God now accept our works, if our services be pleasing to him, it is enough, we need no more. Those that give themselves to God shall be accepted of God, their persons first, and then their performances, through the Mediator.

CHAPTER XLIV.

In this chapter we have, I. The appropriating of the east gate of the temple to the prince, ver. 1—3. II. A reproof sent to the house of Israel for their former profanations of God's sanctuary, with a charge to them to be more strict for the future, ver. 4—9. III. The degrading of those Levites who had formerly been guilty of idolatry, and the establishing of the priesthood in the family of Zadok, which had kept their integrity, ver. 10—16. IV. Divers laws and ordinances concerning the priests, ver. 17—31.

THEN he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary which looketh toward the east; and it was shut. 2 Then said the LORD unto me; This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the LORD, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. 3 It is for the prince; the prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the LORD; he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same.

The prophet is here brought to review what he had before once surveyed; for, though we have often looked into the things of God, they will yet bear to be looked over again, such a copiousness there is in them. The lessons we have learned we should still repeat to ourselves. Every time we review the sacred fabric of holy things, which we have in the Scriptures, we shall still find something new which we did not before take notice of. The prophet is brought a third time to the east gate, and finds it shut, which intimates that the rest of the gates were open at all times to the worshippers. But such an account is given of this gate being shut as puts honour,

First. Upon the God of Israel. It is for the honour of him that the gate of the inner court, at which his glory entered when he took possession of the house, was ever after kept shut, and no man was allowed to enter in by it, ver. 2. The difference ever after made between this and the other gates, that this was shut when the others were open, was intended both to perpetuate the remembrance of the solemn entrance of the glory of the Lord into the house, which it would remain a traditional evidence of the truth of, and also to possess the minds of people with a reverence for the Divine majesty, and with very awful thoughts of his transcendent glory, which was designed in God's charge to Moses at the bush, "Put off thy shoe from off thy foot." God will have a way by himself.

Secondly. Upon the prince of Israel, ver. 2. It is an honour to him that though he may not enter in by this gate, for no man may, yet, 1. He shall sit in this gate, to eat his share of the peace offerings, that sacred food, before the Lord. 2. He shall "enter by the way of the porch of that gate," by some little door or wicket, either in the gate or adjoining to it, which is called "the way of the porch." This was to signify that God put some of his glory upon magistrates, upon the princes of his people, for he hath said, Ye are gods. Some, by the prince, here understand the high priest, or the sagan, or second priest; and that he only was allowed to enter by this gate, for he was God's representative. Christ is the high priest of our profession, who entered himself into the holy place, and "opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers."

4 Then brought he me the way of the north gate before the house: and I looked, and, behold, the glory of the LORD filled the house of the LORD: and I fell upon my face. 5 And the LORD said unto me, Son of man, mark well, and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee concerning all the ordinances of the house of the LORD, and all the laws thereof; and mark well the entering in of the house, with every going forth of the sanctuary. 6 And thou shalt say to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; O ye house of Israel, let it suffice you of all your abominations, 7 In that ye have brought into my sanctuary strangers, uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary, to pollute it, even my house, when ye offer my bread, the fat and the blood, and they have broken my covenant because of all your abominations. 8 And ye have not kept the charge of mine holy things: but ye have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves. 9 Thus saith the Lord GOD; No stranger, uncircumcised in heart, nor uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any stranger that is among the children of Israel.

This is much to the same purpose with what we had in the beginning of ch. xliii.; as the prophet must look again upon what he had before seen, so he must be told again what he had before heard. Here, as before, he sees the house filled with "the glory of the Lord," which strikes an awe upon him, so that he falls prostrate at the sight, the humblest posture of adoration, and the expression of a holy awe; "I fell upon my face," ver. 4. Note, The more we see of the glory of God the more low we shall lie in our own eyes. Now here,

First. God chargeth the prophet to take a very particular notice of all he saw, and all that was said to him; ver. 5, "Mark well;" set thine heart, apply thy mind to the discoveries now made to thee. 1. "Behold with thine eyes" what is shewed thee, particularly the entering in of the house, and every going forth of it, all the inlets and all the outlets of the sanctuary; those he must take special notice of. Note, In acquainting ourselves with Divine things we must not aim so much at an abstract speculation of the things themselves as at finding the plain appointed way of converse and communion with those things, that we may go in and out and find pasture. 2. "Hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee," about the laws and "ordinances of the house," which he was to instruct the people in. Note, Those who are appointed to be teachers have need to be very diligent, careful learners, that they may neither forget any of the things they are intrusted with nor mistake concerning them.

Secondly. He sends him upon an errand to the people, "to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel," ver. 6. It is sad to think that the house of Israel should deserve this character from him who perfectly knew them, that a people in covenant with God should be rebellious against him. Who are his subjects, if the house of Israel be rebels? But it is an instance of God's rich mercy, that though they had been rebellious, yet, being the house of Israel, he doth not cast them off, but sends an ambassador to them, to invite and encourage them to return to their allegiance, which he would not have done if he had been pleased to kill them. The whole race of mankind is fallen under the character here given of the house of Israel; but our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, received gifts for men, "yea, even for the rebellious also," that, as here, "the Lord God might dwell among them," Ps. lxviii. 18.

1. He must tell them of their faults, must shew them their rebellions, must shew the house of Jacob their sins. Note, Those who are sent to comfort God's people must first convince them, and so prepare them for comfort; "Let it suffice you of all your abominations," ver. 6. Note, It is time for those who have continued long in sin to reckon it long enough, and too long, and to begin to think of taking up in time, and leaving off their evil courses. Let the time past of your life suffice; for by this time sure you have surfeited upon your abominations, and are become sick of them, 1 Pet. iv. 3. That which is here charged upon them is,

1st. That they had admitted those to the privileges of the sanctuary who were not entitled to them; whereas God had said, "The stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death." They had not only connived at the intrusion of strangers into the sanctuary, but had themselves introduced them; ver. 7, "You brought in strangers uncircumcised in flesh," and therefore under a legal incapacity to enter into the sanctuary, which was a breaking off the covenant of circumcision, throwing down the hedge of their peculiarity, and laying themselves in common with the rest of the world. Yet if these strangers had been devout and good, though they were not circumcised, the crime had not been so great; but they were "uncircumcised in heart" too, unhumbled, unreformed, and strangers indeed to God and all goodness. When they came to offer sacrifice they brought these with them to feast with them upon the sacrifice, because they were fond of their company; and this was one of their abominations wherewith they polluted God's sanctuary; it was "giving that which was holy unto dogs," Mat. vii. 6. Note, The admission of those who are openly wicked and profane to special ordinances is a polluting of God's sanctuary, and a great provocation to him.

2nd. That they had employed those in the service of the sanctuary who were not fit for it. Though none but priests and Levites were to minister in the sanctuary, yet we may suppose that all that were priests and Levites did not immediately attend there, but chosen men of them who were best qualified, that were more wise and serious and conscientious, and most likely to keep the charge of the holy things carefully; but in making this choice they had not regard to merit and qualification for the work, but "Ye have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves," such as you had some favour or affection for, such as you either had got or hoped to get money by, or such as would comply with your humours, and would dispense with the laws of the sanctuary to please you. Thus you "have not kept the charge of my holy things." Note, Those who have the choice of the keepers of the holy things, if to serve some secular, selfish purpose they choose such as are unfit and unfaithful, will justly have it laid at their door that they have betrayed the holy things, by lodging them in ill hands.

2. He must tell them their duty; ver. 9, "No stranger shall enter into my sanctuary" till he has first submitted to the laws of it; but, lest any should think this excluded the penitent, believing Gentiles from the church, the stranger here is described to be one that is "uncircumcised in heart," not in sincerity consenting to the covenant, nor putting away the filth of the flesh; whereas the believing Gentiles were "circumcised with the circumcision made without hands," Col. ii. 11. This circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter, was what the unbelieving Jews were strangers to, and unconcerned about, while yet they were zealous to keep out of the sanctuary uncircumcised Gentiles; witness their rage against Paul when they did but suspect him to have brought Greeks into the temple, Acts xxi. 28.

10 And the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray, which went astray away from me after their idols; they shall even bear their iniquity. 11 Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, having charge at the gates of the house, and ministering to the house: they shall slay the burnt offering and the sacrifice for the people, and they shall stand before them to minister unto them. 12 Because they ministered unto them before their idols, and caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity; therefore have I lifted up mine hand against them, saith the Lord GOD, and they shall bear their iniquity. 13 And they shall not come near unto me, to do the office of a priest unto me, nor to come near to any of my holy things, in the most holy place: but they shall bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed. 14 But I will make them keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein. 15 But the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and they shall stand before me to offer unto me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord GOD: 16 They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near to my table, to minister unto me, and they shall keep my charge.

The Master of the house, being about to set up house again, takes account of his servants the priests, and sees who are fit to be turned out of their places, and who to be kept in, and takes a course with them accordingly.

First. Those who had been treacherous are degraded and put lower. Those Levites or priests, that were carried down the stream of the apostacy of Israel formerly, that "went astray from God after their idols," ver. 10, that had complied with the idolatrous kings of Israel or Judah, that ministered to them before their idols, ver. 12, bowed with them in the house of Rimmon, or set up altars for them, as Uriah did for Ahaz, and so "caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity," led them to sin, and hardened them in sin,—for if priests go astray many will follow their pernicious ways; perhaps in Babylon some of the Jewish priests had complied with the idolaters of the place, to the great scandal of their religion,—now these priests, who had thus prevaricated, were justly put under the marks of God's displeasure; or, if they were dead, (as it is likely they were, if the crime were committed before the captivity,) the iniquity was visited upon their children; or perhaps it was the whole family of Abiathar that had been guilty of this trespass, which was now called to account for it. And,

1. They are sentenced to be deprived in part of their office, and from the dignity of priests are put down into the condition of ordinary Levites. God hath lifted up his hand against them, hath said it and sworn it, that "they shall bear their iniquity," ver. 12; assuredly they shall suffer for it—shall suffer disgrace for it. "They shall bear their shame," ver. 13; for though they have (we charitably hope) repented of it, yet they "shall not come near to do the office of a priest," that is, those parts of the office that were peculiar to them; they shall not come near to any of the holy things within the sanctuary, ver. 13. Note, Those who have robbed God of his honour will justly be deprived of their honour. And it is really a great punishment to be forbidden to come near to God; and justly might they who have once gone away from him be rejected, as unworthy ever to come near to him, and put at an everlasting distance.

2. Yet there is a mixture of mercy in this sentence. God deals not in severity, as he might have done, with those who had dealt treacherously with him, but mitigates the sentence, ver. 11, 14. They are deprived but in part ab officio,—'of their office,' and, it should seem, not at all a beneficio,—of their emoluments.' They shall help to slay the sacrifice, which the Levites were permitted to do, and which in this temple was done, not at the altar, but at the tables, ch. xl. 39. They shall be porters at the gates of the house, and they shall be "keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof." Note, Those who may not be fit to be employed in one kind of service may yet be fit to be employed in another; and even those that have offended may yet be made use of, and not quite thrown aside, much less thrown away.

Secondly. Those who had been faithful are honoured and established, ver. 15, 16. These are remarkably distinguished from the other; but "the sons of Zadok," that kept their integrity in a time of general apostacy, that went not astray when others did, "they shall come near to me, shall come near to my table." Note, God will put marks of honour upon those that give proofs of their fidelity and constancy to him in shaking, trying times, and will employ those in his service who have kept close to his service when others deserted it and drew back. And it ought to be reckoned a true and great reward of stability of duty to be established in it. If we keep close to God God will keep us close to him.

17 And it shall come to pass, that when they enter in at the gates of the inner court, they shall be clothed with linen garments; and no wool shall come upon them, whiles they minister in the gates of the inner court, and within. 18 They shall have linen bonnets upon their heads, and shall have linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves with any thing that causeth sweat. 19 And when they go forth into the utter court, even into the utter court to the people, they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered, and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments; and they shall not sanctify the people with their garments. 20 Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads. 21 Neither shall any priest drink wine, when they enter into the inner court. 22 Neither shall they take for their wives a widow, nor her that is put away: but they shall take maidens of the seed of the house of Israel, or a widow that had a priest before. 23 And they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean. 24 And in controversy they shall stand in judgment; and they shall judge it according to my judgments: and they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all mine assemblies; and they shall hallow my sabbaths. 25 And they shall come at no dead person to defile themselves: but for father, or for mother, or for son, or for daughter, for brother, or for sister that hath had no husband, they may defile themselves. 26 And after he is cleansed, they shall reckon unto him seven days. 27 And in the day that he goeth into the sanctuary, unto the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer his sin offering, saith the Lord GOD. 28 And it shall be unto them for an inheritance: I am their inheritance: and ye shall give them no possession in Israel: I am their possession. 29 They shall eat the meat offering, and the sin offering, and the trespass offering; and every dedicated thing in Israel shall be their's. 30 And the first of all the firstfruits of all things, and every oblation of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's: ye shall also give unto the priest the first of your dough, that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house. 31 The priests shall not eat of any thing that is dead of itself, or torn, whether it be fowl or beast.

God's priests must be regulars, not seculars, and therefore here are rules laid down for them to govern themselves by, and due encouragement given them to live up to those rules. Directions are here given,

First. Concerning their clothes. They must wear linen garments when they went in to minister, or do any service in the inner court or in the sanctuary, and nothing that was woollen, because it would cause sweat, ver. 17, 18. They must dress themselves cool, that they might go the more readily about their work; and they had the more need to do so, because they were to attend the altars, which had constant fires upon them. And they must dress themselves clean and sweet, and avoid every thing that was sweaty and filthy, to signify the purity of mind with which the service of God is to be attended. Sweat came in with sin, and was a part of the curse; "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Clothes came in with sin, coats of skin did; and therefore the priests must use as little and as light clothing as possible, and not such as caused sweat. When they had finished their service they must change their clothes again, and lay up their linen garments in the chambers appointed for that purpose, ver. 19, as before, ch. xlii. 14. They must not go among the people with their holy garments on, lest they should imagine themselves sanctified by the touch of them; or, they shall "sanctify the people," that is, as it is explained ch. xlii. 14, they "shall approach to those things which are for the people" in their ordinary garments.

Secondly. Concerning their hair. In that they must avoid extremes on both hands, ver. 20. They must not shave their heads, in imitation of the Gentile priests, and as the priests of the Romish church do; nor, on the other hand, must they "suffer their locks to grow long," as the beaux; or that they might be thought Nazarites, when really they were not; but they must be grave and modest, must "poll their heads," and keep their hair short. If a man, especially a minister, wear long hair, it is not becoming, 1 Cor. xi. 14; it is effeminate.

Thirdly. Concerning their diet. They must be sure to drink no wine when they went in to minister, lest they should drink to excess,—should drink and forget the law, ver. 21. It is not for kings to drink wine, more than will do them good, much less for priests: see Lev. x. 9; Pr. xxxi. 4, 5.

Fourthly. Concerning their marriages, ver. 22. Here they must consult the credit of their office, and not marry one that had been divorced, that was at least under the suspicion of immodesty, nor a widow, unless she were a priest's widow, that had been accustomed to the usages of the priest's families. Others may do that which ministers may not do, but must deny themselves in, in honour of their character. Their wives, as well as themselves, must be of good report.

Fifthly. Concerning their preaching and church government.

1. It was part of their business to teach the people, and herein they must approve themselves both skilful and faithful; ver. 23, "They shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane," between good and evil, lawful and unlawful, that they may neither scruple what is lawful nor venture upon what is unlawful; that they may not pollute what is holy, nor pollute themselves with what is profane. Ministers must take pains to cause "people to discern between the unclean and the clean," that they may not confound the distinctions between right and wrong, nor mistake concerning them, so as to put darkness for light, and light for darkness, but may have a good judgment of discretion concerning their own actions.

2. It was part of their business to judge upon appeals made to them, Deu. xvii. 8, 9; "And in controversy they shall stand in judgment," ver. 24. They shall have the honesty to stand up for what is right, and when they have passed a right judgment shall have the courage to stand to it, and stand by it. They must judge, not according to their own fancies or inclinations, or secular interest, but "according to my judgments;" that must be their rule and standard. Note, Ministers must decide controversies according to the word of God, "to the law and to the testimony;" sit liber judex,—'let the judge be unbiassed.' Their business is to keep courts in God's name,—to preside in the congregations of his people. And herein they must go by the statute book; they shall "keep my statutes in all mine assemblies." God calls the assemblies of his people his assemblies, because they are held in his name, to his glory. Ministers are the masters of those assemblies, are to preside in them, and in all their acts must keep close to God's laws. Another part of their work, as church governors, is to hallow God's sabbaths, to do the public work of that day with a becoming care and reverence, as the work of a holy day should be done; and to see that God's people also sanctify that day, and do nothing to pollute it.

Sixthly. Concerning their mourning for dead relations. The rule here agrees with the law of Moses, Lev. xxi. 1, 11. A priest shall not come near any dead body, (for they must be purified from dead works,) except of their next relations, ver. 25. Decent expressions of a pious sorrow for dear relations, when they are removed by death, is not disagreeable to the character of a minister. Yet by this approach to the dead body of a relation they contracted a ceremonial pollution, from which they must be cleansed by a sin offering before they went in again to minister, ver. 26, 27. Note, The sorrow for the dead is very allowable and commendable, yet there is danger of sinning in it, either by excess or dissimulation, and those tears have too often need to be wept over again.

Seventhly. Concerning their maintenance. They must live upon the altar at which they served, and live comfortably; ver. 27, "Ye shall give them no possession in Israel," no lands or tenements, lest they should be entangled with the affairs of this life; for God hath said, "I am their inheritance," and they need no other in reserve; "I am their possession," and they need no other in hand. Some land was allowed them, ch. xlviii. 10, but their principal subsistance was by their office. What God appropriated to himself they were the receivers of, to their own proper use and behoof. They lived upon the holy things, and so God himself was the portion both of their inheritance and of their cup. Note, Those who have God for their inheritance and their possession may be content with a little, and ought not to covet a great deal of the possessions and inheritances of this earth. If we have God, we have all; and therefore may well reckon that we have enough. Observe,

1. What the priests were to have from the people, for their maintenance and encouragement. 1st. They must have the flesh of many of the offerings, the sin offering and trespass offering, which would supply them and their families with flesh meat; and the meat offerings, which would supply them with bread. What we offer to God will redound to our own advantage. 2nd. They must have "every dedicated," devoted, "thing in Israel," which was in many cases to be turned into money, and given to the priest. This is explained, ver. 30; every oblation or freewill offering, which in times of reformation and devotion would be many and considerable, "of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's." We have the law concerning them, Lev. xxvii. 3rd. They were to have the first of the dough when it was going to the oven, as well as the first of their fruits when they were going to the barn. God, who is the first, must have the first; and, if it belong to him, his priests must have it. We may then comfortably enjoy what we have when a share of it has been first set apart for works of piety and charity. To this the apostle's rule bears some analogy, to begin the week with laying by for pious uses, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. The priests being so well provided for, it would be inexcusable in them if they (contrary to the law which every Israelite is bound by) should eat that "which is torn, or dead of itself," ver. 31. Those that were in want of necessary food might perhaps expect to be dispensed with in such a case. Poverty has its temptations, but the priests were so well provided for that they could have no pretence for it.

2. What the people might expect from the priest for their recompense. Those who are kind to a prophet, to a priest, shall have a prophet's, a priest's, reward, "that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house," ver. 30; that God may cause it, by commanding it; that the priests may cause it, by praying for it. And it was part of the priest's work to "bless the people in the name of the Lord;" not only their congregation, but their families. Note, It is all in all to the comfort of any house to have the blessing of God upon it, and to have the blessing to rest in it; to dwell where we dwell, and to attend the entail of it upon those who shall come after us. And the way to have the blessing of God abide upon our estates is to honour God with them, and to give him and his ministers, him and his poor, their share out of them. God blesseth, he surely blesseth, the habitation of those who are thus just, Pr. iii. 33. And ministers, by instructing and praying for the families that are kind to them, should do their part towards causing the blessing to rest there. "Peace be to this house."

CHAPTER XLV.

In this chapter is farther represented to the prophet in vision, I. The division of the Holy Land: so much for the temple, and the priests that attended the service of it, ver. 1—4; so much for the Levites, ver. 5; so much for the city, ver. 6; so much for the prince, and the residue to the people, ver. 7, 8. II. The ordinances of justice that were given both to the prince and people, ver. 9—12. III. The oblations they were to offer, and the prince's part in those oblations, ver. 13—17; particularly in the beginning of the year, ver. 18—20; and in the passover and the feast of tabernacles, ver. 21—25. And all this seems to point at the new church state that should be set up under the Gospel, which, both for extent and purity, should far exceed that of the Old Testament.

MOREOVER, when ye shall divide by lot the land for inheritance, ye shall offer an oblation unto the LORD, an holy portion of the land: the length shall be the length of five and twenty thousand reeds, and the breadth shall be ten thousand. This shall be holy in all the borders thereof round about. 2 Of this there shall be for the sanctuary five hundred in length, with five hundred in breadth, square round about; and fifty cubits round about for the suburbs thereof. 3 And of this measure shalt thou measure the length of five and twenty thousand, and the breadth of ten thousand: and in it shall be the sanctuary and the most holy place. 4 The holy portion of the land shall be for the priests the ministers of the sanctuary, which shall come near to minister unto the LORD: and it shall be a place for their houses, and an holy place for the sanctuary. 5 And the five and twenty thousand of length, and the ten thousand of breadth, shall also the Levites, the ministers of the house, have for themselves, for a possession for twenty chambers. 6 And ye shall appoint the possession of the city five thousand broad, and five and twenty thousand long, over against the oblation of the holy portion: it shall be for the whole house of Israel. 7 And a portion shall be for the prince on the one side and on the other side of the oblation of the holy portion, and of the possession of the city, before the oblation of the holy portion, and before the possession of the city, from the west side westward, and from the east side eastward: and the length shall be over against one of the portions, from the west border unto the east border. 8 In the land shall be his possession in Israel: and my princes shall no more oppress my people; and the rest of the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes.

Directions are here given for the dividing of the land after their return to it, and God having warranted them to do it, it would be an act of faith, and not of folly, thus to divide it before they had it; and it would be welcome news to the captives to hear that they should not only return to their own land, but that, whereas they were now but few in number, they should increase and multiply, so as to replenish it. But this never had its accomplishment in the Jewish state after their return out of captivity, but was to be fulfilled in the model of the Christian church, which was perfectly new, (as this division of the land was quite different from that in Joshua's time,) and much enlarged by the accession of the Gentiles to it, and will be perfected in the heavenly kingdom, of which the land of Canaan had always been a type. Now,

First. Here is the portion of land assigned to the sanctuary, in the midst of which the temple was to be built, with all its courts and purlieus; the rest round about it was for the priests. This is called, ver. 1, "An oblation to the Lord;" for what is given in works of piety, for the maintenance and support of the worship of God and the advancement of religion, God accepts as given to him, if it be done with a single eye. It is a "holy portion of the land" which is to be set out first as the firstfruits that sanctify the lump. The appropriating of lands for the support of religion and the ministry is an act of piety that bids as fair for perpetuity, and the benefit of posterity, as any other. This "holy portion of the land" was to be measured, and the borders of it fixed, that the sanctuary itself might not have more than its share, and in time engross the whole land. So far the lands of the church shall extend, and no farther, as in our own kingdom donations to the church were of old limited by the statute of mortmain. The lands here allotted to the sanctuary were five and twenty thousand reeds (so our translation makes it, though some make them only cubits,) in length, and ten thousand in breadth; about eighty miles one way, and thirty miles another way, say some; five-and-twenty miles one way, and ten miles the other way, so others. The priests and Levites that were to come near to minister were to have their dwellings in this portion of land that was round about the sanctuary, that they might be near their work; whereas, by their distribution of the land in Joshua's time, the cities of the priests and Levites were dispersed all the nation over. This intimates that gospel ministers should reside upon their charge; where their service lies, there must they live.

Secondly. Next to the lands of the sanctuary the city lands are assigned, in which the holy city was to be built, and with the issues and profits of which the citizens were to be maintained; ver. 6, "It shall be for the whole house of Israel," not appropriated, as before, to one tribe or two, but some of all the tribes shall dwell in the city, as we find they did, Neh. xi. 1, 2. The portion for the city was full as long, but only half as broad, as that for the sanctuary, for the city was enriched by trade, and therefore had the less need of lands.

Thirdly. The next allotment, after the church lands and the city lands, is of the crown lands, ver. 7, 8. Here is no admeasurement of these, but they are said to lie on the one side and on the other side of the church lands and city lands, to intimate that the prince, with his wealth and power, was to be a protection to both. Some make the prince's share equal to the church's and city's share both together; others make it to be a thirteenth part of the rest of the land, the other twelve being for the twelve tribes. The prince that attends continually to the administration of public affairs must have wherewithal to support his dignity and have abundance, that he may not be in temptation to oppress the people, which yet, with many, doth not prevent that. But the grace of God shall prevent it, for it is promised here, "My princes shall no more oppress my people," for God will make the officers peace, and the exactors righteousness. Notwithstanding this, we find that after the return of the Jews to their own land the princes were complained of for their exactions; but Nehemiah was one that did not do as the former governors, and yet kept a handsome court, Neh. v. 15, 18. But so much is said of the prince, in this mystical holy state, to intimate that in the gospel church magistrates should be as nursing fathers to it, and Christian princes its patrons and protectors; and the holy religion they profess, as far as they are subject to the power of it, will restrain them from oppressing God's people, because they are more his people than theirs.

Fourthly. The rest of the lands were to be distributed to the people according to their tribes, who had reason to think themselves well settled, when they had both the testimony of Israel and the throne of judgment so near them.

9 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel: remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord GOD. 10 Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath. 11 The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure, that the bath may contain the tenth part of an homer, and the ephah the tenth part of an homer: the measure thereof shall be after the homer. 12 And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs: twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh.

We have here some general rules of justice laid down both for prince and people, the rules of distributive and commutative justice; for godliness without honesty is but a form of godliness, will neither please God nor avail to the benefit of any people. Be it therefore enacted by the authority of the church's King and God,

First. That princes do not oppress their subjects, but duly and faithfully administer justice among them; ver. 9, "Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel," that you have been oppressive to the people, and have enriched yourselves by spoil and violence, that you have so long fleeced the flock instead of feeding them, and from henceforward do so no more. Note, Even princes and great men, that have long done amiss, must at length think it time, high time, to reform and amend; for no prescription will justify a wrong. Instead of saying they have been long accustomed to oppress, and therefore may persist in it, (for the custom will bear them out,) they should say they have been long accustomed to it, and therefore, as here, let the time past suffice, and let them now remove "violence and spoil;" let them drop wrongful demands, cancel wrongful usages, and turn out those from employments under them that do violence; let them "take away their exactions," ease their subjects of those taxes which they find lie heavy upon them; and let them "execute judgment and justice" according to law, as the duty of their place requires. Note, All princes, but especially the princes of Israel, are concerned to do justice; for of their people God saith, They are my people; and they in a special manner rule for God.

Secondly. That one neighbour doth not cheat another in commerce; ver. 10, "Ye shall have just balances," in which to weigh both money and goods, a just ephah, for dry measure of corn and flour, a just bath, for the measure of liquids, wine and oil; and the ephah and bath shall be of one measure, the tenth part of a chomer or cor, ver. 11. So that the ephah and bath contained (as the learned Dr. Cumberland has computed) seven wine gallons and four pints, and something more. An omer was but the tenth part of an ephah, Ex. xvi. 36, and the hundredth part of a chomer or homer, and contained about six pints. The shekel is here settled, ver. 13; it is twenty gerahs, just half a Roman ounce,—in our money two shillings and fourpence farthing and almost the eighth part of a farthing, as the aforesaid learned man exactly computes it. By the shekels the maneh or pound was reckoned, which, when it was set for a mere weight, (saith Bishop Cumberland,) without respect to coinage, contained just a hundred shekels, as appears by comparing 1 Kin. x. 17, where it is said three manehs or pounds of gold went to one shield, with the parallel place, 2 Chr. ix. 16, where it is said three hundred shekels of gold went to one shield. But when the maneh is set for a sum of money or coin it contains but sixty shekels, as appears here, where twenty shekels, five-and-twenty shekels, and fifteen shekels, which in all make sixty, shall be the maneh. But it is thus reckoned because they had one piece of money that weighed twenty shekels, another five and twenty, another fifteen, all which made up one pound, as a learned writer here observes. Note, It concerns God's Israel to be very honest and just in all their dealings, very punctual and exact in rendering to all their due, very cautious to do wrong to none, because otherwise they spoil the acceptableness of their profession with God and the reputation of it before men.

13 This is the oblation that ye shall offer; the sixth part of an ephah of an homer of wheat, and ye shall give the sixth part of an ephah of an homer of barley: 14 Concerning the ordinance of oil, the bath of oil, ye shall offer the tenth part of a bath out of the cor, which is an homer of ten baths; for ten baths are an homer: 15 And one lamb out of the flock, out of two hundred, out of the fat pastures of Israel; for a meat offering, and for a burnt offering, and for peace offerings, to make reconciliation for them, saith the Lord GOD. 16 All the people of the land shall give this oblation for the prince in Israel. 17 And it shall be the prince's part to give burnt offerings, and meat offerings, and drink offerings, in the feasts, and in the new moons, and in the sabbaths, in all solemnities of the house of Israel: he shall prepare the sin offering, and the meat offering, and the burnt offering, and the peace offerings, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel. 18 Thus saith the Lord GOD; In the first month, in the first day of the month, thou shalt take a young bullock without blemish, and cleanse the sanctuary: 19 And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering, and put it upon the posts of the house, and upon the four corners of the settle of the altar, and upon the posts of the gate of the inner court. 20 And so thou shalt do the seventh day of the month for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple: so shall ye reconcile the house. 21 In the first month, in the fourteenth day of the month, ye shall have the passover, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten. 22 And upon that day shall the prince prepare for himself and for all the people of the land a bullock for a sin offering. 23 And seven days of the feast he shall prepare a burnt offering to the LORD, seven bullocks and seven rams without blemish daily the seven days; and a kid of the goats daily for a sin offering. 24 And he shall prepare a meat offering of an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and an hin of oil for an ephah. 25 In the seventh month, in the fifteenth day of the month, shall he do the like in the feast of the seven days, according to the sin offering, according to the burnt offering, and according to the meat offering, and according to the oil.

Having laid down the rules of righteousness towards men, which is really a branch of true religion, he comes next to give some directions for their religion towards God, which is a branch of universal righteousness.

First. It required that they offer an oblation to the Lord out of what they have, ver. 13; "All the people of the land" must give an oblation, ver. 16. As God's tenants they must pay a quit rent to their great Landlord. They had offered an oblation out of their real estates, ver. 1, "a holy portion of their land;" now they are directed to offer an oblation out of their personal estates, their goods and chattels, as an acknowledgment of their receivings from him, their dependence on him, and their obligations to him. Note, Whatever our substance is we must honour God with it by giving him his dues out of it. Not that God has need of, or may be benefited by, any thing that we can give him, Ps. l. 9; no, it is but an oblation. We only offer it to him; the benefit of it returns back to ourselves, to his poor, who, as our neighbours, are ourselves, or to his ministers who serve continually for our good.

Secondly. The proportion of this oblation is here determined, which was not done by the law of Moses. No mention is made of the tithe, but only of this oblation; and the quantum of this is thus settled: 1. Out of their corn they were to offer a sixtieth part; out of every homer of wheat and barley, which contained ten ephahs, they were to offer the sixth part of one ephah, which was a sixtieth part of the whole, ver. 13. 2. Out of their oil (and probably their wine too) they were to offer a hundredth part for this oblation; out of every cor or homer, which contained ten baths, they were to offer the tenth part of one bath, ver. 14. This was given to the altar, for in every meat offering there was flour mingled with oil. 3. Out of their flocks they were to give one lamb out of two hundred. That was the smallest proportion of all, ver. 15; but it must be out of the fat pastures of Israel. They must not offer to God that which was taken up from the common, but the fattest and best they had, for burnt offerings and peace offerings. The former were offered for the giving of glory, to God, the latter for the fetching in of mercy, grace, and peace from God, and in our spiritual sacrifices these are our two great errands at the throne of grace; but, in order to the acceptance of both, these sacrifices were to make reconciliation for them. Christ is our sacrifice of atonement, by whom reconciliation is made, and to him we must have an eye in our sacrifices of acknowledgment.

Thirdly. This oblation must be given for "the prince in Israel," ver. 16. Some read it 'to the prince,' and understand it of Christ, who is indeed the Prince in Israel, to whom we must offer our oblations, and into whose hand we must put them to be presented to the Father. Or, they shall give it with the prince;

every private person shall bring his oblation to be offered with that of the prince. For it follows, ver. 17, "It shall be the prince's part" to provide all the offerings, "to make reconciliation for the house of Israel." The people were to bring their oblations to him, according to the foregoing rules, and he was to bring them to the sanctuary, and to make up what fell short out of his own. Note, It is the duty of rulers to take care of religion, and to see that the duties of it be regularly and carefully performed by those under their charge, and that nothing be wanting that is requisite thereto. The magistrate is the keeper of both tables; and it is a happy time when those that are above others, in power and dignity, go before them in the service of God.

Fourthly. Some particular solemnities are here appointed.

1. Here is one in the beginning of the year, which seems to be altogether new, and not instituted by the law of Moses. It is the annual solemnity of cleansing the sanctuary. 1st. On the first day of the first month, upon new-year's day, they were to offer a sacrifice for the cleansing of the sanctuary, ver. 18; that is, to make atonement for the iniquity of the holy things the year past, that they might bring none of the guilt of them into the services of the new year, and to implore grace for the preventing of that iniquity, and for the better performance of the service of the sanctuary the ensuing year; and in token of this the blood of this sin offering was to be put upon the posts of the temple, the four corners, not of the altar, but "the settle of the altar," and "the posts of the gate of the inner court," ver. 19, to signify that by it atonement was intended to be made for the sins of all the servants that attended that house, priests, Levites, and people, even the sins that were found in all their services. Note, Even sanctuaries on earth need cleansing, frequent cleansing; that above needs none. Those that worship God together should often join in renewing their repentance for their manifold defects, and applying the blood of Christ for the pardon of them, and in renewing their covenants to be more careful for the future; and it is very seasonable to begin the year with this work, as Hezekiah did when it had been long neglected, 2 Chr. xxix. 17. They were here appointed to cleanse the sanctuary upon the first day of the month, because on the fourteenth day of the month they were to eat the passover, an ordinance which, of all other the Old Testament institutions, had most in it of Christ and gospel grace, and therefore it was very fit they should begin to prepare for it a fortnight before, by cleansing the sanctuary. 2nd. This sacrifice was to be repeated on the seventh day of the first month, ver. 20. And then it was intended to make atonement "for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple." Note, He that sins, errs, and is simple; he mistakes, he goes out of the way, and shews himself to be foolish and unwise. But here it is spoken of those sins which are committed through ignorance, mistake, or inadvertency, whether by any of the priests, or of the Levites, or of the people. Such sins, sacrifices were appointed to atone for, which men were surprised into, did before they were aware, which they would not have done if they had known and remembered aright, which they were overtaken in, and for which afterwards they condemn themselves; but for presumptuous sins, committed with a high hand, there was no sacrifice appointed, Num. xv. 30. By these repeated sacrifices ye shall reconcile the house, that is, God will be reconciled to it, and continue the tokens of his presence in it, and will let it alone this year also.

2. The passover was to be religiously observed at the time appointed, ver. 21. Christ is our passover that is sacrificed for us; we celebrate the memorial of that sacrifice, and feast upon it,—triumphing in our deliverance out of the Egyptian slavery of sin, and our preservation from the sword of the destroying angel, the sword of Divine justice,—in the Lord's supper, which is our passover feast, as the whole Christian life is, and must be, the feast of unleavened bread. It is here appointed that the prince shall prepare a sin offering, to be offered "for himself and the people;" a bullock on the first day, ver. 21, and a kid of the goats every other day, ver. 23, to teach us, in all our attendance upon God for communion with him, to have an eye to the great sin offering, by which transgression was finished, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. On every day of the feast there was to be a burnt offering, purely for the honour of God, of no less than seven bullocks and seven rams, with their meat offering, which were wholly consumed upon the altar, and yet no waste, ver. 23, 24.

3. The feast of tabernacles is that spoken of next, ver. 25, and no mention of the feast of pentecost, which came between that of the passover and that of the tabernacles. Orders are here given (above what were given by the law of Moses) for the same sacrifices to be offered during the seven days of the passover. See the deficiency of the legal sacrifices for sin; they were therefore often repeated, not only every year, but every feast, every day of the feast, because "they could not make the comers thereunto perfect," Heb. x. 1, 3. See the necessity of our frequently repeating the same religious exercises. Though the sacrifice of atonement is offered once for all, yet the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of a broken heart, that of a thankful heart, must be every day offered, those spiritual sacrifices which are acceptable to God through Christ Jesus. We should, as here, fall into a method of holy duties, and stick to it.

CHAPTER XLVI.

In this chapter we have, I. Some farther rules given both to the priests and to the people relating to their worship, ver. 1—15. II. A law concerning the prince's disposal of his inheritance, ver. 16—18. III. A description of the places provided for the boiling of the sacrifices and the baking of the meat offerings, ver. 19—24.

THUS saith the Lord GOD; The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; but on the sabbath it shall be opened, and in the day of the new moon it shall be opened. 2 And the prince shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate without, and shall stand by the post of the gate, and the priests shall prepare his burnt offering and his peace offerings, and he shall worship at the threshold of the gate: then he shall go forth; but the gate shall not be shut until the evening. 3 Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate before the LORD in the sabbaths and in the new moons. 4 And the burnt offering that the prince shall offer unto the LORD in the sabbath day shall be six lambs without blemish, and a ram without blemish. 5 And the meat offering shall be an ephah for a ram, and the meat offering for the lambs as he shall be able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 6 And in the day of the new moon it shall be a young bullock without blemish, and six lambs, and a ram: they shall be without blemish. 7 And he shall prepare a meat offering, an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and for the lambs according as his hand shall attain unto, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 8 And when the prince shall enter, he shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate, and he shall go forth by the way thereof. 9 But when the people of the land shall come before the LORD in the solemn feasts, he that entereth in by the way of the north gate to worship shall go out by the way of the south gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south gate shall go forth by the way of the north gate: he shall not return by the way of the gate whereby he came in, but shall go forth over against it. 10 And the prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth. 11 And in the feasts and in the solemnities the meat offering shall be an ephah to a bullock, and an ephah to a ram, and to the lambs as he is able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 12 Now when the prince shall prepare a voluntary burnt offering or peace offerings voluntarily unto the LORD, one shall then open him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he shall prepare his burnt offering and his peace offerings, as he did on the sabbath day: then he shall go forth; and after his going forth one shall shut the gate. 13 Thou shalt daily prepare a burnt offering unto the LORD of a lamb of the first year without blemish: thou shalt prepare it every morning. 14 And thou shalt prepare a meat offering for it every morning, the sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of an hin of oil, to temper with the fine flour; a meat offering continually by a perpetual ordinance unto the LORD. 15 Thus shall they prepare the lamb, and the meat offering, and the oil, every morning for a continual burnt offering.

Whether the rules for public worship here laid down were designed to be observed, even in those things wherein they differed from the law of Moses, and were so observed under the second temple, is not certain; we find not in the history of that latter part of the Jewish church that they governed themselves in their worship by these ordinances, as one would think they should have done, but only by the law of Moses, looking upon this then, in the next age after, as mystical, and not literal. We may observe, in these verses,

First. That the place of worship was fixed, and rules given concerning that, both to prince and people.

1. The east gate, which was kept shut at other times, was to be opened on the sabbath days, in the new moons, ver. 1, and whenever the prince offered a voluntary offering, ver. 12. Of the keeping of this gate ordinarily shut we read before, ch. xliv. 2, whereas the other gates of the court were opened every day, this only on high days, and on special occasions, when it was opened for the prince, who was to go in "by the way of the porch of that gate," ver. 2, and again, ver. 8. Some think he went in with the priests and Levites into the inner court, (for into that court this gate was the entrance,) and they observe that magistrates and ministers should join forces, and go the same way, hand in hand, in promoting the service of God. But it should rather seem that he did not go through the gate, (as the glory of the Lord had done,) though it was open, but he went "by the way of the porch of the gate," stood "at the post of the gate," and "worshipped at the threshold of the gate," ver. 2, where he had a full view of the priests' performances at the altar, and signified his concurrence in them, for himself, and for the people of the land, that stood behind him at the door of that gate, ver. 3. Thus must every prince shew himself to be of David's mind, who would very willingly be "a doorkeeper in the house of his God," and, as the word there is, "lie at the threshold," Ps. lxxxiv. 10. Note, The greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of God. Even princes themselves, when they draw near to God, must worship with reverence and godly fear, owning that even they are unworthy to approach him. But Christ is our prince, whom God causeth to draw near, and approach to him, Jer. xxx. 21.

2. As to the north gate and south gate, by which they entered into the court of the people, (not into the inner court,) there was this rule given, that whoever came in at the north gate should go out at the south gate, and whoever came in at the south gate should go out at the north gate, ver. 9. Some think this was to prevent thrusting and jostling one another; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. We may suppose they came in at the gate that was next their own houses; but when they went away God would have them go out at that gate which would lead them the farthest way about, that they might have time for meditation. Being thereby obliged to go a great way round the sanctuary, they might have an opportunity to consider the palaces of it; and, if they improved their time well in fetching this circuit, they would call it the next way home. Some observe that this may remind us in the service of God to be still pressing forward, Phil. iii. 13, and not to look back; and, in our attendance upon ordinances, not to go back as we came, but more holy, and heavenly, and spiritual.

3. It is appointed that the people shall worship at the door of the east gate, where the prince doth; he at the head, and they attending him, both in the sabbaths and in the new moons, ver. 3, and that when they come in, and go out, the prince shall be "in the midst of them," ver. 10. Note, Great men should, by their constant and reverend attendance on God in public worship, give a good example to their inferiors, both engaging them and encouraging them to do likewise. It is a very graceful, becoming thing for persons of quality to go to church with their servants, and tenants, and poor neighbours about them, and to behave themselves there with an air of seriousness and devotion. And those who thus honour God with their honour he will delight to honour.

Secondly. That the ordinances of worship were fixed. Though the prince is supposed himself to be a very hearty, zealous friend to the sanctuary, yet it is not left to him, no, not in concert with the priests, to appoint what sacrifices shall be offered, but God himself appoints them; for it is his prerogative to institute the rites and ceremonies of religious worship.

1. Every morning, as duly as the morning came, they must offer a lamb for a burnt offering, ver. 13. It is strange that no mention is made of the evening sacrifice. But Christ being come, and having offered himself now in the end of the world, Heb. ix. 26, we are to look upon him as the evening sacrifice, about the time of the offering up of which he died.

2. On the sabbath days, whereas by the law of Moses four lambs were to be offered, Num. xxviii. 9, it is here appointed that (at the prince's charge) there shall be six lambs offered, and a ram beside, ver. 4; to intimate how much we should abound in sabbath work, now in gospel time, and what plenty of the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise we should offer up to God on that day. And if with such sacrifices God is well pleased, sure we have a great deal of reason to be so.

3. On the new moons, in the beginning of their months, there was, over and above the usual sabbath sacrifices, the additional offering of a young bullock, ver. 6. Those who do much for God and their souls, statedly and constantly, must, upon some occasions, do yet more.

4. All the sacrifices were to be without blemish. So Christ the great sacrifice was, 1 Pet. i. 19; and so Christians, who are to present themselves to God as living sacrifices, should aim and endeavour to be "blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke."

5. All the sacrifices were to have their meat offerings annexed to them; for so the law of Moses had appointed, to shew what a good table God keeps in his house, and that we ought to honour him with the fruit of our ground, as well as with the fruit of our cattle, because in both he hath blessed us, Deu. xxviii. 4. In the beginning Cain offered the one and Abel the other. Some observe that the meat offerings here are much larger in proportion than they were by the law of Moses. Then it was three tenth-deals to a bullock, and two to a ram, (that is, so many tenth-parts of an ephah,) and half a hin of oil at the most, Num. xv. 6—9; but here, for every bullock and every ram, a whole ephah and a whole hin of oil, ver. 7. These unbloody sacrifices shall be more abounded in. Or, in general, it intimates that as now, under the Gospel, God abounds in the gifts of his grace to us more than under the law, so we should abound in the returns of praise and duty to him. But it is observable that, in the meat offering for the lambs, the prince is allowed to offer "as he shall be able to give," ver. 5, 7, "as his hand shall attain unto;" so likewise, ver. 11. Note, Princes themselves must spend as they can afford; and even in that which is laid out in works of piety God expects and requires but that we should do according to our ability, every man "as God hath prospered him," 1 Cor. xvi. 2. God hath not "made us to serve with an offering," Isa. xliii. 23, but considers our frame and state. Yet this will not countenance those who pretend a disability that is not real, or those who, by their extravagances in other things, disable themselves to do the good they should. And we find those praised who, in an extraordinary case of charity, went not only to their power, but beyond their power.

16 Thus saith the Lord GOD; If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, the inheritance thereof shall be his sons'; it shall be their possession by inheritance. 17 But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, then it shall be his to the year of liberty; after it shall return to the prince: but his inheritance shall be his sons' for them. 18 Moreover the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression, to thrust them out of their possession; but he shall give his sons inheritance out of his own possession: that my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

We have here a law for the limiting the power of the prince in the disposing of the crown lands,

First. If he has a son that is a favourite, or has merited well, he may, if he pleaseth, as a token of his favour, and in recompense for his services, settle some parts of his lands upon him and his heirs for ever, ver. 16, provided it do not go out of the family. There may be a cause for parents, when their children are grown up, to be more kind to one than to another, as Jacob gave to Joseph one portion above his brethren, Gen. xlviii. 22.

Secondly. Yet, if he have a servant that is a favourite, he may not in like manner settle lands upon him, ver. 17; but if he see cause he may give him lands to the year of jubilee, and then they must return to the family again, ver. 17. The servant might have the rents, issues, and profits, for such a term, but the inheritance, the jus proprietarium,—'the right of proprietorship,' shall remain in the prince and his heirs. It was fit a difference should be put between a child and a servant, like that Jno. viii. 35, "the servant abideth not in the house for ever," as the son doth.

Thirdly. What estates he gives his children must be of his own; ver. 18, "He shall not take of the people's inheritance," under pretence of having many children to provide for. He shall not find ways to make them forfeit their estates, or to force them to sell them, and so thrust his subjects out of their possession, but let him and his sons be content with their own. It is far from being a prince's honour to increase the wealth of his family and crown by encroaching upon the rights and properties of his subjects; nor will he himself be a gainer by it at last, for he will be but a poor prince when the people are "scattered every man from his possession," when they quit their native country, being forced out of it by oppression, choosing rather to live among strangers that are free people, and where what they have they can call their own, be it never so little. It is the interest of princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, and then all they have is in the best manner at their service. It is better for themselves to gain their affections by protecting their rights than to gain their estates by invading them.

19 After he brought me through the entry, which was at the side of the gate, into the holy chambers of the priests, which looked toward the north: and, behold, there was a place on the two sides westward. 20 Then said he unto me, This is the place where the priests shall boil the trespass offering and the sin offering, where they shall bake the meat offering; that they bear them not out into the utter court, to sanctify the people. 21 Then he brought me forth into the utter court, and caused me to pass by the four corners of the court; and, behold, in every corner of the court there was a court. 22 In the four corners of the court there were courts joined of forty cubits long and thirty broad: these four corners were of one measure. 23 And there was a row of building round about in them, round about them four, and it was made with boiling places under the rows round about. 24 Then said he unto me, These are the places of them that boil, where the ministers of the house shall boil the sacrifice of the people.

We have here a farther discovery of buildings about the temple which we did not observe before, and those were places to boil the flesh of the offerings, ver. 20. He that kept such a plentiful table at his altar had need have large kitchens; and a wise builder will provide conveniences of that kind. Observe,

First. Where those boiling places were situated. There were some at the entry into the inner court, ver. 19; and others under the rows, in the four corners of the outer court, ver. 21—23. These were the places where it is likely there was most room to spare for this purpose; and this purpose was found for the spare room, that none might be lost. Pity holy ground should be waste ground.

Secondly. What use they were put to. In those places they were to "boil the trespass offering, and the sin offering," those parts of them which were allotted to the priests, and which were more sacred than the flesh of the peace offerings, of which the offerers also had a share. There also they were to bake the meat offering, their share of it which they had from the altar for their own tables, ver. 20. Care was taken that they "bear them not out into the outer court to sanctify the people." Let them not pretend to sanctify the people with this holy flesh, and so impose upon them. Or, let not the people imagine that by touching these sacred things they were sanctified, and made ever the better or more acceptable to God. It should seem by Hag. ii. 12, there were those that had such a conceit; and therefore the priests must not carry any of the holy flesh away with them lest they should encourage that conceit. Ministers must take heed of doing any thing to bolster up ignorant people in their superstitious vanities.

CHAPTER XLVII.

In this chapter we have, I. The vision of the holy waters,—their rise, extent, depth, and healing virtue, the plenty of fish in them, and an account of the trees growing on the banks of them, ver. 1—12. II. An appointment of the borders of the land of Canaan, which was to be divided by lot to the tribe of Israel, and the strangers who sojourned among them, ver. 13—23.

AFTERWARD he brought me again unto the door of the house; and, behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward:

for the forefront of the house stood toward the east, and the waters came down from under from the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar. 2 Then brought he me out of the way of the gate northward, and led me about the way without unto the utter gate by the way that looketh eastward; and, behold, there ran out waters on the right side. 3 And when the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward, he measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; the waters were to the ancles. 4 Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins. 5 Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over: for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over. 6 And he said unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen this? Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river. 7 Now when I had returned, behold, at the bank of the river were very many trees on the one side and on the other. 8 Then said he unto me, These waters issue out toward the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea: which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. 9 And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live: and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: for they shall be healed; and every thing shall live whither the river cometh. 10 And it shall come to pass, that the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. 11 But the miry places thereof and the marishes thereof shall not be healed; they shall be given to salt. 12 And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine.

This part of Ezekiel's vision must so necessarily have a mystical and spiritual meaning that from thence we conclude the other parts of his vision hath so too; for it cannot be applied to the waters brought by pipes into the temple for the washing of the sacrifices, and the keeping of the temple clean, and the carrying off of those waters, for that would be to turn this pleasant river into a sink or common sewer. That prophecy, Zec. xiv. 8, may explain it, of "living waters that shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them towards the former sea, and half of them towards the hinder sea;" and there is plainly a reference to this in St. John's vision of "a pure river of water of life," Rev. xxii. 1. That seems to represent the glory and joy, which is grace perfected. This here seems to represent the grace and joy, which is glory begun. Most interpreters agree that these waters signify the Gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, and spread itself into the countries about, and the gifts and power of the Holy Ghost which accompanied it, and by virtue of which it spread itself far, and produced strange and blessed effects. Ezekiel had walked round the house again and again, and yet did not till now take notice of those waters; for God makes known his mind and will to his people, not all at once, but by degrees. Now observe,

First. The rise of these waters. He is not put to trace the streams to the fountain, but has the fountain-head first discovered to him; ver. 1, "Waters issued out from the threshold of the house eastward," and from "under the right side of the house," that is, the south side of the altar: and again, ver. 2, "There ran out waters on the right side," signifying that "from Zion should go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," Isa. ii. 3. There it was that the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and endowed them with the gift of tongues, that they might carry these waters to all nations. In the temple first they were to stand and "preach the words of this life," Acts v. 20; they must preach the Gospel to all nations, but must "begin at Jerusalem," Lu. xxiv. 47. But that is not all: Christ is the temple; he is the door, from him those living waters flow, out of his pierced side. It is the water that he gives us that is "the well of water which springs up," Jno. iv. 14; and it is by believing in him that we receive from him "rivers of living water;" and "this spake he of the Spirit," Jno. vii. 38, 39. The original of these waters was not above ground, but they sprang up from under the threshold; for the fountain of a believer's life is a mystery; it is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3. Some observe that they came forth "on the right side of the house," to intimate that gospel blessings are right-hand blessings. It is also an encouragement to those who attend at wisdom's gates, at the posts of her doors, who are willing to lie at the threshold of God's house, as David was, that they lie at the fountain-head of comfort and grace. The very entrance into God's word gives light and life, Ps. cxix. 130. David speaks it to the praise of Zion, "All my springs are in thee," Ps. lxxxvii. 7. They came from the side of the altar; for it is in and by Jesus Christ, the great altar, who sanctifies our gifts to God, that God hath blessed us with spiritual blessings in holy, heavenly places. From God as the fountain, in him as the channel, flows the river which "makes glad the city of our God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High," Ps. xlvi. 4. But observe how much the blessedness and joy of glorified saints in heaven exceed those of the best and happiest saints on earth. Here the streams of our comfort arise from under the threshold; there they proceed "from the throne," the throne "of God and of the lamb," Rev. xxi. 1.

Secondly. The progress and increase of these waters. They "went forth eastward," ver. 3, towards the east country, ver. 9; for so they were directed. The prophet and his guide followed the stream as it ran down from the holy mountains; and, when they had followed it about a thousand cubits, they went over across it to try the depth of it, and it was to the ancles, ver. 3; then they walked along on the bank of the river, on the other side, a thousand cubits more, and then, to try the depth of it, they waded through it the second time, and it was up to their knees, ver. 4; they walked along by it a thousand cubits more, and then forded it the third time, and then it was up to their middle, the waters were to the loins; they then walked a thousand cubits farther, and attempted to repass it the fourth time, but found it impracticable; the waters were risen, either by the addition of brooks, that fell into it above ground, or by springs under ground, so that they were "waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over," ver. 5. Note, 1. The waters of the sanctuary are running waters, as those of a river, not standing waters, as those of a pond. The Gospel, when it was first preached, was still spreading farther. Grace in the soul is still pressing forwards; it is an active principle, plus ultra, —'onward still,' till it comes to perfection. 2. They are increasing waters. This river, as it runs constantly, so the farther it goes the fuller it grows. The gospel church was very small in its beginnings, like a little purling brook; but by degrees it came to be to the ankles, to the knees; many were added to it daily, and the grain of mustard seed grew up to be a great tree. The gifts of the Spirit increase by being exercised; and grace, where it is true, is growing like the light of the morning, which "shines more and more unto the perfect day." 3. It is good for us to follow these waters, and go along with them. Observe the progress of the Gospel in the world; observe the process of the work of grace in the heart; attend the motions of the blessed Spirit, and walk after them, under a Divine conduct, as Ezekiel here did. 4. It is good to be often searching into the things of God, and trying the depth of them; not only look on the surface of those waters, but go to the bottom of them, as far as we can; be often digging, often diving into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, as those who covet to be intimately acquainted with those things. 5. If we search into the things of God we shall find some things very plain and easy to be understood, as the waters that were but to the ankles; others more difficult, and which require a deeper search, as the waters to the knees, or the loins; and some quite beyond our reach, which we cannot penetrate into, or account for, but despairing to find the bottom, must, as St. Paul, sit down at the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33. It has been often said that in the Scripture, like these waters of the sanctuary, there are some places so shallow that a lamb may wade through them, and others so deep that an elephant may swim in them. And it is our wisdom, as the prophet here, to begin with that which is most easy, and get our hearts washed with those things, before we proceed to that which is "dark and hard to be understood;" it is good to take our work before us.

Thirdly. The extent of this river. It "issues towards the east country;" but from thence it either divides itself into several streams, or fetcheth a compass so as that it goes down into the desert, and so goes into the sea, either into the Dead Sea, which lay south-east, or the sea of Tiberias, which lay north-east; or the great sea, which lay west, ver. 8. This was accomplished when the Gospel was preached with success throughout all the regions of Judæa and Samaria, Acts viii. 1, and afterwards the nations about, nay, and those that lay most remote, even in the isles of the sea, were enlightened and leavened by it. The sound of it went forth to the end of the world; and the enemies of it could no more prevail to stop the progress of it than that of a mighty river.

Fourthly. The healing virtue of this river. The waters of the sanctuary, wherever they come, and have a free course, will be found a wonderful restorative. Being brought forth into the sea, the sulphureous lake of Sodom, that standing monument of Divine vengeance, even those "waters shall be healed," ver. 8; shall become sweet, and pleasant, and healthful. This intimates the wonderful and blessed change that the Gospel would make wheresoever it came in its power, as great a change, in respect both of character and condition, as the turning of the Dead Sea into a fountain of gardens. When children of wrath became children of love, and those that were dead in trespasses and sins were made alive, then this was fulfilled. The Gospel was as that salt which Elisha cast into the spring of the waters of Jericho, with which he healed them, 2 Kin. ii. 20, 21. Christ, coming into the world to be its physician, sent his Gospel as the great medicine, the pampharmacon; there is in it a remedy for every malady. Nay, wherever these rivers come they make things to live, ver. 9, both plants and animals; they are the water of life, Rev. xxii. 1, 17. Christ came that we may have life, and for that end he sends his Gospel; every thing shall live whither the river comes. The grace of God makes dead sinners alive, and living saints lively; every thing is made fruitful and flourishing by it. But its effect is according as it is received, and as the mind is prepared and disposed to receive it; for, ver. 11, the marshes and miry places thereof, that are settled in the mire of their own sinfulness, and will not be healed or settled in the moisture of their own righteousness, and think they need no healing, their doom is, they "shall not be healed." The same Gospel which to others is a savour of life unto life shall to them be a savour of death unto death; "They shall be given to salt," that is, to perpetual barrenness, Deu. xxix. 23. They that will not be watered with the grace of God, and made fruitful, shall be abandoned to their own hearts' lusts, and left for ever unfruitful. "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." "Never fruit grow on thee more for ever." They shall be given to salt, that is, to be monuments of Divine justice, as Lot's wife that was turned into a pillar of salt, to season others.

Fifthly. The great plenty of fish that should be in this river. Every living moving thing shall be found here, shall live here, ver. 9; that is, shall come on and prosper, shall be the best of the kind, and shall increase greatly, so that there shall be "a very great multitude of fish, according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many." There shall be as great plenty of the river fish, and as vast shoals of them, as there used to be of salt water fish, ver. 10. There shall be great numbers of Christians in the church, and those multiplying like fishes, in the rising generations and the dew of their youth. In the creation the waters brought forth the fish abundantly, Gen. i. 20, 21; and they still live in and by the waters that produced them. So believers are begotten by the word of truth, Jas. i. 18, and born by it, 1 Pet. i. 23,—that river of God. By it they live, and from it they have their maintenance and subsistence; in the waters of the sanctuary they are as in their element, out of them they are as fish upon dry ground; so David was when he thirsted and panted for God, for the living God. Where the fish are known to be in abundance thither will the fishers flock, and there they will cast their nets; and therefore, to intimate the replenishing of these waters, and their being made every way useful, it is here foretold that the fishers shall stand upon the banks of this river, from Engedi, which lies on the border of the Dead Sea, to Eneglaim, another city, that joins to that sea, and all along shall spread their nets. The Dead Sea, which before was shunned as noisome and noxious, shall be frequented. Gospel grace makes those persons and places which were unprofitable and good for nothing to become serviceable to God and man.

Sixthly. The trees that were on the banks of this river, many trees on the one side and on the other, ver. 12, which made the prospect very pleasant and agreeable to the eye. The shelter of these trees also would be a convenience to the fishery; but that is not all, ver. 12, they are "trees for meat," and the fruit of them shall not be consumed, for it shall produce fresh fruit every month. The leaf shall be "for medicine," and it "shall not fade." This part of the vision is copied out into St. John's vision very exactly, Rev. xxii. 2, where, on either side of the river, is said to grow the tree of life, which yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves were for the healing of the nations. Christians are supposed to be these trees, ministers especially; "Trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord," Isa. lxi. 3; set by "the rivers of water," the waters of the sanctuary, Ps. i. 3; grafted into Christ, the tree of life, and by virtue of their union with him made trees of life too, rooted in him, Col. ii. 7. There is a great variety of these trees, through the diversity of gifts with which they are endued, by that one Spirit who worketh all in all. They grow on the bank of the river, for they keep close to holy ordinances, and through them derive from Christ sap and virtue. They are fruit trees, designed, as the fig-tree and the olive with their fruits, to honour God and man, Jud. ix. 9; "The fruit thereof shall be for meat," for the lips of the righteous feed many. The fruits of their righteousness are one way or other beneficial. The very leaves of these trees are for medicine; for bruises and sores, (margin.) Good Christians, with their good discourses, which are as their leaves, as well as with their charitable actions, which are as their fruits, do good to those about them; they strengthen the weak, and bind up the broken-hearted. Their cheerfulness doth good like a medicine, not only to themselves but to others also. They shall be enabled, by the grace of God, to persevere in their goodness and usefulness; "their leaf shall not fade," or lose its medicinal virtue, having not only life in their root, but sap in all their branches; their profession "shall not wither," Ps. i. 3, "neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed;" that is, they shall not lose the principle of their fruitfulness, but "shall still bring forth fruit in old age, to shew that the Lord is upright," Ps. xcii. 14. Or, the reward of their fruitfulness shall abide for ever; they bring forth fruit that shall abound to their account in the great day, fruit to life eternal; that is, indeed, fruit which shall not be consumed. They bring "new fruit according to their months," some in one month, and others in another; so that still there shall be one or other found to serve the glory of God for the purpose he designs. Or, each one of them shall bring forth fruit monthly, which notes an abundant disposition to fruit-bearing—they shall never be weary of well-doing; and a very happy climate, such as that there shall be a perpetual spring and summer. And the reason of this extraordinary fruitfulness is, because their waters "issued out of the sanctuary;" it is not to be ascribed to anything in themselves, but to the continual supplies of Divine grace with which they are watered every moment, Isa. xxvii. 3; for, whoever planted them, it was that which gave the increase.

13 Thus saith the Lord GOD; This shall be the border, whereby ye shall inherit the land according to the twelve tribes of Israel: Joseph shall have two portions. 14 And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another: concerning the which I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers: and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance. 15 And this shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad; 16 Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran. 17 And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward, and the border of Hamath. And this is the north side. 18 And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead, and from the land of Israel by Jordan, from the border unto the east sea. And this is the east side. 19 And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, the river to the great sea. And this is the south side southward. 20 The west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath. This is the west side. 21 So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. 22 And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel: they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. 23 And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD.

We are now to pass from the affairs of the sanctuary to those of the state; from the city to the country.

First. The land of Canaan is here secured to them for an inheritance; ver. 14, "I have lifted up my hand to give it unto your fathers," that is, promised it upon oath to them and their posterity. Though the possession had been a great while discontinued, yet God had not forgot his oath which he sware to their fathers. Though God's providences may for a time seem to contradict his promises, yet the promise will certainly take place at last, for God will be ever mindful of his covenant. "I lifted up my hand to give it," and therefore it shall without fail "fall to you for an inheritance." Thus the heavenly Canaan is sure to all the seed, because it is what God, that cannot lie, hath promised.

Secondly. It is here circumscribed, and the bounds and limits of it fixed, which they must not pass over to encroach upon their neighbours, and which their neighbours shall not break through to encroach upon them. We had such a draught of the borders of Canaan when Joshua was to put the people in possession of it, Num. xxxiv. 1, &c. That begins with the salt sea in the south, goes round, and ends there. This begins with Hamath, about Damascus in the north, and so goes round, and ends there, ver. 20. Note, It is God that appointeth the bounds of our habitation; and his Israel shall always have cause to say that the lines are fallen to them in pleasant places. The lake of Sodom is here called the East sea; for, it being healed by the waters of the sanctuary, it is no more to be called a salt sea, as it was in Numbers.

Thirdly. It is here ordered to be divided among the tribes of Israel, reckoning Joseph for two tribes, to make up the number of twelve, when Levi was taken out to attend the sanctuary, and had his lot adjoining to that, ver. 13, 21; "Ye shall inherit it one as well as another," ver. 14. The tribes shall have an equal share, one as much as another. As the tribes returned out of Babylon this seems unequal, because some tribes were much more numerous than other; and, indeed, the most were of Judah and Benjamin, and very few of the other ten tribes. But as the twelve tribes stand in type and vision for the gospel church, the Israel of God, it was very equal, because we find in another vision an equal number of each of the twelve tribes sealed for the living God, just twelve thousand of each, Rev. vii. 5, &c.; and to those sealed ones these allotments did belong. It intimates, likewise, that all the subjects of Christ's kingdom have obtained like precious faith. Male and female, Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are all alike welcome to Christ, and made partakers of him.

Fourthly. The strangers that sojourn among them, "which shall beget children," and be built up into families, and so help to people their country, shall have inheritance among the tribes, as if they had been native Israelites, ver. 22, 23, which was by no means allowed in Joshua's division of the land. This is an act for a general naturalization, which would teach the Jews who was their neighbour, not those only of their own nation and religion, but those, whoever they were, that they had an opportunity of shewing kindness to, because from them they would be willing to receive kindness. It would likewise invite strangers to come and settle among them, and put themselves under the wings of the Divine majesty. But it certainly looks at gospel times, when the partition wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and both put upon a level before God, both made one in Christ, in whom "there is no difference," Rom. x. 12.

This land was a type of the heavenly Canaan, that better country, Heb. xi. 16, in which believing Gentiles shall have a blessed lot, as well as believing Jews, Isa. lvi. 3.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

In this chapter we have particular directions given for the distribution of the land, of which we had the metes and bounds assigned in the foregoing chapter. I. The portions of the twelve tribes: seven to the north of the sanctuary, ver. 1—7; and five to the south, ver. 23—29. II. The allotment of land for the sanctuary and the priests, ver. 8—11; for the Levites, ver. 12—14; for the city, ver. 15—20; and for the prince, ver. 21, 22. Much of this we had before, ch. xlv. III. A plan of the city, its gates, and the new name given to it, ver. 30—35; which seals up and concludes the vision and prophecy of this book.

NOW these are the names of the tribes. From the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath, Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus northward, to the coast of Hamath; for these are his sides east and west; a portion for Dan. 2 And by the border of Dan, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Asher. 3 And by the border of Asher, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Naphtali. 4 And by the border of Naphtali, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Manasseh. 5 And by the border of Manasseh, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Ephraim. 6 And by the border of Ephraim, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Reuben. 7 And by the border of Reuben, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Judah. 8 And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the offering which ye shall offer of five and twenty thousand reeds in breadth, and in length as one of the other parts, from the east side unto the west side: and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. 9 The oblation that ye shall offer unto the LORD shall be of five and twenty thousand in length, and of ten thousand in breadth. 10 And for them, even for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: and the sanctuary of the LORD shall be in the midst thereof. 11 It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok; which have kept my charge, which went not astray when the children of Israel went astray, as the Levites went astray. 12 And this oblation of the land that is offered shall be unto them a thing most holy by the border of the Levites. 13 And over against the border of the priests the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand. 14 And they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the firstfruits of the land: for it is holy unto the LORD. 15 And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city, for dwelling, and for suburbs: and the city shall be in the midst thereof. 16 And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and the west side four thousand and five hundred. 17 And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty. 18 And the residue in length over against the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them that serve the city. 19 And they that serve the city shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel. 20 All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation foursquare, with the possession of the city. 21 And the residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city, over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation toward the east border, and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof. 22 Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince. 23 As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side, Benjamin shall have a portion. 24 And by the border of Benjamin, from the east side unto the west side, Simeon shall have a portion. 25 And by the border of Simeon, from the east side unto the west side, Issachar a portion. 26 And by the border of Issachar, from the east side unto the west side, Zebulun a portion. 27 And by the border of Zebulun, from the east side unto the west side, Gad a portion. 28 And by the border of Gad, at the south side southward, the border shall be even from Tamar unto the waters of strife in Kadesh, and to the river toward the great sea. 29 This is the land which ye shall divide by lot unto the tribes of Israel for inheritance, and these are their portions, saith the Lord GOD.

We have here a very short and ready way taken for the dividing of the land among the twelve tribes, not so tedious and so far about as the way that was taken in Joshua's time; for in the distribution of spiritual and heavenly blessings there is not that danger of murmuring and quarrelling as in the participation of temporal blessings. When God gave to the labourers every one his penny, those that were uneasy at it were soon put to silence with, May I not do what I will with my own? And such is the equal distribution here among the tribes. In this distribution of the land we may observe,

1. That it differs very much from the division of it in Joshua's time, nor agrees with the order of their birth, or their blessing by Jacob or Moses. Simeon here is not divided in Jacob, nor is Zebulun a haven of ships, a plain intimation that it is not so much to be understood literally as spiritually, though the mystery of it is very much hidden from us. In gospel times old things are passed away; "Behold, all things are become new." The Israel of God is cast into a new method.

2. That the tribe of Dan, which was last provided for in the first division of Canaan, Jos. xix. 40, is first provided for here, ver. 1. Thus, in the Gospel, the last shall be first, Mat. xix. 20. God, in the dispensations of his grace, doth not follow the same method that he doth in the disposals of his providence. But

Dan had now his portion thereabouts where he had only one city before, northward, on the border of Damascus, and farthest of all from the sanctuary, because that tribe had revolted to idolatry.

3. That all the ten tribes that were carried away by the king of Assyria, as well as the two tribes that were long after carried to Babylon, have their allotment in this visionary land, which some think had its accomplishment in the particular persons and families of those tribes which returned with Judah and Benjamin, of which we find many instances in Ezra and Nehemiah; and it is probable there were returns of many more afterwards, at several times, which are not recorded; and the Jews having Galilee, and other parts, that had been the possessions of the ten tribes, put into their hands, in common with them, they enjoyed them. Grotius says, If the ten tribes had repented and returned to God, as the "chief fathers of Judah and Benjamin did, and the priests and Levites," Ezr. i. 5, they should have fared as those two tribes did; but they forfeited the benefit of this glorious prophecy by sin. However, we believe it has its designed accomplishment in the establishment and enlargement of the gospel church, and the happy settlement of all those who are Israelites indeed, in the sure and sweet enjoyment of the privileges of the new covenant, in which there is enough for all, and enough for each.

4. That every tribe, in this visionary distribution, had its particular lot assigned it by the Divine appointment; for it was never the intention of the Gospel to pluck up the hedge of property, and lay all in common; it was in a way of charity, not of legal right, that the first Christians had all things common, Acts ii. 44. Many precepts of the Gospel suppose that every man should know his own. And we must not only acknowledge but acquiesce in the hand of God appointing us our lot, and be well pleased with it, believing it fittest for us. "He shall chose our inheritance for us," Ps. xlvii. 4.

5. That the tribes lay contiguous; by the border of one tribe was the portion of another, all on a row, in exact order, so that, like stones in an arch, they fixed, and strengthened, and wedged in one another. "Behold, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren" thus "to dwell together!" It was a figure of the communion of churches and saints under the gospel government; thus, though they are many, yet they are one, and should hold together in holy love and mutual assistance.

6. That Reuben, which before lay at a distance beyond Jordan, now lies next to Judah, and next but one to the sanctuary; for the scandal he lay under, for which he was told he should not excel, began by this time to wear off. What has turned to the reproach of any person or people ought not to be remembered for ever, but should at length be kindly forgotten.

7. That the sanctuary was in the midst of them. There were seven tribes to the north of it, and the Levites, the princes, and the city's portion, with that of five tribes more, to the south of it; so that it was, as it ought to be, in the heart of the kingdom, that it might diffuse its benign influences to the whole, and might be the centre of their unity. The tribes that lay most remote from each other would meet there in a mutual acquaintance and fellowship. Those of the same parish or congregation, though dispersed, and having no occasion otherwise to know each other, yet, by meeting statedly to worship God together, should have their hearts knit to each other in holy love.

8. That where the sanctuary was the priests were; "For them, even for the priests, shall this holy oblation be," ver. 10. As on the one hand this speaks honour and comfort to ministers, that what is given for their support and maintenance is reckoned a holy oblation to the Lord, so it speaks their duty, which is, that since they are appointed and maintained for the service of the sanctuary, they ought to attend continually to this very thing, to reside on their cures. Those that live upon the altar must serve at the altar, not take the wages to themselves, and devolve the work upon others. But how can they serve the altar, his altar they live upon, if they do not live near it?

9. Those priests had the priests' share of these lands that had approved themselves faithful to God in times of trial, ver. 11; it shall be for "the sons of Zadok," who it seems had signalised themselves in some critical juncture, and went not astray when the children of Israel, and other the Levites, went astray. God will put honour upon them, and hath special favours in reserve for them, who keep their integrity in times of general apostacy. Those are swimming upwards, and so they will find at last, that are swimming against the stream.

10. The land which was appropriated to the ministers of the sanctuary might by no means be alienated. It was in the nature of the firstfruits of the land, and was therefore holy to the Lord; and, though the priests and Levites had both the use of it and the inheritance of it, to them and their heirs, yet they might not sell it or exchange it, ver. 14. It is sacrilege to convert that to other uses which is dedicated to God.

11. The land allotted for the city and its suburbs is called "a profane place," ver. 15, or common: not but that the city was a holy city, above other cities, for the Lord was there, but, in comparison with the sanctuary, it was a profane place. Yet it is too often true in the worst sense, that great cities, even those that, like this, have the sanctuary near them, are profane places, and it ought to be sadly lamented. It was the complaint of old, "from Jerusalem is profaneness gone forth into all the land," Jer. xxiii. 15.

12. The city is made to be exactly foursquare, and the suburbs extending themselves equally on all sides, as the Levites' cities did in the first division of the land, ver. 16, 17, which, never being literally fulfilled in any city, intimates, that it is to be understood spiritually of the beauty and stability of the gospel church, that city of the living God, which is formed according to the wisdom and counsel of God, and is made firm and immoveable by his promise.

13. Whereas before the inhabitants of Jerusalem were principally of Judah and Benjamin, in whose tribes it lay, now the head city lies not in the particular lot of any of the tribes, but "they that serve the city," and bear office in it, "shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel," ver. 19. The most eminent men must be picked out of "all the tribes of Israel" for the service of the city, because many eyes were upon it, and there was great resort to it from all parts of the nation, and from other nations. They that live in the city are said to serve the city, for wherever we are we must study to be serviceable to the place, some way or other, according as our capacity is. They must not come out of the tribes of Israel to the city to take their ease and enjoy their pleasures, but to serve the city, to do all the good they can there, and in so doing they would have a good influence upon the country too.

14. Care was taken that those who applied themselves to public business in the city, as well as in the sanctuary, should have an honourable, comfortable maintenance: lands are appointed, the increase whereof "shall be food unto them that serve the city," ver. 18. Who goes a warfare at his own charges? Magistrates that attend the service of the state, as well as ministers that attend the service of the church, should have all due encouragement and support in so doing: and for this cause pay we tribute also.

15 The prince had a lot for himself suited to the dignity of his high station, ver. 21, (we took an account of it before, ch. xlv.) He was seated near the sanctuary, where the testimony of Israel was, and near the city, where the thrones of judgment were, that he might be a protection to both, and might see that the duty of both was carefully and faithfully done; and herein he was a minister of God for good to the whole community. Christ is the church's prince, that defends it on every side, and creates a defence; nay, he is himself a defence upon all its glory, and compasseth it with his favour.

16. As Judah had his lot next the sanctuary on one side, so Benjamin had, of all the tribes, his lot nearest it on the other side, which honour was reserved for them who adhered to the house of David and the temple at Jerusalem, when the other ten tribes went astray from both. It is enough if treachery and apostacy, upon repentance, be pardoned, but constancy and fidelity shall be rewarded and preferred.

30 And these are the goings out of the city on the north side, four thousand and five hundred measures. 31 And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel: three gates northward; one gate of Reuben, one gate of Judah, one gate of Levi. 32 And at the east side four thousand and five hundred: and three gates; and one gate of Joseph, one gate of Benjamin, one gate of Dan. 33 And at the south side four thousand and five hundred measures: and three gates; one gate of Simeon, one gate of Issachar, one gate of Zebulun. 34 At the west side four thousand and five hundred, with their three gates; one gate of Gad, one gate of Asher, one gate of Naphtali. 35 It was round about eighteen thousand measures: and the name of the city from that day shall be, The LORD is there.

We have here a farther account of the city that should be built for the metropolis of this glorious land, and to be the receptacle of those who should come from all parts to worship in the sanctuary adjoining. It is nowhere called Jerusalem, nor is the land, which we have had such a particular account of the dividing of, anywhere called the land of Canaan; for the old names are forgotten, to intimate that the old things are done away, behold, all things are become new. Now, concerning this city, observe here,

First. The measures of its outlets, and the grounds belonging to it, for its several conveniences; each way its appurtenances extended four thousand and five hundred measures, eighteen thousand in all, ver. 35. But what these measures were is uncertain; it is never said in all this chapter whether so many reeds, as our translation determines, by inserting that word, ver. 8, each reed containing six cubits and a span, ch. xl. 5, (and why should the measurer appear with a measuring reed in his hand of that length if he did not measure with that, except where it is expressly said he measured by cubits?) or whether, as others think, it is so many cubits, because those are mentioned, ch. xlv. 2; xlvii. 3; yet that makes me incline rather to think that, where cubits are not mentioned, it must be intended so many lengths of the measuring reed. But those who understand it of so many cubits are not agreed whether it be meant of the common cubit, which was half a yard, or the geometrical cubit, which for better expedition is supposed to be mostly used in surveying lands, which some say contained six cubits, others about three cubits and a half, so making a thousand cubits the same with one thousand paces, that is, an English mile. But our being left at this uncertainty is an intimation that these things are to be understood spiritually, and that what is principally meant is, that there is an exact and just proportion observed by Infinite Wisdom in modelling the gospel church, which, though now we cannot discern, we shall when we come to heaven.

Secondly. The number of its gates. It had twelve gates in all, three on each side, which was very agreeable when it lay four square; and these twelve gates inscribed to the twelve tribes. Because the city was to be served "out of all the tribes of Israel," ver. 19, it was fit that each tribe should have its gate; and Levi being here taken in, to keep to the number twelve, Ephraim and Manasseh are made one in Joseph, ver. 32. On the north side were the gates of Reuben, Judah, and Levi, ver. 31; on the east, the gates of Joseph, Benjamin, and Dan, ver. 32; on the south, the gates of Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun, ver. 33; and on the west, the gates of Gad, Asher, and Naphtali, ver. 34. Conformable to this, in St. John's vision, the new Jerusalem, (for so the holy city is called there, though not here,) has twelve gates, three of a side, and on them are written "the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel," Rev. xxi. 12, 13. Note, Into the church of Christ, both militant and triumphant, there is a free access by faith, for all that come, of every tribe, from every quarter. Christ has "opened the kingdom of heaven for all believers." Whoever will may come and take of the water of life, of the tree of life, freely.

Thirdly. The name given to this city; from that day, when it shall be new erected according to this model, the name of it shall be, not as before, Jerusalem, 'the vision of peace,' but, which is the original of that, and more than equivalent to it, Jehovah-shammah, "the Lord is there," ver. 35. This intimated,

1 That the captives, after their return, should have manifest tokens of God's presence with them, and his residence among them, both in his ordinances and in his providences. They should have no occasion to ask, as their fathers did, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? for they shall see and say that he is with them of a truth; and then, though their troubles were many, and threatening, they were like the bush which burned, but was not consumed, because the Lord was there. But when God departed from their temple, when he said, Migremus hinc,—'let us go hence,' their house was soon left unto them desolate. Being no longer his, it was not much longer theirs.

2. That the gospel church should likewise have the presence of God in it, though not in the Shechinah, as of old, yet in a token of it no less sure, that of his Spirit. Where the Gospel is faithfully preached, gospel ordinances duly administered, and God worshipped in the name of Jesus Christ only, it may truly be said, "The Lord is there;" for faithful is he that hath said it, and will be as good as his word, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The Lord is there in his church to rule and govern it, to protect and defend it, and graciously to accept and own his sincere worshippers, and to be nigh unto them in all that they call upon him for. This should engage us to keep close to the communion of saints, for the Lord is there; and then whither else shall we go to mend ourselves? Nay, it is true of every good Christian, he dwells in God and God in him. Whatever soul has in it a living principle of grace, it may be truly said, "The Lord is there."

3. That the glory and happiness of heaven should consist chiefly in this, that "the Lord is there." St. John's representation of that blessed state doth indeed far exceed this in many respects. That is all gold, and pearls, and precious stones; it is much larger than this, and much brighter, for it needs not the light of the sun. But in making the presence of God the principal matter of its bliss they both agree. There the happiness of the glorified saints is made to be that "God himself shall be with them," Rev. xxi. 3, that "he that sits on the throne shall dwell among them," Rev. vii. 15; and here it is made to crown the bliss of this holy city, that "the Lord is there." Let us therefore give all diligence to make sure to ourselves a place in that city, that we may be for ever with the Lord.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF EZEKIEL.

CHAP. I.—1. Among the captives by the river Chebar. Ezekiel was carried captive with Jehoiachim, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3406, and before Christ 598. He was placed with many of his countrymen upon the banks of the river Chebar, (still called Khabour,) which joins the Euphrates at Carchemish, between two and three hundred miles to the north-west of Babylon.

CHAP. III.—18. Thou shalt surely die. That is, If he turn not from his wickedness, and thou givest him not warning, as above, he shall die in his iniquity, which he should not have committed; but his blood will I require at thy hand—I will visit thy soul for the loss of his. O how awful is this! Hear it, ye priests, ye preachers, ye ministers of the Gospel; ye, especially, who have entered into the ministry for a living; ye who gather a congregation to yourselves that ye may feed upon their fat, and clothe yourselves with their wool; in whose parishes and in whose congregations souls are dying unconverted from day to day, who have never been solemnly warned by you, and to whom you have never shown the way of salvation, probably because ye know nothing of it yourselves! O, what a perdition awaits you! To have the blood of every soul that has died in your parishes or in your congregations unconverted laid at your door! To suffer a common damnation for every soul that perishes through your neglect! How many loads of endless woe must such have to bear! Ye take your tithes, your stipends, or your rents, to the last grain and the last penny; while the souls over whom you made yourselves watchmen have perished, and are perishing, through your neglect. O worthless and hapless men! better for you had ye never been born! Vain is your boast of apostolical authority, while ye do not the work of apostles! Vain your boasting of orthodoxy, while ye neither shew nor know the way of salvation! Vain your pretensions to a Divine call, when ye do not the work of evangelists! The state of the most wretched of the human race is enviable to that of such ministers, pastors, teachers, and preachers. But let not this discourage the faithful minister who teaches every man, and warns every man, in all wisdom, that he may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. If after such teaching and warning they will sin on, and die in their sins, their blood will be upon themselves; but thou, O man of God, hast delivered thine own soul.—A. Clarke.

CHAP. IV.—15. Cow's dung. Here is sufficient intimation that the Hebrews sometimes employed animal dung for fuel. It is still used in some regions of Western Africa. In winter we have seen it used in the best rooms of some of the most respectable houses in towns of Northern Persia; and while travelling through the same country, and some parts of Media and Armenia, when we formed our camp near the villages, all the children who were old enough would come out with baskets to gather it. It is much used for baking, being considered preferable to any other fuel for that purpose, as it is by the villagers in Devonshire. See Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. VIII.—'In this remarkable chapter,' says Dr. Wilson, (Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 105,) 'the Israelites are represented as imitating the idolatry of the Syrians, 1—5; the Egyptians, ver. 10—12; the Phœnicians, ver. 14; and the Persians, ver. 14.' Referring to Dr. Abbot's Collection of Egyptian Antiquities at Cairo, he adds, 'The numerous images and drawings of the gods of the Egyptian pantheon, human, superhuman, and infrahuman, remind us of the time when the Egyptians worshipped "every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all idols," or (as in the original) 'nastiness.'

> 'Genii with heads of birds, hawks, ibis, drakes,
> Of lions, foxes, cats, fish, frogs, and snakes,
> Bulls, rams, and monkeys, hippopotami,
> With knife in paw, suspended from the sky;
> Gods germinating men, and men turned gods,
> Seated in honour, with gilt crooks and rods;
> Vast scarabæi, globes by hands upheld
> From chaos springing, mid an endless field
> Of forms grotesque—the sphinx, the crocodile,
> And other reptiles from the slime of Nile.'—Hall's Life of Salt.

10. Pourtrayed on the wall round about. It is very likely that these images pourtrayed on the wall were the objects of Egyptian adoration: the ox, the ape, the dog, the crocodile, the ibis, the scarabæus or beetle, and various other things. It appears that these were privately worshipped by the Sanhedrim or great Jewish council, consisting of seventy or seventy-two persons, six chosen out of every tribe, as representatives of the people. The images were pourtrayed upon the wall as we find those ancient idols are on the walls of the tombs of the kings and nobles of Egppt. See the plates to Belzoni's Travels, the Isaic tomb in the Bodleian library, and the Egyptian heiroglyphics in general. (Also the various wood engravings of Egyptian tombs in this work, especially at ver. 10.) Virgil speaks of these, Æn. lib. viii.:—

> 'All kinds of gods, monsters, and barking dogs.'

14. Women weeping for Tammuz. 'This was Adonis,' says Adam Clarke, and adds, 'My old MS. Bible reads, "There saten women, mornynge a mawmete of ..echerye that is cleped Adonydes." He is fabled to have been a beautiful youth beloved by Venus, and killed by a wild boar in mount Lebanon, whence springs the river Adonis, which was fabled to run blood at his festival in August. The women of Phœnicia, Assyria, and Judæa worshipped him as dead, with deep lamentation, wearing priapi and other obscene images all the while, and they prostituted themselves in honour of this idol. Having for some time mourned him as dead, they then supposed him revivified, and broke out into the most extravagant rejoicings. Of the appearance of the river at this season, Mr. Maundrell thus speaks:—"We had the good fortune to see what is the foundation of the opinion which Lucian relates, viz., that this stream at certain seasons of the year, especially about the feast of Adonis, is of a bloody colour, proceeding from a kind of sympathy, as the heathens imagined, for the death of Adonis, who was killed by a wild boar in the mountain out of which this stream issues. Something like this we saw actually come to pass, for the water was stained to a surprising redness; and, as we observed in travelling, had stained the sea a great way into a reddish hue." This was, no doubt, occasioned by a red ochre, over which the river ran with violence at this time of its increase. Milton works all this up in these fine lines:—

> "Thammuz came next behind,
> Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
> The Syrian damsels to lament his fate,
> In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
> While smooth Adonis, from his native rock,
> Ran purple to the sea, suffused with blood
> Of Thammuz, yearly wounded. The love tale
> Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
> Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
> Ezekiel saw, when by the vision led,
> His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
> Of alienated Judah."—Paradise Lost, b. i. 446.

Tammuz signifies hidden or obscure, and hence the worship of his image was in some secret place.'—A. Clarke.

CHAP. X.—13. O wheel, or rather, move round. They are put in mind of continually attending upon their duty; for the wheels and living creature were animated with the same principle of understanding and instinct, ch. i. 19, 21.—Lowth.

CHAP. XII.—7. I digged through the wall with mine hand. See Note on ch. xiii. 10. 19. They shall eat their bread with carefulness—that her land may be desolate. The oppressions of the government on one side, and those of the Bedouins on the other, have reduced the Fellah of the Haouran to a state little better than that of the wandering Arab. Few individuals, either among the Druses or Christians, die in the same village in which they were born. Families are continually removing from one place to another; in the first year of their new settlement the sheikh acts with moderation towards them; but, his vexations becoming in a few years insupportable, they fly to some other place where they have heard that their brethren are better treated, but they soon find that the same system prevails over the whole country. Sometimes it is not merely the pecuniary extortion, but the personal enmity of the sheikh, or of some of the head men of the village, which drives a family from their home, for they are always permitted to depart. This continued wandering is one of the principal reasons why no village in the Haouran has either orchards, or fruit trees, or gardens for the growth of vegetables.—Burckhardt, p. 299. 'Shall we sow for strangers?' was the answer of a Fellah, to whom I once spoke on the subject, and who, by the word strangers, meant both the succeeding inhabitants, and the Arabs who visit the Haouran in the spring and summer, Isa. xxxiii. 9; Eze. xii. 19. It is thus, according to the prophetic word, that Bashan, like Carmel, has shaken off, and still shakes off, its fruits. It is thus also, as the Lord hath said, that the inhabitants of the land of Israel, as in manifold similar illustrations besides, eat their bread with carefulness; and the land is desolate from all that was therein, because of the violence of all them that dwelt therein.—Dr. Keith's Land of Israel.

> 'How has kind Heav'n adorned the happy land,
> And scattered blessings with a wasteful [bounteous] hand!
> But what avail her unexhausted stores,
> Her blooming mountains and her sunny shores,
> With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart,
> The smiles of nature, and the charms of art,
> While proud oppression in her valleys reigns,
> And tyranny usurps her happy plains?'—Addison.

CHAP. XIII.—10. One built up a wall, &c. The plaster in the East is made of clay and straw, the latter being chopped and beaten small, and serving the same purpose as ox hair with our plasterers. This to be good must be well tempered, which is generally done by long continued treading or beating. Walls formed of this material, and raised upon a foundation of stone or brick, were very ancient, and are still very common in the East. They resemble the cob walls of Devonshire, forming the subject of a paper, No. 116, of the Quarterly Review, which, as quoted in Pictorial Bible, (on ch. xii.,) contains the following remarks. 'Ezekiel, of all the prophets best acquainted with the customs of the Phœnicians, of which the thirty-seventh chapter is a proof, when speaking of breaking through a wall invariably used the words "dig through," διορυττειν,—"I digged through the wall with mine hand" (Eze. xii. 7); this would be impossible in the case of a stone or brick wall, but by no means so as to one of cob. The identical expression is used twice by our Saviour himself, Mat. vi., "Lay up for yourselves treasures—where thieves do not break through and steal"—ὅπου κλέπται μη διορύσσουσιν, where thieves "do not dig through." In fact, the common Greek term for a housebreaker was τοιχωρυχος, a wall-breaker. Therefore the author of that most ancient book, Job, in the fourth chapter, adverts to the little trust to be placed in those "who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, who are crushed by the moth." A very high authority has suggested that by the moth is meant the white ant. It is clear that some sort of those destructive insects are alluded to which so notoriously harbour in walls of clay, that is, of cob.' 13. I will bring him to Babylon—yet shall not he see it, though he shall die there. The prophet Jeremiah foretold of Zedekiah, that his eyes should behold the eyes of the king of Babylon; and here Ezekiel predicts that he should not see Babylon though he should die there. We are informed by Josephus, that the king, thinking these prophecies contradicted each other, gave no credit to either. But both proved true; for, being taken captive and carried to Riblah, he there saw Nebuchadnezzar, and then his eyes were put out, and he was sent to Babylon, where he remained for the rest of his life; so that he saw not that city though he died in it.—Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. XVI.—2. Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations. And such a revelation of impurity never was seen before or since. Surely the state of the Jews, before the Babylonish captivity, was the most profligate and corrupt of all the nations of the earth. This chapter contains God's manifesto against this most abominable people, and although there are many metaphors here yet all is not metaphorical. Where there was so much idolatry there must have been adulteries, fornications, prostitutions, and lewdness of every description. The description of the prophet is sufficiently clear, except where there is a reference to ancient and obsolete customs. What a description of crimes!—A. Clarke, (whose also is the first part of Note under ver. 12.) 8. Spread my skirt over thee. See Supplementary Note on Ru. iii. 9. 13. Thou didst prosper into a kingdom. Here the figure explains itself: by this wretched infant, the low estate of the Jewish nation in its origin is pointed out; by the growing up of this child into woman's estate, the increase and multiplication of the people; by her being decked out and ornamented, her tabernacle service, and religious ordinances; by her betrothing and consequent marriage, the covenant which God made with the Jews; by her fornication and adulteries, their apostacy from God, and the establishment of idolatrous worship, with all its abominable rites; by her fornication and whoredoms with the Egyptians and Assyrians, the sinful alliances which the Jews made with those nations, and the incorporation of their idolatrous worship with that of Jehovah; by her lovers being brought against her, and stripping her naked, the delivery of the Jews into the hands of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans, who stripped them of all their excellences, and at last carried them into captivity. This is the key to the whole of this long chapter of metaphors; and the reader will do well to forget the figures, and look at the facts.——The figurative mode of describing idolatry by spiritual adultery, often used by the prophets, is pursued here with great force, and at considerable length. We are not to judge of these metaphors by modern ideas, but of those of the times and places in which they were used, where many of the expressions would not sound as they do to us. It must likewise be remembered that the design was to raise the highest detestation of idolatry, and that such metaphors were well calculated for the purpose.—Dr. John Smith.

CHAP. XVIII.—26, 27. When a righteous man. It is an old opinion, that prevails among the Jews even till this day, that at the day of judgment a considerable number of good actions shall overbalance men's evil ones; so that they thought it a hard case for a man who had been righteous the far greatest part of his life, if he did at last commit iniquity, that his former righteousness should avail him nothing. In opposition to this doctrine, God here declares, that a righteous man, sinning and not repenting, should die in his sins, and that a wicked man, upon his repentance, should save his soul alive. (Lowth.) Notwithstanding this plain declaration, it is obvious that the notion current among the Jews is equally current among the generality of professed Christians, though directly opposite to the whole doctrine of Scripture, and even subversive of it.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XXI.—21. Divination: he made his arrows bright. Four kinds of divination are particularly mentioned in sacred history, viz. by the cup, (see Supplementary Note on Gen. xliv. 5,) by arrows, by inspecting the livers of slaughtered animals, and by the staff. Divination by arrows was an ancient method of presaging future events. Jerome, in his commentary on Eze. xxi. 21, says that 'the manner of divining by arrows was thus: they wrote on several arrows the names of the cities against which they intended to make war, and then, putting them promiscuously all together into a quiver, they caused them to be drawn out in the manner of lots, and that city whose name was on the arrow first drawn out was the first they assaulted. This method of divination was practised by the idolatrous Arabs, and prohibited by Mohammed, and was likewise used by the ancient Greeks, and other nations.—Divination by inspecting the liver of slaughtered animals was another mode of ascertaining future events, much practised by the Greeks and Romans, by the former of whom it was termed Ἡπατοσκοπια, or looking into the liver. This word subsequently became a general term for divination by inspecting the entrails of sacrifices, because the liver was the first and principal part observed for this purpose. To this method of divination there is an allusion in Eze. xxi. 21.—Rabdomancy, or divination by the staff, is alluded to by the prophet Hosea (iv. 12); it is supposed to have been thus performed: the person consulting measured his staff by spans, or by the length of his finger, saying, as he measured, 'I will go, or I will not go; I will do such a thing, or, I will not do it;' and as the last span fell out so he determined. Cyril and Theophylact, however, give a different account of the matter. They say that it was performed by erecting two sticks, after which they murmured forth a certain charm, and then, according as the sticks fell, backwards or forwards, towards the right or left, they gave advice in any affair.—Horne's Introduction.

CHAP. XXIII.—14. Men pourtrayed. The figure in wood-cut (ver. 9) is that of an Assyrian, as engraved, with many others, on a rock at Nahr-el-Kelb, near Beirut, and there seen by Dr. Wilson, who, referring to the inscription, says, 'Perhaps it may be found to bear the name of a Shalmanezer, Sargon, Sennacherib, or Esarhaddon, who extended the conquests of the Assyrians to the shores of the Mediterranean.' These and the other sculptures and drawings of a similar kind lately found elsewhere, the same author considers particularly worthy of notice in connexion with this passage in Ezekiel, in which, when the adulterous infidelity of Samaria and Jerusalem are strictly characterised and reprobated, allusion is made to the gorgeously clothed Assyrians, "men pourtrayed," &c., ver. 14.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. p. 409. 25. They shall take away thy nose and thine ears. These barbarous punishments have always been most extensively in use in the East, and examples without number of their infliction might be adduced from history, ancient and modern. As the mystical adulterers of Israel and Judah are the subject of this allegory, it may be instructive to learn that in Egypt the noses of adulterous persons were cut off, and in Chaldea both their ears and noses. For some offences, in the East, the nose has been and is cut off; for others, the ears; and frequently both members at once. Indeed there seems at all times to have been a barbarous fancy for joining these two members in the same punishment. It does not appear that the Hebrews ever exercised such mutilations; but they must have known them well as inflicted by their heathen neighbours. Even in modern times this punishment has been inflicted on persons of consideration. Thus the notorious Djezzar of Acre seldom allowed those about him to remain long in possession of their ears and noses, and often deprived them of their eyes and hands. 'There were,' says Dr. Clarke, 'persons standing by the door of his apartment, some without a nose, others without an arm, with one ear only, or one eye—"marked men," as he termed them; persons bearing signs of having been instructed to serve their master with fidelity.'—Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. XXV.—2. Set thy face against. 'Look thou towards the coast of the Ammonites, and in this posture do thou prophesy against them.'—Bp. Hall. 5. Rabbah, a place for camels: see Jer. xlix. 2, Rabbah shall be a desolate heap. Rabbah, which properly denotes a great city or metropolis, is applied in Scripture to the capital of the Ammonites. 'For the space of two miles before reaching Ammon, pieces of broken pottery strewed over the ground indicate the approach to the ruins of a great city. The remains of a large isolated building of excellent masonry, with sculptured blocks scattered near it on the ground, first meet the view of the traveller, once, as is supposed, an outer gate of the city, or a triumphal entrance. The castle of Ammon, a large inclosed ruin, occupying entirely the summit of a small steep hill, has the appearance of a fortress. On the other side the wall ascends like a sloping mole, the masonry of which is excellent, the stones being squarely hewn, and nicely adjusted, &c. The steep ascent of this ruined mass is passed over large heaps of fallen stones, till the eastern gateway is reached, which leads to an open square court, with arched recesses on each side, originally open, which had arched doorways facing each other. These were all either wholly closed or partially filled up, with the single exception of a narrow passage, just sufficient for the entrance of one man, and of the goats which the Arab keepers drive in here occasionally for shelter during the night.'—Buckingham's Travels among the Arab Tribes, pp. 60—66. 'We passed many ruined cities, and the country has once been very populous, but during the whole day's ride, thirty-five miles at least, we did not see a single village; the whole country is one vast pasture, overspread by the flocks and herds of the Schoor and Beni Hassan Bedouins. Ammon is now quite deserted, except by the Bedouins. Re-ascending we saw sheep and goats by thousands, and camels by hundreds, coming down to drink, all in beautiful condition. How—let me cite the prophecy—how runs it, "Ammon shall be a desolation. Rabbah of the Ammonites shall be a desolate heap. I will make Rabbah a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks, and ye shall know that I am the Lord."'—Lord Lindsay's Letters. 8—14. Moab—Seir—Edom. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xvi. 16. Philistines—I will destroy the remnant of the sea coasts: see Zeph. ii. 6, And the sea coasts shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks. Volney, (though, like one who in ancient times was instrumental to the fulfilment of a special prediction, 'he meant not so, neither did his heart think so,') from the manner in which he generalizes his observations, and marks the peculiar features of the different districts of Syria, with greater acuteness and perspicuity than any other traveller whatever, is the ever-ready purveyor of evidence in all the cases which came within the range of his topographical description of the wide field of prophecy; while at the same time, from his known, open, and zealous hostility to the Christian cause, his testimony is alike decisive and unquestionable; and the vindication of the truth of the following predictions may safely be committed to this redoubted champion of infidelity. 'In the plain between Ramla and Gaza,' (Volney's Travels, vol. ii. 335, 336,)—the very plain of the Philistines along the sea coast—'we met with a number of villages, badly built of dried mud, and which, like the inhabitants, exhibit every mark of poverty and wretchedness. The houses, on a nearer view, are only so many huts, (cottages,) sometimes detached, at others ranged in the form of cells around a court-yard, enclosed by a mud wall. In winter they and their cattle may be said to live together, the part of the dwelling allotted to themselves being only raised two feet above that in which they lodge their beasts—("dwelling and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks.") Except the environs of these villages, all the rest of the country is a desert, and abandoned to the Bedouin Arabs, who feed their flocks on it.'—Keith on Prophecy. See Supplementary Note on Jer. xlvii. 5.

CHAP. XXVI.—4. Scrape her dust from her—and make her like the top of a rock—(the bare shining surface of a rock—Dr. Newcome's note)—a place for the spreading of nets. Alexander the Great seems actually to have scraped away the very rubbish as well as the stones of old Tyre to construct his causeway; (Humus aggerebatur, the words of Quintius Curtius, quoted by Dr. Keith, are very remarkable;) and now the bare rocks along the shore, in some part of which the ancient city must have stood, are literally a place for the spreading of nets. The first man we met in the gate of Tyre was a fisherman carrying a load of fish, and the fishing boats in the harbour we have already mentioned. If, indeed, the sea has made an advance upon the coast, then the very rocks where old Tyre stood may be now under water, and the nets of the fisherman may be literally spread over them. And this, also, would give new meaning to the expression, "Thou shalt be broken by the seas in the depths of the water," Eze. xxvii. 34; although at the same time the ruin of her fleets and merchant ships will completely satisfy the terms of the prophecy. How interesting, too, is the very uncertainty that hangs over the true situation of ancient Tyre, some placing it on the shore, some at Ras-el-Ain farther inward, and some on a rocky eminence called Marshuk, to the north-east—all combining to shew how awfully the thrice-repeated curse has been fulfilled, "I will make thee a terror and thou shalt be no more;" and how true to the letter, "Though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again."—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xxiii.

CHAP. XXVII.—3. The entry of the sea. The Mediterranean. Tyrus—a merchant of the people for many isles. 4. Thy borders are in the midst of the seas. Tyre was every way conveniently placed to unite in commerce Asia, Africa, and Europe, the whole of the known world at that time; especially it was the centre for the trade of Asia, and the East Indies, with the many isles, &c., of Europe. 5. They have made all thy ship boards—that is, decks—of fir trees, &c. The Phœnicians were the teachers of the Greeks and Romans in ship-building, and had a skill therein not contemptible, even compared with the like works at the present day. 6. Of ivory. Ornamented with ivory. Chittim. Meaning the islands on the coasts of the Mediterranean, Jer. ii. 10. 7. Fine linen—to be thy sail. Most probably sails were then usually made of matting, as, according to Niebuhr, is the case at present on the Red Sea. Linen sails, therefore, indicated refinement and luxury. Blue and purple. These colours adorned the richest attire: see Ex. xxv. 4; Jer. x. 9. Isles of Elishah. Elishah was a son of Javan, Gen. x. 4; and the isles so called are supposed to have been Greece. 8. Arvad. The Arvadite is mentioned, Gen. x. 18. 9. Gebal. A Phœnician town in which were the best mechanics, Jos. xiii. 5; 1 Kin. v. 18. 10. Lud. Thought to have been an Egyptian colony. Phut. In Africa. Were in thine army. They were the mercenaries of Tyre. They hanged the shield. They had a strong force at hand, and a ready armoury, like that in the tower of David, where hung the "shields of mighty men," Cant. iv. 4. 11. Arvad. See ver. 8. Were upon thy walls. The guards of the city walls. Gammadims. Perhaps a people of Phœnicia. These garrisoned the city. They have made thy beauty perfect. 'They set forth thy glory.'—Boothroyd. 12. Tarshish. The learned now generally think that Tarshish is Tartessus, a city of Spain, at the mouth of the river Bœtis, whence the Phœnicians, who first opened this trade, brought gold and silver, in which that country then abounded. 13. Javan. Greece, Dan. viii. 21; so called from Javan, the son of Japhet, Gen. x. 2, from whom the Greeks are called, in their own tongue, Ions. Tubal and Meshech. The people called Tibareni and Moschi, who dwelt near the Black Sea, and in the mountains between Iberia and Armenia. Traded the persons of men. That is, in slaves, Rev. xviii. 13. Grecian slaves were the most valuable, but Tubal and Meshech also sold slaves. This detestable traffic, which is still carried on in the world, ought to be held in universal execration, and the base souls that encourage slavery to be stigmatised as murderers, 1 Tim. i. 10. Vessels of brass. Copper mines are worked in Caucasus to this day. Here are Kubescha and Arzieni, or Erzerum, still famous for brass vessels. 14. Togarmah. See Gen. x. 3. Bochart understands Cappadocia; Michaelis prefers Armenia, which was much celebrated for its fine breed of horses. 15. Dedan. On the Persian Gulf, Gen. xxv. 3; probably imported goods from Eastern Asia. 16. Syria was thy merchant. Syria probably traded largely elsewhere, and sold and exchanged the merchandise of other countries with Tyre. 17. Judah, &c.—traded in thy market wheat, &c. In this way the Jews acquired their wealth, their land being extremely productive. The Tyrians grew nothing. Minnith. Was a place which belonged to the Ammonites, still a fertile spot, and then famous for its grain: see Jud. xi. 33. But Boothroyd's translation is, 'wheat, myrrh, and panic,' instead of 'wheat of Minnith and Pannag.' Rosenmuller thinks that Pannag means luxurious dried fruits, sweetmeats, &c. 18. Damascus, &c.—for the multitude of all riches. 'The abundance of all thy substance.'—Boothroyd. In the wine of Helbon. That is, Chalybon or Aleppo, in Syria; this wine was the only sort thought good enough for the tables of the Persian kings. And white wool. The wool was dyed purple at Tyre. The Damascenes still buy up and export the wool from the nomades of Arabia Deserta, whose flocks, always in the open air, produce the best. 19. Dan—Javan. These places were in Arabia. Javan may be pronounced Yeman in Arabia Felix. 20. Dedan. Different probably from that named in ver. 15; that was in the Persian Gulf, this in Edom or Arabia: see Dedan, Gen. xxv. 3. In precious clothes for chariots. 'In gorgeous apparel for horsemen.'—Boothroyd. Parkhurst understands it to signify horsecloths. 21. Kedar. In Arabia Petræa. For original possessor, see Gen. xxv. 13, &c. 22. Sheba and Raamah. Raamah near the Persian Gulf; named from Ramah, Gen. x. 7. Here too were the Sabeans in South Arabia. These brought, as now, caravans with Indian articles to Syria. 23. Haran, &c. Various tribes which inhabited Arabia Petræa, as some just before mentioned. The Sheba here is supposed to have been in Arabia Deserta, and spoken of Job i. 15. 24. In chests—made of cedar. Carefully packed in cedar for the sake of the scent, and for preservation. 25. Tarshish. This was the most celebrated mart in those times, and frequented by the Phœnicians. Did sing. Spoke strongly in praise of her. On this chapter, which contains the most ancient record in existence of the commerce of remote ages, we may observe, 1. That it is the wisdom of nations to encourage art and industry. As men must inhabit certain localities, though one country produces what another does not or cannot, so in the goodness of providence, while industry has its own reward, the whole world may reciprocally be favoured, through friendly commerce, with all the bounties providence has bestowed on the universal world. Prosperity has its snares, both for nations and individuals. Our own country has often been warned that its commerce is not on a rock. It depends much upon the friendship, the caprice, the stability, or the rivalry of other nations. 'Trade is a fluctuating thing: it passed from Tyre to Alexandria, from Alexandria to Venice, from Venice to Antwerp, from Antwerp to Amsterdam and London.' Our metropolis may not always be the mart of the world. Let us beware that pride and luxury and covetous speculation do not work our ruin. Our nation needs our prayers. The Tyrians are a beacon for us, for 'the like causes will always produce the like effects.' And Scott well remarks, 'that those who engage in commerce should remember that they are the servants of God, and learn to conduct their business according to the precepts of his word, in submission to his providence, and with an aim to his glory; and those who possess wealth should remember that they are his stewards.'—Domestic Bible by Rev. Ingram Cobbin.

CHAP. XXVIII.—22. I am against thee, O Zidon. All the magnificence of Sidon is gone, for "God has executed judgments in her," Eze. xxviii. 22. Again and again have its inhabitants been "judged in the midst of her by the sword on every side." There are no more any merchants worth mentioning in Sidon. In two or three shops fishing-rods were exposed for sale, but there were no signs of trade. "Be thou ashamed, O Zidon; for the sea hath spoken, even the strength of the sea, saying, I travail not nor bring forth children, neither do I nourish up young men, nor bring up virgins," Isa. xxiii. 4. The city, and the sea that laved its walls, now lament the want of its once crowded and stirring population. It no more can boast of a king. "All the kings of Zidon" have been made to drink the wine-cup of God's fury, even as it was foretold, Jer. xxv. 22.

CHAP. XXIX.—10. From the tower of Syene. Rather, 'from Migdol to Syene,' that is, the whole of the kingdom, for its northern extremity was Migdol, and its southern Syene. 15. It shall be the basest of the kingdoms. In Egypt there are only two classes—the conquerors and the vanquished. The former indulge in every crime which can disgrace the character of rulers—selfishness, rapacity, injustice. The latter are sunk into the most deplorable condition. Brutalized by the wars and revolutions which have for centuries surrounded them, exasperated by the injuries to which they are daily subject, stained by every vice, and groaning under every evil, the people of Egypt have fallen to an ineffable depth of wretchedness and meanness. Every traveller who speaks of them loads them with a profusion of the vilest terms which language supplies. Thevenot terms them 'exceedingly wicked, great rogues, cowardly, lazy, hypocrites.' Of the Mamelukes, the military body whom the Turks long employed in the government of the country, Volney says, 'Educated in ignorance and superstition, they become ferocious, from habitual murder; perfidious, from cabals; seditious, from riot; base, deceitful, and corrupted by every species of debauchery.' Of the people, Volney says: 'We may easily conceive that, in such a country, every thing is correspondent with its wretched government. The peasants are hired labourers, who only get what is barely sufficient to sustain life. Their habitations are mud-walled huts, where they are suffocated with heat and smoke, and often attacked with distempers, arising from uncleanness, dampness, and unwholesome food; and to these physical evils are added continual alarms, the dread of the robberies of the Arabs and the extortions of the Mamelukes, family quarrels, and all the miseries of constant civil wars. This is a faithful picture of all the villages, and no less so of the towns. Even at Cairo, the stranger, on his arrival, is struck with the appearance of universal wretchedness and misery. The crowds thronging the streets present nothing but filthy rags. Everything he sees or hears reminds him that he is in the abode of slavery and tyranny. Nothing is spoken of but intestine broils, public misery, pecuniary extortions, bastinadoes, and murders. There is no protection for life or property. Human blood is shed like that of the vilest animals. Justice herself condemns to death without form.' "It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations; for I will diminish them, and they shall no more rule over the nations." Can we not in this discern the righteous retribution of providence? Egypt was the first to impose a yoke upon the nations; not a yoke of dominion, but of a kind more degrading—a yoke of polytheism and gross idolatry. From her, as from a fountain, flowed all the superstition by which the earth was corrupted; and now, for ages, every people which have become the masters of the world have oppressed and despised her. But how amazing and inscrutable are the ways of God! As if to atone for the mischief she inflicted on the world in early time, Egypt is now conferring incalculable benefits upon it. Her monuments, inscribed with the history of the most early ages, are beginning to be deciphered; her temples and tombs to be explored; (see wood engravings in various parts of the work, especially in Psalms, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel;) and the first-fruits of a glorious harvest have been reaped, which, when the whole has been gathered in, will make one of the most magnificent offerings ever laid on the altar of revelation. It was only in the end of the last century that Voltaire affirmed that the Egypt of the Bible was a mistake; since that time, Egypt herself has been disinterred—the Egypt of four thousand years ago—and before this awful preacher from the dead the infidel stands silent and confounded.—Wylie's Journey over the Region of Fulfilled Prophecy.

CHAP. XXX.—3. The day of the Lord is near. The day when he would take vengeance on the oppressors of his people. 5. Ethiopia, &c. Meaning every land in league with Egypt. Mingled people. Arabians. Libya. A district of Africa. Lydia. This Lydia was in Upper Egypt. Chub. An Egyptian province in Mareotis. 7. Her cities, &c. Egypt was exceedingly populous, and more filled with cities than any other nation in the world at that time, which would render her desolation in this respect the more extraordinary. 8. A fire. So God's judgments are called. 9. Messengers in ships. Understood to refer to an expedition of Nebuchadnezzar, sent up the Nile, which awakened the fears of the Ethiopians. As in the day of Egypt. Boothroyd omits "as," which is better reading. 12. Rivers dry. The fertility of Egypt depended on the rise of the Nile; and this threatening implies that with the calamity of war would be that of famine. The wicked. The haughty and cruel Babylonians. 13. There shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt. This has been wonderfully fulfilled during twenty-three centuries, in which long period the land has been the prey of the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans, the Greeks, the Arabs, the Georgians, the Tartars, known as Ottoman Turks. The Mamelukes, purchased as slaves, and introduced as soldiers, soon usurped the power, and elected a leader; slaves brought from their original country replaced them. The sceptre of Egypt has departed. 13-18. Noph, &c. The chief places are here enumerated, and shew that all Egypt would be desolate. Noph. Perhaps Memphis, now Cairo, the ancient capital. Pathros. Thebais, a province and city. Zoan. Tanis, the metropolis in Moses' time, a noted city, Num. xiii. 22. No. Or Ammon, No, Jer. xlvi. 25. Sin. Pelusium, the key of Egypt and its strength, having had a safe harbour and many merchant ships. Aven. On, Gen. xli. 45. Pi-beseth. Bubastes, where was a splendid temple to the goddess of that name. Tehaphnehes. Or, Tahpanhes; supposed the same as Daphnæ-Pelusiacæ. 18. Yokes. Some read 'sceptres;' others understand the yokes imposed by the Egyptians.

CHAP. XXXII.—22. Ashur. Assyria. 23. Whose graves—the sides of the pit. Such are Eastern tombs; hewn out of the rock, with niches around to receive the bodies of the departed. 24. Elam. That is, Persia. 26. Meshech, Tubal, meaning Scythia. The Scythians were conquered by Babylon. The mode of sepulture in these countries is known by the name of barrow burial, which is actually described in ancient writings as practised by the very people of whom the prophet here speaks: see woodcut. 27. Not lie with the mighty. Who have died a natural death, and been buried with pomp. Have laid their swords under their heads. Many of the warriors of ancient times slept with their swords under their heads, and had them buried with them in the same manner. These customs still prevail in Mingrelia, the inhabitants of which are believed to be descendants of Meshech and Tubal. 29. There is Edom. See wood engraving in loc. See Supplementary Notes on Job iii. 14; on Isa. xxii. and xxxiv. See also wood engravings, Ps. lx.; the head-piece to Isaiah, representing Petra, the capital of Edom; and in Isa. xxii.; ch. xxxii. 29. Some of the above, and of the other wood engravings in this work, have been suggested by those in the Pictorial Bible, and we gratefully take this opportunity of expressing our obligations. Referring to the monuments in Petra, the city of tombs, the learned editor remarks, 'However rich externally, they present nothing in the interior but coarsely chiselled walls. There is, however, one exception, noticed by Laborde, of a sepulchral chamber, with rows of sculptured pillars, which forms the finest interior to be found in the place. 'When the Bedouins descend into the valley, this tomb, which is easily closed, serves as a stable for their herds. Such are the uses to which the costly monuments of human vanity have been converted.'—Laborde. And such, too, we may add, are the fulfilments which the predictions of the prophets concerning the desolation of Edom have received.

CHAP. XXXIII.—30. Still talking against (or concerning) thee by the walls and in the doors of the houses. However severe the cold weather sometimes is in these countries, there are intervals even in the depth of winter when the sun shines and there is no wind, and when it is perfectly warm—sometimes almost hot—in the open air. At such seasons the poorer classes in the East enjoy the conversation of their friends, sauntering about in the air, and sitting under the walls of their dwellings; while the houses of the more opulent inhabitants having porches or gateways, with benches on each side, the master of the family receives visitors there, and dispatches his business—few persons (not even the nearest relations) having farther admission except on extraordinary occasions. These circumstances materially illustrate a difficult passage in the prophet Ezekiel. It appears from ch. xxxiii. 21, that these things were transacted in the tenth month, corresponding with the close of our December or the commencement of January. The poorer people, therefore, sat under their walls for the benefit of the sun, while those in better circumstances sat in their porchways or gateways to enjoys its genial rays.—Horne's Introduction.

CHAP. XXXV.—15. Thou shalt be desolate, O mount Seir. See wood engraving, and reference made to Edom in Supplementary Note, ch. xxxii. 29.

CHAP. XXXVII.—11. Our hope is lost. 'Later in the evening a well-educated young Jew called on us. Hearing that we had been inquiring about the practicability of instituting schools among the Jews, he came to offer himself as a teacher.—He conversed with us in Latin, always addressing us by the title of "Dominatio vestra." When telling us that he had given up all expectation of the restoration of his own people to their own land, and of the coming of Messiah, he used this remarkable expression, "Despero, despero," that is, "I have no hope of it." The very term used by the prophet Ezekiel, when he foretold what would be the state of Israel before the breath should enter into them, "Behold, they say, Our bones are dried and our hope is lost."'—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative. See also account of the Jews in their own land, in Volume II., 601 and following pages, of Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, where it is said, 'It is not the destruction of the world, so much as the non-appearance or delay of the Messiah, which the Jews so much fear, and which they employ the devotees to prevent by mourning and supplication. The most affecting scene altogether which I witnessed in the Holy Land was the praying of the Khasidim at Tiberias. Their excitement and apparent importunity were frightful; and they appeared as if determined at once to take heaven by storm, springing upon their toes, beating their breasts, and groaning and crying simultaneously at the highest pitch of their voices. Mr. Graham, who was with me on the occasion, as well as myself, was quite overcome by the scene, and by the manifest delusion under which the poor Jews evidently laboured. Dr. Wolff has given us, in his journals, the prayers which the Karaim chant at Jerusalem, at the place of mourning, in sight of the great ancient stones in the western wall of the temple. "Early will I seek my congregation, that is exceedingly afflicted; and visit mine habitation, (to view) the dreadful destruction. The fences are thrown down, and the walls are demolished; (nothing is seen but) gloomy darkness, waste, and desolation—Where is the service, the testimony, the priesthood, and the Levites? Where is the kingdom that administered justice with purity without deceit? Where are the faithful, brought up in the lap of truth, lovely as the moon, and bright as the sun? They now witness their covenant with the grave; their dwellings are in the caverns of the young harts, and in the neglected depths. Over them spring up grass and herbage, forming pastures for the wild goats and kids. Morning and evening are they exposed to the cold and drought, or swept away by the strong flood, and carried over the sea, without (seeing) an end to their captivity, by which their souls are afflicted, and their souls consumed. For the sea through which they passed, destruction is its path, death is its pilot, and the grave its ship. (There is) horror, dread, and fear; for there is no voice, nor any that answereth in all the ship. The lovely congregation was sold to be cut off; bruised and cast to the stretched-out sword. And the seed are dispersed, oppressed, and trampled (under foot): born to plagues and dreadful wounds. Their father also abhorred them and their mother; and besides them married the daughters of strangers: even the Amorites, the Hittites, the Hagarites, the Chittites, the Midianites, and Moabites. Oh, may their Father in his infinite mercy compassionate his orphans, and gather his dispersed to the pure land! For he is high and exalted; he bringeth down and raiseth up; he woundeth and healeth; killeth and restoreth to life. O Lord, return to thy city! build thine oracle, dwell in thine house, and gather thy scattered (flock). O thou who renewest the months, collect the saints, both men and women, to the erected city! O may this month be renewed for good! and may it please God, who is mighty in works, thus to command."'

CHAP. XL.—2. Very high mountain. Moriah, say some, but this was not very high. Others think the Christian church. It is probable that the more immediate accomplishment of this prophecy will be subsequent to the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, the destruction of Gog and Magog, and the pouring out of the Spirit, mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter; and it will perhaps continue through the thousand years, during which Satan will be chained up in the bottomless pit.—Scott. 3. He stood in the gate. He appeared in the character of a surveyor. 5. So he measured the breadth of the building, &c. There has never been any temple answering the description here given. Some think that the ground plan is nearly the same as that of Solomon's temple, and might be taken as a guide for the erection of the temple after the return from the captivity. But commentators have come to no decision as to what city, temple, and land are intended, or whether the reference is to former or future times; whether this and the subsequent chapters are to be understood literally or figuratively; or whether it relates to the church on earth or in heaven. The literal interpretation receives a strong check from the river of water springing from the threshold of the temple, enlarging till it reached the Dead Sea, and sweetening its waters; with the trees growing on the banks of the river, bearing fruit every month. Some yet future and extraordinary enlargement of the church seems to be here predicted. In the mean time we should learn that the great Builder of the spiritual temple, whose power and glory are infinite and eternal, always works by rule; and, whilst he performs his secret counsels, he requires us to compare all our works with the standard of his word. Every part of Scripture is Divine, useful, and important, in different ways or to different persons; but it may not all be so immediately useful to us; others have had, and others will have, the benefit of some portions which are to us not so intelligible or full of instruction. But if we cannot understand or edify by any part of Scripture, we should humbly acknowledge our own ignorance, and adore the Divine wisdom and knowledge, and not allow ourselves to start objections on that account. Yet, as some portions are more clear, and to us, at least, more important than others, so a fondness for the study of the obscure parts in preference to the obvious, is a folly, and a temptation sometimes even of godly men.—Scott.

CHAP. XLI.—1. Afterward he brought me, &c. This chapter introduces the reader into the sacred edifice, the exterior of which was before described. 18. Cherubims: were intended to symbolize the presence of Jehovah. Palm trees: were intended to symbolize the character of the true worshippers; denoting integrity, perseverance, victory, Ps. xcii. 12; Cant. vii. 7; Rev. vii. 9.

CHAP. XLII.—1. Then he brought me, &c. This is by some commentators supposed to describe buildings not before mentioned.

CHAP. XLIII.—4. And the glory of the Lord came into the house. All external institutions of religion derive their excellency and efficacy from the presence and manifested glory of God in them; and as this glory is displayed in Christ our "Sun of righteousness," we sinners may behold it with comfort. His voice, indeed, is very terrible to his enemies, and at first excites great commotion and consternation in the hearts of his chosen people; but when they are taught by the Holy Spirit they experience its power accompanied with peace and comfort to their souls. 7. Carcases of their kings. Michaelis supposed that some of their idolatrous kings might have been buried in the precincts of Solomon's temple, and perhaps afterwards idolized: see 2 Kin. xxi. 18—26. 8. In their setting of their threshold, &c. The thresholds of the idol temples are peculiarly sacred, and there they are wont to pay their humblest adorations.

CHAP. XLIV.—2. Gate shall be shut—because the Lord—hath entered in by it. Among other marks of respect paid to a sovereign in the East, this is one, that the gate whereby he enters is in future closed to all other persons. 25. And they shall come, &c. From this verse those to the end are repetitions of the Mosaic law, as ver. 26, Num. xix. 11; ver. 28, Deu. x. 9; ver. 29, Lev. xxvi.; xxvii. 28, Num. xviii. 14; ver. 30, Num. xv. 20; vi. 23, Deu. x. 8; ver. 31, Ex. xxii. 31, Lev. xxii. 8. All, says T. Scott, in his observations on this chapter, who are employed in the ministry should be of harmless and blameless conversation; sound in the faith, full of good works; of exemplary temperance, sobriety, and gravity; walking humbly before God, and circumspectly in the sight of men; not arrogating honour to themselves, or leading the people into a superstitious veneration of them, yet acting honourably, and maintaining a sober peculiarity in their whole conduct. They should perform the most common actions of life in a pious and sanctified manner; their apparel, and the whole of their style of living, should be plain, simple, frugal, and such as manifests their indifference about worldly things; they should be careful in forming connexions, and in the choice of wives, and prudent in the management of their families; and shew that they are governed by reason, conscience, and the fear of God, not by passion and humour, in all matters. Lord, increase the number of faithful and exemplary ministers, and enlarge and prosper the spiritual priesthood all over the whole earth!

CHAP. XLV.—1. Offer an oblation to the Lord. 15. Meat offering: more properly the bread offering, for it was made of fine flour mingled with oil, Lev. ii. 5, 6. It is the duty of Christians, according to their ability, to provide for the decent and comfortable subsistence of ministers, that they may attend to their work without distraction. But it becomes ministers to be content even with a scanty provision, and to "suffer all things rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ." Subjects, also, should willingly contribute what is requisite to the honourable support of their governors and the charges of government; and princes, especially the princes of Israel, ought to imitate the equity and lenity of Christ our King; they should use their authority for the good of the people, and lay no needless or oppressive burthens on them; and if any have deviated from these salutary rules, (as, alas, too many have and still do,) they must be warned to proceed no farther, but to remove all violence and spoil, and to terminate all exactions. These are the duties of men in every age; and the happy time is coming when all ranks in every part of the earth will attend to them. But our very best duties are polluted with sin; errors, ignorance, and simplicity, as well as our wilful sins, need the same cleansing in the fountain of the Redeemer's blood.—Scott.

CHAP. XLVI.—4. Six lambs. The Mosaic law appointed only two lambs, without a ram: see Num. xxviii. 8. The other proportions of the meat and drink offerings are also different: compare ver, 4, 6, 7, and 14, with Num. xxviii. 9, 11, 12. 14. Every morning. The morning offering only is mentioned; an important difference from the Jewish ritual: see Ex. xxix. 38—46.

CHAP. XLVII.—1. Waters issued, &c. Literally, no such waters were ever in the temple; and, because there were none, Solomon had the brazen sea made for the use of the temple. 5. Waters were risen. A beautiful representation of the gradual progress of the Gospel. 8. The waters shall be healed. This finely represents the tendency of the Gospel to heal the corruptions of human nature. 11. But the miry places, &c. Here the waters obtained no entrance, representing the case of those who reject, neglect, or pervert the Gospel; or those countries which exclude it from them. 12. And by the river—grow all trees, &c. The writer of the Apocalypse has almost transcribed this part of the vision, and applied it to the salvation of Christ, as perfected in the felicity of heaven. 13. This shall be the border. Dr. Keith considers this as pointing out the boundaries and extent of the Holy Land, when it shall, as he conceives, be restored to the Jewish people. W. Lowth says, 'There is, without question, a mystical sense implied under this literal description.' 16. Hamath. A city and province of Syria, on the river Orontes, and the northern point of the land towards the west frontier.——The more carefully we examine the things of God and religion, the more interesting will be our discoveries concerning them. All our invaluable privileges and advantages are conveyed to us through the Gospel; they flow from Christ our temple, altar, and door of access to the Father; they all spring from the everlasting love and mercy of our God through his atoning sacrifice, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and the course of the greatest rivers might far more easily be stopped than the progress of his Gospel when God is pleased to prosper the labours of his servants. It has hitherto continued gradually to diffuse its influence; and it will still gradually run wider and deeper in its energy and effects, till it shall fill, heal, and fructify the whole earth.—Scott.

CHAP. XLVIII.—35. The name of the city—the Lord is there. The descriptive name here given to the city, Jehovah-Shammah, is sufficiently definite, as implying God's continual presence with his church under every dispensation.—Domestic Bible. Whether these latter chapters (says the Editor of the work last quoted) were written to aid in the erection of a new temple after the destruction of that built by Solomon, or to guide the builders of a temple yet to be erected, or to represent in mystical terms an unearthly temple, the church of God in which he is and shall be worshipped and adored—it ought to be considered as a portion of the inspired word of God, which is written for our instruction; and, in the absence of a better light than that which is at present shed upon it, we should view it as such, and endeavour to derive from it that edification which it is calculated to give; not indulging in vain fancies by spiritualizing, as it is called, every little particular in the sacred structure, and making the word of God a toy for our imaginations, but turning it to such account that we may be aided in ourselves "growing up a holy temple in the Lord—an habitation of God through the Spirit." For this purpose, the pious and judicious remarks of Scott have been used. The Lord make us meet to be "partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light," and inhabitants of "the holy Jerusalem," where "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it," and where it may emphatically be said, as in the language of the prophet, "The Lord is there."

THE PROPHET DANIEL,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE book of Ezekiel left the affairs of Jerusalem under a doleful aspect, all in ruins, but with a joyful prospect of all in glory again. This of Daniel fitly follows. Ezekiel told us what was seen, and what was foreseen, by him in the former years of the captivity; Daniel tells us what was seen, and foreseen, in the latter years of the captivity. When God employs different hands, yet it is about the same work. And it was a comfort to the poor captives that they had first one prophet among them and then another, to shew them how long, and a sign that God had not quite cast them off. Let us inquire,

I. Concerning this prophet. His Hebrew name was Daniel, which signifies, 'the judgment of God;' his Chaldean name was Belteshazzar. He was of the tribe of Judah, and, as it should seem, of the royal family; he was betimes eminent for wisdom and piety. Ezekiel, his contemporary, but much his senior, speaks of him as an oracle, when thus he upbraids the king of Tyre with his conceitedness of himself, "Thou art wiser than Daniel," Eze. xxviii. 3. He is likewise there celebrated for success in prayer, when Noah, Daniel, and Job are reckoned as three men who had the greatest interest in heaven of any other, Eze. xiv. 14. He began betimes to be famous, and continued long so. Some of the Jewish rabbins are loth to acknowledge him to be a prophet of the higher form, and therefore rank his book among the Hagiographa, not among the prophecies, and would not have their disciples pay much regard to it. One reason they pretend is, because he did not live such a mean mortified life as Jeremiah, and some other of the prophets, did, but lived like a prince, and was a prime minister of state; whereas we find him persecuted as other prophets were, ch. vi., and mortifying himself as other prophets did, when he ate no pleasant bread, ch. x. 3, and fainting and sick when he was under the power of the spirit of prophecy, ch. viii. 27. Another reason they pretend is, because he wrote his book in a heathen country, and there had his visions, and not in the land of Israel; but by the same reason Ezekiel also must be expunged out of the roll of prophets. But the true reason is, he speaks so plainly of the time of the Messiah's coming that the Jews cannot avoid the conviction of it, and therefore do not care to hear of it. But Josephus calls him one of the greatest of the prophets, nay, the angel Gabriel calls him "a man greatly beloved." He lived long an active life in the courts and councils of some of the greatest monarchs the world ever had,—Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius; for we mistake if we confine the privilege of an intercourse with heaven to speculative men, or those who spend their time in contemplation. No; who was more intimately acquainted with the mind of God than Daniel, a courtier, a statesman, and a man of business? The Spirit, as the wind, blows where it lists. And if those who have much to do in the world plead that as an excuse for the seldomness and slightness of their converse with God, Daniel will condemn them. Some have thought he returned to Jerusalem, and was one of the masters of the Greek synagogue, but nothing of that appears in Scripture; it is, therefore, generally concluded he died in Persia, at Susa, where he lived to be very old.

II. Concerning this book. The first six chapters of it are historical, and are plain and easy; the six last are prophetical, and in them are many things dark and hard to be understood, which yet would be more intelligible if we had a more complete history of the nations, and especially of the Jewish nation, from Daniel's time to the coming of the Messiah. Our Saviour intimates the difficulty of apprehending the sense of Daniel's prophecies, when speaking of them he saith, "Let him that readeth understand," Mat. xxiv. 15. The first chapter, and the three first verses of the second chapter, are in Hebrew; thence to the eighth chapter is in the Chaldee dialect; from thence to the end is in Hebrew. Mr. Broughton observes, that as the Chaldeans were kind to Daniel, and gave cups of cold water to him when he requested it, rather than the king's wine, God would not have them lose their reward, but made that language which they taught him to have honour in his writings through all the world unto this day. Daniel, according to his computation, continueth the holy story from the first surprising of Jerusalem by the Chaldean Babel, when he himself was carried away captive, until the last destruction of it by Rome, the mystical Babel, for so far forward his predictions look, ch. ix. 27. The fables of Susanna, and of Bel and the Dragon, in both which Daniel is made a party, are apocryphal stories, which we think we have no reason to give any credit to, they being never found in the Hebrew or Chaldee, but only in the Greek, nor ever admitted by the Jewish church. There are some, both of the histories and of the prophecies of this book, that bear date in the latter end of the Chaldean monarchy; and others, of both, that are dated in the beginning of the Persian monarchy; but both Nebuchadnezzar's dream which he interpreted and his own visions point at the Grecian and Roman monarchy, and very particularly at the Jews' troubles under Antiochus, which it would be of great use to them to prepare for, as his fixing the very time for the coming of the Messiah was to all them that waited for the consolation of Israel, and is to us for the confirming of our belief, that this is he who should come, and we are to look for no other.

A.M. 3397. B.C. 607.

CHAPTER I.

This chapter gives us a more particular account of the beginning of Daniel's life, his original and education, than we have of any other of the prophets. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, began immediately with Divine visions; but Daniel began with the study of human learning, and was afterwards honoured with Divine visions; such variety of methods has God taken in training up men for the service of his church. We have here, I. Jehoiakim's first captivity, ver. 1, 2, in which Daniel, with others of the seed royal, were carried to Babylon. II. The choice made of Daniel, and some other young men, to be brought up in the Chaldean literature, that they might be fitted to serve the government, and the provision made for them, ver. 3—7. III. Their pious refusal to eat of the portion of the king's meat, and their determining to live upon pulse and water, which, having tried it, the master of the eunuchs allowed them to do, finding that it agreed very well with them, ver. 8—16. IV. Their wonderful improvement above all their fellows in wisdom and knowledge, ver. 17—21.

IN the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it. 2 And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God: which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god; and he brought the vessels into the treasure house of his god. 3 And the king spake unto Ashpenaz the master of his eunuchs, that he should bring certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, and of the princes; 4 Children in whom was no blemish, but well favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans. 5 And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king. 6 Now among these were of the children of Judah, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: 7 Unto whom the prince of the eunuchs gave names: for he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar; and to Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abed-nego.

We have in these verses an account.

First. Of the first descent which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, made upon Judah and Jerusalem, in the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim, and his success in that expedition, ver. 1, 2. He besieged Jerusalem, soon made himself master of it, seized the king, took whom he pleased and what he pleased away with him, and then left Jehoiakim to reign as tributary to him, which he did about eight years longer, but then rebelled, and it was his ruin. Now from this first captivity most interpreters think the seventy years are to be dated, though Jerusalem was not destroyed, nor the captivity completed, till about nineteen years after. In that first year Daniel was carried to Babylon, and there continued the whole seventy years, (see ver. 21,) during which time all nations shall serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son, Jer. xxv. 11. So that this one prophet saw, within the compass of his own time, the rise, reign, and ruin of that monarchy; so that it was res unius ætatis,—'the affair of a single age.' Such short-lived things are the kingdoms of the earth, but the kingdom of heaven is everlasting. The righteous, that see them taking root, shall see their fall, Job v. 3; Pr. xxix. 16. Mr. Broughton observes the proportion of times in God's government since the coming out of Egypt—thence to their entering Canaan forty years—thence seven years to the dividing of the land—thence seven jubilees to the first year of Samuel, in whom prophecy begun—thence to this first year of the captivity seven seventies of years (four hundred and ninety, ten jubilees)—thence to the return one seventy—thence to the death of Christ seven seventies more—and from thence to the destruction of Jerusalem forty years.

Secondly. The improvement he made of this success. He did not destroy the city or kingdom, but did that which just accomplished the first threatening of mischief by Babylon; it was that denounced against Hezekiah, for shewing his treasure to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, Isa. xxxix. 6, 7, that the treasures and the children should be carried away; and if they had been humbled and reformed by this, hitherto the king of Babylon's power and success should have gone, but no farther. If lesser judgments do the work, God will not send greater; but if not, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter. Let us see what was now done.

1. The vessels of the sanctuary were carried away, part of them, ver. 2. They fondly trusted to the temple to defend them, though they went on in their iniquity; and now, to shew them the vanity of that confidence, the temple is first plundered. Many of the holy vessels which used to be employed in the service of God were taken away by the king of Babylon, those of them, it is likely, that were most valuable, and he brought them as trophies of victory to the "house of his god," to whom, with a blind devotion, he gave the praise of his success; and, having appropriated these vessels in token of gratitude to his god, he put them in the treasury of his temple. See the righteousness of God; his people had brought the images of other gods into his temple, and now he suffers the vessels of the temple to be carried into the treasuries of those other gods. Note, When men profane the vessels of the sanctuary with their sins, it is just with God to profane them by his judgments. It is likely the treasures of the king's house were rifled, as was foretold; but particular mention is made of the taking away of the vessels of the sanctuary, because we shall find afterwards that the profanation of them was that which filled up the measure of the Chaldeans' iniquity, ch. v. 3. But observe, it was only part of them that went now, some were left them yet upon trial, to see if they would take the right course to prevent the carrying away of the remainder: see Jer. xxvii. 18.

2. The children and young men, especially such as were of noble or royal extraction, that were sightly and promising, and of good natural parts, were carried away. Thus was the iniquity of the fathers visited upon the children. These were taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, 1st. As trophies to be made a show of, for the evidencing and magnifying of his success. 2nd. As hostages for the fidelity of their parents in their own land, who would be concerned to carry themselves well, that their children might have the better treatment. 3rd. As a seed to serve him. He took them away to train them up for employments and preferments under him; either out of an unaccountable affectation, which great men often have, to be attended by foreigners, though they be blacks, rather than by those of their own nation, or because he knew that there were no such witty, sprightly, ingenious young men to be found among his Chaldeans as abounded among the youth of Israel; and, if that were so, it was much for the honour of the Jewish nation, as of an uncommon genius above other people, and a fruit of the blessing. But it was a shame that a people that had so much wit should have so little wisdom and grace. Now observe,

First. The directions which the king of Babylon gave for the choice of these youths, ver. 4. They must not choose such as were deformed in body, but comely and well-favoured, whose countenances were indexes of ingenuity and good humour. But that is not enough: they must be skilful in all wisdom and cunning, or well seen in knowledge, and understanding science; that were quick and sharp, and could give a ready and intelligent account of their own country, and of the learning they had hitherto been brought up in. He chose such as were young, because they would be pliable and tractable, would forget their own people and incorporate with the Chaldeans. He had an eye to what he designed them for; they must be such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, not only to attend his royal person, but to preside in his affairs. This is an instance of the policy of this rising monarch, now in the beginning of his reign, and was a good omen of his prosperity, that he was in care to raise up a succession of persons fit for public business. He did not, like Ahasuerus, appoint them to choose him out young women for the service of his lusts, but young men for the service of his government. It is the interest of princes to have wise men employed under them; it is, therefore, their wisdom to take care for the finding out and training up of such. It is the misery of this world that so many who are fit for public stations are buried in obscurity, and so many who are unfit for them are preferred to them.

Secondly. The care which he took concerning them. 1*st.* For their education. He ordered that they should be taught "the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans." They are supposed to be wise and knowing young men, and yet they must be farther taught. "Give instructions to a wise man, and he will increase in learning." Note, Those who would do good in the world when they are grown up must learn when they are young—that is the learning age. If that time be lost, it will hardly be redeemed. What unlawful arts were used among the Chaldeans—magic and divination—it doth not appear that Nebuchadnezzar designed they should learn them; if he did, Daniel and his fellows would not defile themselves with them. Nay, we do not find that he ordered them to be taught the religion of the Chaldeans. By this it appears he was at this time no bigot; if men were skilful and faithful, and fit for his business, it was not material to him what religion they were of, provided they had but some religion. They must be trained up in the language and laws of the country, in history, philosophy, and mathematics; in the arts of husbandry, war, and navigation; in such learning as might qualify them to serve their generation. Note, It is real service to the public to provide for the good education of youth. 2*nd.* For their maintenance. He provided for them three years, not only necessaries, but dainties, for their encouragement in their studies. They had "daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank," ver. 5. This was an instance of his generosity and humanity. Though they were his captives, he considered their birth and quality, their spirit and genius, and treated them honourably, and studied to make their captivity easy to them. There is a respect owing to those who are well born and bred, when they are fallen into distress. With a liberal education there should be a liberal maintenance.

Thirdly. A particular account of Daniel and his fellows. They were of the children of Judah, the royal tribe, and probably of the house of David, which was grown a numerous family. And God told Hezekiah, that of the children that should issue from him some should be taken and made eunuchs or chamberlains in the palace of the king of Babylon. The prince of the eunuchs changed the names of Daniel and his fellows, partly to shew his authority over them, and their subjection to him, and partly in token of their being naturalized and made Chaldeans. Their Hebrew names, which they received at their circumcision, had something of God or Jah in them. Daniel, 'God is my Judge;' Hananiah, 'the grace of the Lord;' Mishael, 'he that is the strong God;' Azariah, 'the Lord is a help.' To make them forget the God of their fathers, the guide of their youth, they give them names that smell of the Chaldean idolatry. Belteshazzar signifies 'the keeper of the hid treasures of Bel:' Shadrach, 'the inspiration of the sun,' which the Chaldeans worshipped; Meshach, 'of the goddess Shach,' under which name Venus was worshipped; Abed-nego, 'the servant of the shining fire,' which they worshipped also. Thus, though they would not force them from the religion of their fathers to that of their conquerors, yet they did what they could by fair means insensibly to wean them from the former, and instil the latter into them. Yet see how comfortably they were provided for; though they suffered for their fathers' sins they were preferred for their own merits, and the land of their captivity was made more comfortable to them than the land of their nativity at this time would have been.

8 But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank: therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself. 9 Now God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs. 10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces worse liking than the children which are of your sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king. 11 Then said Daniel to Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, 12 Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days; and let them give us pulse to eat, and water to drink. 13 Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king's meat: and as thou seest, deal with thy servants. 14 So he consented to them in this matter, and proved them ten days. 15 And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat. 16 Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink; and gave them pulse.

We observe here, very much to our satisfaction,

First. That Daniel was a favourite with "the prince of the eunuchs," ver. 9, as Joseph was with the keeper of the prison. He had a tender love for him. No doubt Daniel deserved it, and recommended himself by his ingenuity and sweetness of temper; he was greatly beloved, ch. ix. 23; and yet it is said here it was God that brought him into favour with the prince of the eunuchs, for every one doth not meet with acceptance according to his merits. Note, The interest which we think we make for ourselves we must acknowledge to be God's gift, and must ascribe to him the glory of it. Whoever are in favour, it is God that has brought them into favour; and it is by him that they find good understanding. Herein was again verified that word, Ps. cvi. 46, "He makes them to be pitied of all those that carried them captives." Let young ones know that the way to be acceptable is to be tractable and dutiful.

Secondly. That Daniel was still firm to his religion. They had changed his name, but they could not change his nature; whatever they pleased to call him, he still retained the spirit of an Israelite indeed. He would apply his mind as closely as any of them all to his book, and took pains to make himself master of the "learning and tongue of the Chaldeans;" but he was resolved "he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat," he would not meddle with it, "nor with the wine which he drank," ver. 8. And having communicated his purpose, with the reasons of it, to his fellows, they concurred in the same resolution, as appears, ver. 11. This was not out of sullenness, or peevishness, or a spirit of contradiction, but from a principle of conscience. Perhaps it was not in itself unlawful for them to "eat of the king's meat," or to "drink of his wine;" but,

1. They were scrupulous concerning the meat, lest it should be sinful. Sometimes such meat would be set before them as was expressly forbidden by their law, as swine's flesh; or, they were afraid lest it should have been offered in sacrifice to an idol, or blessed in the name of an idol. The Jews were distinguished from other nations very much by their meats, Lev. xi. 45, 46, and these pious young men, being in a strange country, thought themselves obliged to keep up the honour of their being a peculiar people. Though they could not keep up their dignity as princes, they would not lose it as Israelites; for by that they most valued themselves. Note, When God's people are in Babylon they have need to take special care that they partake not in her sins. Providence seemed to lay this meat before them; being captives, they must eat what they could get, and must not disoblige their masters; yet, if the command be against it, they must abide by that. Though Providence saith, "Kill and eat," conscience saith, "Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean has come into my mouth."

2. They were jealous over themselves, lest, though it should not be sinful in itself, it should be an occasion of sin to them; lest, by indulging their appetites with these dainties, they should grow sinful and voluptuous, and in love with the pleasures of Babylon. They had learned David's prayer, "Let me not eat of their dainties," Ps. cxli. 4; and Solomon's precept, "Be not desirous of dainties, for they are deceitful meat," Pr. xxiii. 3; and accordingly they form their resolution. Note, It is very much the praise of all, and especially of young people, to be dead to the delights of sense, not to covet them, not to relish them, but to look upon them with an indifferency. Those that would excel in wisdom and piety must learn betimes to "keep under the body, and bring it into subjection."

3. However they thought it unreasonable now, when Jerusalem was in distress, and they themselves in captivity, they had no heart "to drink wine in bowls," so much were they "grieved for the affliction of Joseph." Though they had royal blood in their veins, yet they did not think it proper to have royal dainties in their mouths, when they were thus brought low. Note, It becomes us to be humble under humbling providences. "Call me not Naomi, call me Marah." See the benefit of affliction; by the account Jeremiah gives of the princes and great men now at Jerusalem it appears they were very corrupt and wicked, and defiled themselves with things offered to idols, while these young gentlemen that were in captivity would not defile themselves, no, not with their "portion of the king's meat." How much better is it with those that retain their integrity in the depths of affliction than with those that retain their iniquity in the heights of prosperity. Observe, the great thing that Daniel avoided was, defiling himself with the pollutions of sin. That is the thing we should be more afraid of than of any outward trouble. Daniel having taken up this resolution, he "requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself;" not only that he might not be compelled to do it, but that he might not be tempted to do it; that the bait might not be laid before him; that he might not see the portion appointed him of the king's meat, nor look upon the wine when it was red. It will be easier to keep the temptation at a distance than to suffer it to come near, and then be forced to put a knife to our throat. Note, We cannot better improve our interest in any with whom we have found favour than to make use of them to keep us from sin.

Thirdly. That God wonderfully owned him herein. When Daniel requested that he might have none of the king's meat or wine set before him, the prince of the eunuchs objected that, if he and his fellows were not found in as good case as any of their companions, he should be in danger of having anger, and of losing his head, ver. 10.

Daniel, to satisfy him that there would be no danger of any ill consequences, desires the matter might be put to a trial. He applies himself farther to the under-officer, Melzar, or the steward: Prove us for ten days; during that time let us have nothing but herbs and fruits, or parched peas or lentils, and nothing but water to drink, and see how we can live upon that, and proceed accordingly, ver. 13. People will not believe the benefit of abstemiousness and a spare diet, nor how much it contributes to the health of the body, unless they try it. Trial was accordingly made. Daniel and his fellows lived for ten days upon pulse and water. Hard fare for young men of genteel extraction and education, and which one would rather expect they should have contended against than petitioned for; but "at the end of the ten days" they were compared with the other children, and were found "fairer and fatter in flesh," of a more healthful look and a better complexion, than "all those which did eat the portion of the king's meat," ver. 15. This was in part a natural effect of their temperance, but it must be ascribed to the special blessing of God, which will make a little to go a great way, a dinner of herbs better than a stalled ox. By this it appears that "man lives not by bread alone." Pulse and water shall be the most nourishing food, if God speak the word. See what it is to keep ourselves pure from the pollutions of sin; it is the way to have that comfort and satisfaction which will be "health to the navel, and marrow to the bones," while the pleasures of sin are "rottenness to the bones."

Fourthly. That his master countenanced him. The steward did not force them to eat against their consciences, but, as they desired, "gave them pulse and water, ver. 16, the pleasures of which they enjoyed, and we have reason to think were not envied the enjoyment. Here is a great example of temperance, and contentment with mean things; and, as Epicurus said, 'He that lives according to nature will never be poor, but he that lives according to opinion will never be rich.' This wonderful abstemiousness of these young men in the days of their youth contributed to the fitting of them, 1. For their eminent services. Hereby they kept their minds clear and unclouded, and fit for contemplation, and saved for the best employments a great deal both of time and thought: and thus they prevented those diseases which indispose men for the business of age, that owe their rise to the intemperances of youth. 2. For their eminent sufferings. They that had thus inured themselves to hardship, and lived a life of self-denial and mortification, could the more easily venture upon the fiery furnace and the den of lions, rather than sin against God.

17 As for these four children, God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams. 18 Now at the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar. 19 And the king communed with them; and among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: therefore stood they before the king. 20 And in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king enquired of them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm. 21 And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus.

Concerning Daniel and his fellows, we have here,

First. Their great attainments in learning, ver. 17. They were very sober and diligent, and studied hard; and, we may suppose, their tutors, finding them of an uncommon capacity, took a deal of pains with them; but, after all, their achievements are ascribed to God only. It was he that "gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom, for "every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights." It is the Lord our God that gives men power to get this wealth. The mind is furnished only by him that formed it. The great learning which God gave these four children was, 1. A balance for their losses. They had, for the iniquity of their fathers, been deprived of the honours and pleasures that would have attended their noble extraction; but, to make them amends for that, God, in giving them learning, gave them better honours and pleasures than those they had been deprived of. 2. A recompense for their integrity. They kept to their religion, even in the minutest instances of it, and would not so much as defile themselves with the king's meat or wine, but became in effect Nazarites, and now God rewarded them for it with an eminency in learning; for "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom and knowledge, and joy" with them, Eccl. ii. 26. To Daniel he gave a double portion; he "had understanding in visions and dreams." He knew how to interpret dreams, as Joseph, not by rules of art, such as are pretended to be given by the Oneirocritics, but by a Divine sagacity and wisdom which God gave him. Nay, he was endued with a prophetical spirit, by which he was enabled to converse with God, and to receive the notices of Divine things in dreams and visions, Num. xii. 6. According to this gift given to Daniel, we find him in this book all along employed about dreams and visions, interpreting or entertaining them; for "as every one has received the gift," so shall he have an opportunity, and so should he have a heart, to "minister the same," 1 Pet. iv. 10.

Secondly. Their great acceptance with the king. After three years spent in their education, (they being of some maturity, it is likely, when they came, perhaps about twenty years old,) they were presented to the king, with the rest that were of their standing, ver. 18; and the king examined them, and communed with them himself, ver. 19. He could do it, being a man of parts and learning himself, else he had not come to be so great; and he would do it, for it is the wisdom of princes, in the choice of the persons they employ, to see with their own eyes, to exercise their own judgment, and not trust too much to others' representation. The king examined them, not so much in the languages, in the rules of oratory or poetry, as "in all matters of wisdom and understanding," the rules of prudence and true politics; he inquired into their judgment about the due conduct of human life, and public affairs; not, Were they wits? but, Were they wise? And he found them to excel not only the young candidates for preferment that were of their own standing, but that they had "more understanding than the ancients, than all their teachers," Ps. cxix. 99, 100. So far was the king from being partial to his own countrymen, to seniors, to those of his own religion, and of an established reputation, that he freely owned that, upon trial, he found these poor young captive Jews ten times wiser and "better than all the magicians that were in all his realm," ver. 20. He was soon aware of something extraordinary in these young men; and, which gave him a surprising satisfaction, was soon aware that a little of their true divinity was preferable to a great deal of the divination he had been used to. "What is the chaff to the wheat?" the magicians' rods to Aaron's? There was no comparison between them. These four young students were better, were ten times better, than all the old practitioners, put them all together, that were in all his realm, and we may be sure they were not a few. This contempt did God pour upon the pride of the Chaldeans, and this honour did he put upon the low estate of his own people. And thus did he make not only those persons, but the rest of their nation, for their sakes, the more respected in the land of their captivity. Lastly, This judgment being given concerning them, they "stood before the king," ver. 19. They attended in the presence chamber, nay, in the council chamber; for to see the king's face is the peraphrasis of a privy councillor, Est. i. 14. This confirms Solomon's observation, "Seest thou a man delight in his business," sober and humble, "he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men." Industry is the way to preferment. How long the other three were about the court we are not told; but Daniel, for his part, "continued to the first year of Cyrus," ver. 21, though not always alike in favour and reputation. He lived and prophesied after the first year of Cyrus, but that is mentioned to intimate that he lived to see the deliverance of his people out of their captivity, and their return to their own land. Note, Sometimes God favours his servants that mourn with Zion in her sorrows, to let them live to see better times with the church than they saw in the beginning of their days, and to share with her in her joys.

CHAPTER II.

It was said, ch. i. 17, that Daniel had understanding in dreams; and here we have an early and eminent instance of it, which soon made him famous in the court of Babylon, as Joseph by the same means came to be so in the court of Egypt. This chapter is a history, but it is the history of a prophecy, by a dream, and the interpretation of it. Pharaoh's dream, and Joseph's interpretation of it, related only to the years of plenty and famine, and the interest of God's Israel in them; but Nebuchadnezzar's dream here, and Daniel's interpretation of that, looks much higher, to the four monarchies, and the concerns of Israel in them, and the kingdom of the Messiah which should be set up in the world, upon the ruins of them. In this chapter we have, I. The great perplexity that Nebuchadnezzar was put into by a dream which he had forgotten, and his command to the magicians to tell him what it was, which they could not pretend to do, ver. 1—11. II. Orders given for the destroying of all the wise men of Babylon, and of Daniel among the rest, with his fellows, ver. 12—15. III. The discovery of this secret to him, in answer to prayer, and the thanksgiving he offered up to God thereupon, ver. 16—23. IV. His admission to the king, and the discovery he made to him, both of his dream and of the interpretation of it, ver. 24—45. V. The great honour which Nebuchadnezzar put upon Daniel, in recompense for this service, and the preferment of his companions with him, ver. 46—49.

AND in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him. 2 Then the king commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew the king his dreams. So they came and stood before the king. 3 And the king said unto them, I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream. 4 Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriack, O king, live for ever: tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation. 5 The king answered and said to the Chaldeans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghill. 6 But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive of me gifts and rewards and great honour: therefore shew me the dream, and the interpretation thereof. 7 They answered again and said, Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it. 8 The king answered and said, I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, because ye see the thing is gone from me. 9 But if ye will not make known unto me the dream, there is but one decree for you: for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me, till the time be changed: therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof. 10 The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean. 11 And it is a rare thing that the king requireth, and there is none other that can shew it before the king, except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh. 12 For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon. 13 And the decree went forth that the wise men should be slain; and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.

We meet with a great difficulty in the date of this story. It is said to be in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 1. Now Daniel was carried to Babylon in his first year, and it should seem he was three years under tutors and governors before he was presented to the king, ch. i. 5. How then could this happen in the second year? Perhaps, though three years were appointed for the education of other children, yet Daniel was so pregnant that he was taken into business when he had been but one year at school, and so in the second year he became thus considerable. Some make it to be the second year after he began to reign alone, but the fifth or sixth year since he began to reign in partnership with his father. Some read it, And in the second year (namely, the second after Daniel and his fellows stood before the king) in the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, or in his reign, this happened. As Joseph, in the second year after his skill in dreams, shewed and expounded Pharaoh's, so Daniel, in the second year after he commenced master in that art, did this service. I would much rather take it some of these ways than suppose, as some do, that it was in the second year after he had conquered Egypt, which was the thirty-sixth year of his reign, because it appears by what we meet with in Ezekiel, that Daniel was famous both for wisdom and prevalency in prayer long before that; and therefore this passage or story, which shews how he came to be so eminent for both these, must be laid early in Nebuchadnezzar's reign. Now here we may observe,

First. The loss that Nebuchadnezzar was in by reason of a dream which he had dreamed, but had forgotten; ver. 1, "He dreamed dreams;" that is, a dream consisting of divers distinct parts, or which filled his head as much as if it had been many dreams. Solomon speaks of a "multitude of dreams," strangely incoherent, in which there are divers vanities, Eccl. v. 7. This dream of Nebuchadnezzar had nothing in the thing itself but what might be paralleled in many a common dream, in which are often presented to men things as foreign as this here; but there was something in the impression it made upon him which carried with it an incontestable evidence of its Divine original, and its prophetic significancy. Note, The greatest of men are not exempt from, nay, they lie most open to, those cares and troubles of mind which disturb their repose in the night, while the sleep of the labouring man is sweet, and sound, and the sleep of the sober temperate man free from confused dreams. The abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep at all for care, and the excesses of gluttons and drunkards will not suffer them to sleep quietly for dreaming. But this here was not from natural causes: Nebuchadnezzar was a troubler of God's Israel, but God here troubled him; for he that made the soul can "make his sword to approach to it." He had his guards about him, but they could not keep trouble from his spirit. We know not the uneasiness of many that live in great pomp, and one would think in pleasure too. We look into their houses, and are tempted to envy them, but could we look into their hearts we should pity them rather. All the treasures, and all the delights of the children of men, which this mighty monarch had the command of, could not procure him a little repose, when by reason of the trouble of his mind his "sleep brake from him." But God giveth his beloved sleep, who return to him as their rest.

Secondly. The trial that he made of his magicians and astrologers, whether they could tell him what his dream was which he had forgotten. They were presently sent "for to shew the king his dream," ver. 2. There are many things which we retain the impressions of, and yet have lost the images of the things; though we cannot tell what the matter was, we know how we were affected with it—so it was with this king. His dream was slipped out of his mind, and he could not possibly recollect it, but was confident he should know it if he heard it again. God ordered it so, that Daniel might have the more honour, in him the God of Daniel. Note, God sometimes serves his own purposes by putting things out of men's minds, as well as by putting things into their minds. The magicians, it is likely, were proud of their being sent for into the king's bedchamber, to give him a taste of their office, not doubting but it would be for their honour. He tells them he had "dreamed a dream," ver. 3. They speak to him in the Syriac tongue, which was then the same with the Chaldee, but now they differ much. And from henceforward Daniel useth that language or dialect of the Hebrew, for the same reason that those words, Jer. x. 11, are in that language, because designed to convince the Chaldeans of the folly of their idolatry, and to bring them to the knowledge and worship of the true and living God, which the stories of these chapters have a direct tendency to. But ch. viii., and forward, being intended for the comfort of the Jews, is written in their peculiar language. They, in their answer, complimented the king with their good wishes, desired him to tell his dream, and undertook with all possible assurance to interpret it, ver. 4. But the king insisted upon it that they must tell him the dream itself, because he had forgotten it, and could not tell it them; and if they could not do this they should all be put to death as deceivers, ver. 5; themselves cut to pieces, and their houses made a dunghill. If they could, they should be rewarded and preferred, ver. 6. And they know, as Balaam did concerning Balak, that he is able to promote them to great honour, and give them the wages of unrighteousness which, like him, they love so dearly. No question, therefore, they will do their utmost to gratify the king: if they do not, it is not for want of good-will, but for want of power. Providence so ordering it that the magicians of Babylon might now be as much confounded and put to shame as of old the magicians of Egypt had been; that, how much soever his people were both in Egypt and Babylon vilified and made contemptible, his oracles might in both be magnified and made honourable, by the silencing of those that set up in competition with them. The magicians, having reason on their side, insist upon it that the king must tell them the dream; and then, if they do not tell him the interpretation of it, it is their fault, ver. 7. But arbitrary power is deaf to reason; the king falls into a passion, gives them a parcel of hard words, and, without any colour of reason, suspects that they could tell him, but would not; and, instead of upbraiding them with impotency, and the deficiency of their art, as he might justly have done, he charges them with a combination to affront him; "Ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me." How unreasonable and absurd is this imputation! If they had undertaken to tell him what his dream was, and had imposed upon him with a sham, he might have charged them with lying and corrupt words. But to say this of them when they honestly confessed their own weakness only shews what senseless things indulged passions are, and how apt great men are to think it is their prerogative to pursue their humour in defiance of reason and equity, and all the dictates of both. When the magicians begged of him to tell them the dream, though the request was highly rational and just, he tells them they did but dally with him to "gain time," ver. 8, "till the time be changed," ver. 9; either till the king's desire to know his dream be over, and he, grown indifferent whether he be told it or no, though now he is so hot upon it, or till they may hope he has so perfectly forgot his dream (the remaining shades of which are slipping from him apace as he catcheth at them) that they may tell him what they please, and make him believe it was his dream; and when the thing which is going is quite gone from him, as it will be in a little time, he will not be able to disprove them. And therefore, without delay, they must tell him the dream. In vain do they plead,

1. That there is no man on earth that can retrieve the king's dream, ver. 10. There are settled rules by which to discover what the meaning of the dream was, (whether they will hold or no is the question,) but never were any rules offered to be given by which to discover what the dream was; they cannot work unless they have something to work upon. They acknowledge that the gods may indeed "declare unto man what is his thought," Am. iv. 13, for he "understandeth our thoughts afar off," Ps. cxxxix. 2, what they will be before we think them, what they are when we do not regard them, and what they have been when we have forgotten them. But those who can do this are gods that have not their dwelling with flesh, ver. 11; and it is they alone that can do this. As for men, their dwelling is with flesh. The wisest and greatest of men are clouded with a veil of flesh, which quite obstructs and confounds all their acquaintance with spirits, and their powers and operations; but the gods, that are themselves pure spirits, know what is in man. See here an instance of the ignorance of these magicians, that they speak of many gods, whereas there is but one, and can be but one Infinite; yet see their knowledge of that which even the light of nature teacheth, and the works of nature prove, that there is a God who is a Spirit, and perfectly knows the spirits of men, and all their thoughts, so as it is not possible any man should. This confession of the Divine omniscience is here extorted from these idolaters, to the honour of God and their own condemnation, who, though they know there is a God in heaven, to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secret is hid, yet offered up their prayers and praises to dumb idols, that have "eyes and see not, ears and hear not."

2. That there is no king on earth that would expect or require such a thing, ver. 10. This intimates, that they were kings, lords, or potentates, not ordinary people, that the magicians had most dealings with, and at whose devotion they were, while the oracles of God, and the Gospel of Christ, are dispensed to the poor. Kings and potentates have often required unreasonable things of their subjects, but they think never any required so unreasonable a thing as this, and therefore hope his imperial majesty will not insist upon it. But it is all in vain; when passion is in the throne reason is under foot. He was "angry and very furious," ver. 12. Note, It is very common for those that will not be convinced by reason to be provoked and exasperated by it, and to push on with fury what they cannot support with equity.

Thirdly. The doom passed upon all the magicians of Babylon. There is but one decree for them all, ver. 9; they all stand condemned, without exception or distinction. The decree has gone forth, they must every man of them be slain, ver. 13, Daniel and his fellows, though they knew nothing of the matter, not excepted. See here, 1. What are commonly the unjust proceedings of arbitrary power. Nebuchadnezzar is here a tyrant in true colours, speaking death when he cannot speak sense, and treating those as traitors whose only fault is, that they would serve him, but cannot. 2. What is commonly the just punishment of pretenders. How unrighteous soever Nebuchadnezzar was in this sentence, as to the ringleaders in the imposture, God was righteous. They that imposed upon men, in taking on them to do what they could not do, are now sentenced to death for not being able to do what they did not pretend to.

14 Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the king's guard, which was gone forth to slay the wise men of Babylon:
15 He answered and said to Arioch the king's captain, Why is the decree so hasty from the king? Then Arioch made the thing known to Daniel. 16 Then Daniel went in, and desired of the king that he would give him time, and that he would shew the king the interpretation. 17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made the thing known to Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, his companions: 18 That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret; that Daniel and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. 19 Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven. 20 Daniel answered and said,

Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever:
For wisdom and might are his:
21 And he changeth the times and the seasons:
He removeth kings, and setteth up kings:
He giveth wisdom unto the wise,
And knowledge to them that know understanding:
22 He revealeth the deep and secret things:
He knoweth what is in the darkness,
And the light dwelleth with him.
23 I thank thee, and praise thee, O thou God of my fathers,
Who hast given me wisdom and might, [thee:
And hast made known unto me now what we desired of
For thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.

When the king sent for his wise men to tell him his dream, and the interpretation of it, ver. 2, it seems Daniel was not summoned to appear among them. The king, though he was highly pleased with him when he examined him, and thought him ten times wiser than the rest of his wise men, yet forgot him when he had most occasion for him; and no wonder, when all was done in a heat, and nothing with a cool and deliberate thought. But Providence so ordered it that the magicians, being nonplussed, might be the more taken notice of, and so the more glory might redound to the God of Daniel. But though Daniel had not the honour to be consulted with the rest of the wise men, contrary to all law and justice, by an undistinguishing sentence, he stands condemned with them, and till he has notice brought him to prepare for execution knows nothing of the matter. How miserable is the case of those who live under an arbitrary government, as this of Nebuchadnezzar's! How happy we, whose lives are under the protection of the law and methods of justice, and lie not thus at the mercy of a peevish and capricious prince!

We have found already in Ezekiel that Daniel was famous both for prudence and prayer. As a prince he had power with God and man; by prayer he had power with God, by prudence he had power with man, and in both he prevailed. Thus did he "find favour and good understanding" in the sight of both. And in these verses we have a remarkable instance of both.

First. Daniel, by prudence, knew how to deal with men, and he prevailed with them. When Arioch, the captain of the guard, that was appointed to slay all the wise men of Babylon, the whole college of them, seized Daniel,—for the sword of tyranny, like the sword of war, devours one as well as another,—he "answered with counsel and wisdom," ver. 14. He did not fall into a passion, and reproach the king as unjust and barbarous, much less did he contrive how to make resistance, but mildly asked, "Why is the decree so hasty?" ver. 15. And whereas the rest of the wise men had insisted upon it that it was utterly impossible for him ever to have his demand gratified, which did but make him more outrageous, Daniel undertakes, if he may but have a little time allowed him, to give the king all the satisfaction he desired, ver. 16. The king, being now sensible of his error, in not sending for Daniel sooner, whose character he began to recollect, was soon prevailed with to respite the judgment, and make trial of Daniel. Note, The likeliest method to turn away wrath, even the wrath of a king, which is as the messenger of death, is by a soft answer—by that yielding which pacifies great offences. Thus, though where the word of a king is there is power, yet even that word may be repelled, and that so as to be repealed; and so some read it here, ver. 14. Then Daniel returned, and stayed the counsel and edict, through Arioch, the king's provost-marshal.

Secondly. Daniel knew how by prayer to converse with God, and he found favour with him, both in petition and in thanksgiving, which are the two principal parts of prayer. Observe,

1. His humble petition for this mercy, that God would discover to him what was the king's dream, and the interpretation of it. When he had gained time, he did not go to consult with the rest of the wise men, whether there was any thing in their art, in their books, that might be of use in this matter, but went to his house, there to be alone with his God; for from him alone, who is the Father of lights, he expected this great gift. Observe,

1st. He did not only pray for this discovery himself, but he engaged his companions to pray for it too. He made the thing known to them, who had been all along his bosom friends and associates, "that they would desire mercies of God concerning this secret," ver. 17, 18. Though Daniel was probably their senior, and every way excelled them, yet he engaged them as partners with him in this matter: vis unita fortior,—'the union of forces produces greater force:' see Est. iv. 16. Note, Praying friends are valuable friends; and it is good to have an intimacy with, and an interest in, those that have fellowship with God and an interest at the throne of grace. And it well becomes the greatest and best of men to desire the assistance of the prayers of others for them. St. Paul often bespeaks his friends to pray for him. Thus we must shew that we put a value upon our friends, upon prayer, upon their prayers.

2nd. He was particular in this prayer, but had an eye to, and a dependence upon, the general mercy of God, that "they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret," ver. 18. We ought, in prayer, to look up to God as the "God of heaven," a God above us, and that has dominion over us, to whom we owe adoration and allegiance, a God of power, who can do every thing. Our Saviour has taught us to pray to God as "our Father in heaven;" and whatever good we pray for our dependence must be upon the mercies of God for it, and an interest in those mercies we must desire. We can expect nothing by way of recompense for our merits, but all as the gift of God's mercies. They desired mercy "concerning this secret." Note, Whatever is the matter of our care must be the matter of our prayer; we must desire mercy of God concerning this thing and the other thing that occasions us trouble and fear. God gives us leave to be humbly free with him, and in prayer to enter into the detail of our wants and burthens. Secret things belong to the Lord our God, and therefore, if there be any mercy we stand in need of that concerns a secret, to him we must apply ourselves; and though we cannot in faith pray for miracles, yet we may in faith pray to him who has all hearts in his hand, and who in his providence does wonders without miracles, for the discovery of that which is out of our ken, and the obtaining of that which is out of our reach, as far as it is for his glory and our good, believing that to him nothing is hid, nothing is hard.

3rd. Their plea with God was the imminent peril they were in. They desired mercy of God in this matter, that so "Daniel and his fellows might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon," that the righteous might not be destroyed with the wicked. Note, When the lives of good and useful men are in danger, it is time to be earnest with God for mercy for them, as for Peter in prison, Acts xii. 5.

4th. The mercy which Daniel and his fellows prayed for was bestowed. The secret was "revealed unto Daniel in a night vision," ver. 19. Some think he dreamed the same dream when he was asleep that Nebuchadnezzar had dreamed. It should rather seem that when he was awake, and continuing "instant in prayer," and "watching in the same," the dream itself, and the interpretation of it, was communicated to him by the ministry of an angel, abundantly to his satisfaction. Note, The "effectual fervent prayer of righteous men availeth much." There are mysteries and secrets which by prayer we are let into; with that key the cabinets of heaven are unlocked, for Christ hath said, Thus "knock, and it shall be opened to you."

2. His grateful thanksgiving for this mercy, when he had received it. "Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven," ver. 19. He did not stay till he had told it to the king, and seen whether he would own it to be his dream or no, but is confident it is so, and that he has gained his point, and therefore immediately turns his prayers into praises. As he had prayed in a full assurance that God would do this for him, so he gave thanks in a full assurance that he had done it, and in both he had an eye to God as the God of heaven. His prayer was not recorded, but his thanksgiving is. Observe,

1st. The honour he gives to God in his thanksgiving, which he studies to do in a great variety and copiousness of expression, "Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever." There is that for ever in God which is to be blessed and praised, it is unchangeably and eternally in him, and it is to be blessed for ever and ever. As the matter of praise is God's eternal perfection, so the work of praise shall be everlastingly in the doing. First. He gives to God the glory of what he is in himself; "Wisdom and might are his;" wisdom and courage, so some. Whatever is fit to be done he will do; whatever he will do and can do he dares do, and he will be sure to do it in the best manner, for he has infinite wisdom to design and contrive, and infinite power to execute and accomplish; "With him is strength and wisdom," which in men are often parted. Secondly. He gives him the glory of what he is to the world of mankind. He has an universal influence and agency upon all the children of men and all their actions and affairs. Are the times changed? Is the posture of affairs altered? Doth every thing lie open to mutability? It is God that "changeth the times and the seasons," and the face of them; no change comes to pass by chance, but according to the will and counsel of God. Are those that were kings removed and deposed? do they abdicate? are they laid aside? It is God that removes kings. Are the poor raised out of the dust to be set among princes? It is God that setteth up kings; and the making and unmaking of kings is a flower of his crown who is the fountain of all power, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Are there men that excel others in wisdom, philosophers and statesmen, that think above the common rate, contemplative, penetrating men? It is God that gives wisdom to the wise, whether they be so wise as to acknowledge it or no; they have it not of themselves, but it is he that "gives knowledge to them that know understanding," which is a good reason why we should not be proud of our knowledge, and why we should serve and honour God with it, and make it our business to know him. Thirdly. He gives him the glory of this particular discovery. He praiseth him, 1*st*. For that he could make such a discovery; ver. 22, "He revealeth the deep and secret things," which are hid from the eyes of all living. It was he that revealed to man what is true wisdom, when none else could, Job xxviii. 27, 28. It is he that reveals things to come to his servants the prophets; he doth himself perfectly discern and distinguish that which is most close and most industriously concealed, for he will "bring into judgment every secret thing;" the truth will be evident in the great day. He "knows what is in the darkness," and what is done in the darkness, for that "hides not from him," Ps. cxxxix. 11, 12; "The light dwells with him," and he "dwells in the light," 1 Tim. vi. 16, and yet as to us he "makes darkness his pavilion." Some understand it of the light of prophecy and Divine revelation, which dwells with God and is derived from him, for he is the Father of lights, of all lights; they are all at home in him. 2*nd*. For that he had made this discovery to him. Here he has an eye to God, the God of his fathers; for, though the Jews were now captives in Babylon, yet they were "beloved for their fathers' sake." He praiseth God, who is the fountain of wisdom and might, for the wisdom and might he had given him, wisdom to know this great secret and might to bear the discovery. Note, What wisdom and might we have we must acknowledge it to be God's gift; "Thou hast made this known to me," ver. 23. What was hid from the celebrated Chaldeans that made the interpreting of dreams their profession, is revealed to Daniel, a captive Jew, a babe, much their junior. God would hereby put honour upon the spirit of prophecy just when he was putting contempt upon the spirit of divination. Was Daniel thus thankful to God for making known that to him which was the saving of the life of him and his fellows? Much more reason have we to be thankful to him for making known to us the great salvation of the soul, to us and not to the world, to us and not to the wise and prudent.

2nd. The respect he puts upon his companions in his thanksgiving. Though it was by his prayers principally that this discovery was obtained, and to him that it was made, yet he owns their partnership with him; both in praying for it, It is what "we desired of thee," and in enjoying of it, "Thou hast made known unto us the king's matter." Either they were present with Daniel, when the discovery was made to him, or as soon as he knew it he told them, Εὕρηκα, Εὕρηκα, 'I have found it, I have found it;' that they who had assisted him with their prayers might assist him in their praises. His joining them with him is an instance of his humility and modesty, which well becomes those that are taken into communion with God. Thus St. Paul sometimes joins Sylvanus, Timotheus, or some other minister, with himself in the inscriptions to many of his epistles. Note, What honour God puts upon us we should be willing that our brethren may share with us in.

24 Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch, whom the king had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him; Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation. 25 Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, I have found a man of the captives of Judah, that will make known unto the king the interpretation. 26 The king answered and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof? 27 Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king; 28 But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these; 29 As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed, what should come to pass hereafter: and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what shall come to pass. 30 But as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living, but for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

We have here the introduction to Daniel's declaring of the dream and the interpretation of it.

First. He immediately bespoke the reversing of the sentence against the wise men of Babylon, ver. 24. He went with all speed to Arioch, to tell him his commission was now superseded; "Destroy not the wise men of Babylon." Though there were those of them, perhaps, that deserved to die as magicians, by the law of God, yet here that which they stood condemned for was not a crime worthy of death or of bonds, and therefore let them not die and be unjustly destroyed, but let them live and be justly ashamed, as having been nonplussed and unable to do that which a prophet of the Lord could do. Note, Since God shews common kindness to the evil and good, we should do so too, and be ready to save the lives even of bad men, Mat. v. 45. A good man is a common good; to Paul in the ship God gave the souls of all that sailed with him; they were saved for his sake. To Daniel was owing the preservation of all the wise men, who yet rendered not according to the benefit done to them, ch. iii. 8.

Secondly. He offered his service with great assurance to go to the king and tell him his dream and the interpretation of it, and was admitted accordingly, ver. 24, 25. Arioch brought him in haste to the king, hoping to ingratiate himself by introducing Daniel. He pretends he had sought him to interpret the king's dream, whereas really it was to execute upon him the king's sentence that he sought him. But courtiers' business is every way to humour the prince, and make their own services acceptable.

Thirdly. He contrived as much as might be to reflect shame upon the magicians, and to give honour to God upon this occasion. The king owned it was a bold undertaking, and questioned whether he could make it good; ver. 26, "Art thou able to make known unto me a dream?" What! such a babe in this knowledge, such a stripling as thou art, wilt thou undertake that which thy seniors despair of doing? The less likely it appeared to the king that Daniel should do this, the more God was glorified in enabling him to do it. Note, In transmitting Divine revelation to the children of men it has been God's usual way to make use of the "weak and foolish things" and persons "of the world," and such as were despised and despaired of, "to confound the wise and mighty," that the excellency of the power might be of him, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. Daniel from this takes occasion,

1. To put the king out of conceit with his magicians and soothsayers, whom he had such great expectations from; ver. 27, This secret they cannot shew to the king; it is out of their power, the rules of their art will not reach it; therefore, let not the king be angry with them for not doing that which they cannot do, but rather despise them and cast them off because they cannot do it. Broughton reads it generally, 'This secret no sages, astrologers, enchanters, or entrail cookers, can shew unto the king; let not the king, therefore, consult them any more.' Note, The experience we have of the inability of all creatures to give us satisfaction should lessen our esteem of them, and lower our expectations from them. They are baffled in their pretensions, we are baffled in our hopes from them; hitherto they come, and no farther. Let us therefore say to them, as Job to his friends, "Now ye are nothing," miserable comforters are ye all.

2. To bring him to the knowledge of the one only living and true God, the God whom Daniel worshipped. Though they cannot find out the secret, let not the king despair of having it found out, for "there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets," ver. 26. Note, The insufficiency of creatures should drive us to the all-sufficiency of the Creator. "There is a God in heaven," and it is well for us there is, who can do that for us, and make known that to us, which none on earth can, particularly the secret history of the work of our redemption and the secret designs of God's love to us therein, the mystery which was hid from ages and generations. Divine revelation helps us out there, where human reason leaves us quite at a loss, and makes known that not only to kings, but to the poor of this world, which none of the philosophers or politicians of the heathens, with all their oracles and arts of divination to help them, could ever pretend to give us any light into, Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

Fourthly. He confirmed the king in his opinion that the dream he was thus solicitous to recover the idea of, was really well worth inquiring after, that it was of great value and of vast consequence; not a common dream, the idle disport of a ludicrous and luxuriant fancy, not worth remembering or telling again, but that it was a Divine discovery, a ray of light darted into his mind from the upper world, relating to the great affairs and revolutions of this lower world. God in it "made known to the king what shall be in the latter days," ver. 28, that is, in the times yet to come, reaching as far as the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, which was to be in the latter days, Heb. i. 1; and again, ver. 29, The thoughts which came into thy mind were not the repetitions of what had been before, as our dreams usually are.

Omnia quæ sensu voluntur vota diurno
Tempore sopito reddit amica quies,—

'The sentiments which we indulge throughout the day often mingle with the grateful slumbers of the night.—Claudian. But they were predictions of "what should come to pass hereafter," which he that "revealeth secrets makes known unto thee," and therefore thou art in the right in taking the hint and pursuing it thus. Note, Things that are to come to pass hereafter are secret things, which God only can reveal; and what he has revealed of these things, especially with reference to the last days of all, to the end of time, ought to be very seriously and diligently inquired into and considered by every one of us. Some think the thoughts which are said to have come into the king's mind upon his bed, "what should come to pass hereafter," were his own thoughts when he was awake. Just before he fell asleep, and dreamt this dream, he was musing in his own mind what would be the issue of his growing greatness, what his kingdom would hereafter come to; and so the dream was an answer to those thoughts. What discoveries God intends to make he thus prepares men for.

Fifthly. He solemnly professeth that he could not pretend to have merited from God the favour of this discovery, or to have obtained it by any sagacity of his own; ver. 30, "But as for me," this secret is not found out by me, but is "revealed to me," and that "not for any wisdom that I have more than any living," to qualify me for the receiving of such a discovery. Note, It well becomes those whom God has highly favoured and honoured to be very humble and low in their own eyes, to lay aside all opinion of their own wisdom and worthiness, that God alone may have all the praise of the good they are, and have, and do, and that all may be attributed to the freeness of his good-will towards them, and the fulness of his good work in them. The secret was made known to him not for his own sake, but, 1. For the sake of his people; "For their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king;" for the sake of his brethren and companions in tribulation, who had by their prayers helped him to obtain this discovery, and so might be said to make known the interpretation; that their lives might be spared, that they might come into favour and be preferred, and all the people of the Jews might fare the better in their captivity for their sakes. Note, Humble men will be always ready to think that what God doth for them and by them is more for others' sakes than for their own. 2. For the sake of his prince; and some read the former clause in this sense: Not for any wisdom of mine, "but that the king may know the interpretation, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thine heart;" that thou mightest have satisfaction given thee as to what thou wast before considering of, and thereby instruction given thee how to carry it towards the church of God. God revealed this thing to Daniel that he might make it known to the king. Prophets receive that they may give, that the discoveries made them may not be lodged with themselves, but communicated to the persons themselves that are concerned.

31 Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible. 32 This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, 33 His legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. 34 Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. 35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. 36 This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king. 37 Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. 38 And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold. 39 And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. 40 And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. 41 And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. 42 And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. 43 And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. 44 And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. 45 Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

Daniel here gives full satisfaction to Nebuchadnezzar concerning his dream, and the interpretation of it. That great prince had been kind to this poor prophet, in his maintenance and education; he had been brought up at the king's cost, preferred at court, and the land of his captivity had hereby been made much easier to him than to others of his brethren; and now the king is abundantly repaid for all the expense he had been at upon him; and for receiving this prophet, though not in the name of a prophet, he had a prophet's reward, such a reward as a prophet only could give, and for which that wealthy, mighty prince was now glad to be beholden to him. Here is,

First. The dream itself, ver. 31, 45. Nebuchadnezzar perhaps was an admirer of statues, and had his palace and gardens adorned with them; however, he was a worshipper of images, and now, behold, "a great image" is set before him in a dream, which might intimate to him what the images were which he bestowed so much cost upon, and paid such respect to; they were mere dreams. The creatures of fancy might do as well to please the fancy; by the power of imagination he might shut his eyes and represent to himself what forms he thought fit, and beautify them at his pleasure, without the expense and trouble of sculpture. This was the image of a man erect; it stood before him as a living man; and, because those monarchies which were designed to be represented by it were admirable in the eyes of their friends, the brightness of this image was excellent; and, because they were formidable to their enemies and dreaded by all about them, the form of this image is said to be terrible; both the features of the face and the postures of the body made it so. But that which was most remarkable in this image was the different metals of which it was composed. The head of gold, the richest and most durable metal; the breast and arms of silver, the next to it in worth; the belly and sides, or thighs, of brass; the legs of iron, still baser metals; and lastly the feet, part of iron and part of clay. See what the things of this world are; the farther we go in them, the less valuable they appear. In the life of man youth is a head of gold, but it grows less and less worthy of our esteem; and old age is half clay, a man is then as good as dead. It is so with the world; latter ages degenerate. The first age of the Christian church, of the reformation, was a head of gold; but we live in an age that is iron and clay. Some allude to this in the description of a hypocrite, whose practice is not agreeable to his knowledge; he has a head of gold, but feet of iron and clay; knows his duty, but doth it not. Some observe that in Daniel's visions the monarchies were represented by four beasts, ch. vii.; for he looked upon that wisdom from beneath, by which they were turned to be earthly and sensual, and a tyrannical power, to have more in it of the beast than of the man, and so the vision agreed with his notions of the thing. But to Nebuchadnezzar, a heathen prince, they were represented by a gay and pompous image of a man; for he was an admirer of "the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them." To him the sight was so charming that he was impatient to see it again.

But what became of this image? The next part of the dream shews it us calcined and brought to nothing. He saw a stone cut out of the quarry by an unseen power, without hands, and this stone fell upon the "feet of the image," that were of "iron and clay," and "broke them to pieces;" and then the image must fall of course, and so the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, were all broken to pieces together, and beaten so small that they became like the "chaff of the summer threshingfloors," and there was not to be found any, the least, remains of them. But the stone cut out of the mountain became itself a great mountain, and filled the earth. See how God can bring about great effects by weak and unlikely causes; when he pleaseth a little one shall become a thousand. Perhaps the destruction of this image of gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, might be intended to signify the abolishing of idolatry out of the world in due time. The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, as this image was, and "they shall perish from off the earth, and from under these heavens," Jer. x. 11; Isa. ii. 18. And whatever power destroys idolatry is in the ready way to magnify and exalt itself, as this stone, when it had broken the image to pieces, "became a great mountain."

Secondly. The interpretation of this dream. Let us now see what is the meaning of this. It was from God, and therefore from him it is fit we take the explication of it. It should seem Daniel had his fellows with him, and speaks for them, as well as for himself, when he saith, "We will tell the interpretation," ver. 36. Now,

1. This image represented the kingdoms of the earth that should successively bear rule among the nations, and have influence on the affairs of the Jewish church. The four monarchies were not represented by four distinct statues, but by one image, because they were all of one and the same spirit and genius, and all more or less against the church. It was the same power, only lodged in four several nations; the two former lying eastward of Judea, the two latter westward.

1st. The "head of gold" signified the Chaldean monarchy, which is now in being; ver. 37, 38, "Thou, O king, art (or, rather, shalt be) "a king of kings," an universal monarch, to whom many kings and kingdoms shall be tributaries. Or, Thou art the highest of kings on earth at this time, (as a servant of servants is the meanest servant,) thou dost outshine all other kings. But let him not attribute his elevation to his own politics or fortitude; no, it is the God of heaven that has given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory, a kingdom that exercises great authority, stands firm, and shines bright, acts by a puissant army with an arbitrary power. Note, The greatest of princes have no power but what is given them from above. The extent of his dominion is set forth, ver. 38, that "wheresoever the children of men dwell," in all the nations of that part of the world, he was ruler over them all, over them and all that belonged to them, all their cattle, not only those which they had a property in, but those that were feræ naturæ,—'wild,' the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven. He was lord of all the woods, forests, and chases, and none were allowed to hunt or fowl without his leave. Thus "thou art this head of gold," thou and thy son and thy son's son, for seventy years. Compare this with Jer. xxv. 9, 11, especially Jer. xxvii. 5—7. There were other powerful kingdoms in the world at this time, as that of the Scythians, but it was the kingdom of Babylon that reigned over the Jews, and that began the government which continued in the succession here described till Christ's time. It is called a head, for its wisdom, and eminency, and absolute power, a head of gold for its wealth, Isa. xiv. 4; it was a golden city. Some make this monarchy to begin in Nimrod, and so bring into it all the Assyrian kings, about fifty monarchs in all, and compute that it lasted above sixteen hundred years. But it had not been so long a monarchy of such vast extent and power as is here described, nor anything like it. Therefore others make only Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach, and Belshazzar, to belong to this head of gold; and a glorious high throne they had, and perhaps exercised a more despotic power than any of the kings that went before them. Nebuchadnezzar reigned forty-five years current, Evil-merodach twenty-three years current, and Belshazzar three. Babylon was their metropolis, and Daniel was with them upon the spot during the seventy years.

2nd. The breast and arms of silver signified the monarchy of the Medes and Persians, of which the king is told no more than this, There shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, ver. 39; not so rich, powerful, or victorious. This kingdom was founded by Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian, in alliance with each other, and therefore represented by two arms, meeting in the breast. Cyrus was himself a Persian by his father, a Mede by his mother. Some reckon that this second monarchy lasted one hundred and thirty years, others two hundred and four years. The former computation agrees best with the Scripture chronology.

3rd. The belly and thighs of brass signified the monarchy of the Grecians, founded by Alexander, who conquered Darius Cedomannus, the last of the Persian emperors. This is the "third kingdom of brass," inferior in wealth and extent of dominion to the Persian monarchy, but in Alexander himself it shall, by the power of the sword, "bear rule over all the earth;" for Alexander boasted that he had conquered the world, and then sat down and wept because he had not another world to conquer.

4th. The legs and feet of iron signified the Roman monarchy. Some make this to signify the latter part of the Grecian monarchy, the two empires of Syria and Egypt—the former governed by the family of the Seleucidæ, from Seleucus; the latter by that of the Lagidæ, from Ptolemæus Lagus; these they make the two legs and feet of this image; Grotius, and Junius, and Broughton, go this way. But it has been the more received opinion that it is the Roman monarchy that is here intended, because it was in the time of that monarchy, and when it was in its height, that the kingdom of Christ was set up in the world, by the preaching of the everlasting Gospel. The Roman kingdom was "strong as iron," ver. 40; witness the prevalency of that kingdom against all that contended with it for many ages. That kingdom broke in pieces the Grecian empire, and afterwards quite destroyed the nation of the Jews, ver. 46. Towards the latter end of the Roman monarchy it grew very weak, branched into ten kingdoms, which were as the toes of these feet, some of which were weak as clay, others strong as iron, ver. 42. Endeavours were used to unite and cement them, for the strengthening of the empire, but in vain; "They shall not cleave one to another," ver. 43. This empire divided the government for a long time between the senate and the people, the nobles and commons, but they did not entirely coalesce. There were civil wars between Marius and Sylla, Cæsar and Pompey, whose parties were as iron and clay. Some refer this to the declining times of that empire, when, for the strengthening of the empire against the irruptions of the barbarous nations, the branches of the royal family intermarried; but the politics had not the desired effect when the day of the fall of that empire came.

2. The stone "cut out without hands" represented the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which should be set up in the world in the time of the Roman empire, and upon the ruins of Satan's kingdom, in the "kingdoms of the world." This is the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, for it should be neither raised or supported by human power or policy; no visible hand should act in the setting of it up, but it should be done invisibly, by the "Spirit of the Lord of hosts." This was the "stone which the builders refused," because it was not cut out by their hands, but it is now become the "head stone of the corner."

1st. The gospel church is a kingdom which Christ is the sole and sovereign monarch of, in which he rules by his word and Spirit, to which he gives protection and law, and from which he receives homage and tribute. It is a kingdom not of this world, and yet set up in it; it is the kingdom of God among men.

2nd. The God of heaven was to set up this kingdom, to give authority to Christ to execute judgment, to set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion, and to bring into obedience to him a willing people. Being set up by the God of heaven, it is often in the New Testament called the kingdom of heaven, for its original is from above, and its tendency is upwards.

3rd. It was to be set up in the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, which there is particular notice taken of, Lu. ii. 1, that Christ was born when, by the decree of the emperor of Rome, all the world was taxed, which was a plain indication that that empire was become as universal as any earthly empire ever was. When these kings are contesting with each other, and in all the struggles the contending parties each hope to find their own account, God will do his own work, and fulfil his own counsels. These kings are all enemies to Christ's kingdom, and yet it shall be set up in defiance of them.

4th. It is a kingdom that knows no decay, is in no danger of destruction, and will not admit any succession or revolution. It shall "never be destroyed" by any foreign force invading it, as many other kingdoms are; fire and sword cannot waste it; the combined powers of earth and hell cannot deprive either the subjects of their prince or the prince of his subjects. Nor shall this "kingdom be left to other people," as the kingdoms of the earth are. As Christ is a monarch that has no successor, for he himself shall reign for ever, so his kingdom is a monarchy that has no revolution. The kingdom of God was indeed taken from the Jews and given to the Gentiles, Mat. xxi. 43, but still it was Christianity that ruled the kingdom of the Messiah. The Christian church is still the same, it is fixed on a rock, much fought against, but never to be prevailed against, by the gates of hell.

5th. It is a kingdom that shall be victorious over all opposition. It shall "break in pieces and consume all those kingdoms," as the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" broke in pieces the image, ver. 44, 45. The kingdom of Christ shall wear out all other kingdoms, shall outlive them, and flourish when they are sunk with their own weight, and so wasted that their place knows them no more. All the kingdoms that appear against the kingdom of Christ shall be broken with a rod of iron, as a potter's vessel, Ps. ii. 9. And in the kingdoms that submit to the kingdom of Christ, tyranny and idolatry, and every thing that is their reproach, as far as the Gospel of Christ gets ground, shall be broken. The day is coming when Jesus Christ shall have put down "all rule, principality, and power," and have made "all his enemies his footstool," and then this prophecy will have its full accomplishment, and not till then, 1 Cor. xv. 24, 25. Our Saviour seems to refer to this, Mat. xxi. 44, when, speaking of himself as the stone set at nought by the Jewish builders, he saith, "On whomsoever" this stone "shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

6th. It shall be an everlasting kingdom. Those kingdoms of the earth that had broken in pieces all about them yet at length it came to their turn to be in like manner broken; but the kingdom of Christ shall break other kingdoms in pieces, and shall itself stand for ever. His throne shall be as the days of heaven, his seed, his subjects, as the stars of heaven, not only so innumerable, but so immutable. Of the increase of Christ's government and peace there shall be no end. "The Lord shall reign for ever," not only to the end of time, but when time and days shall be no more, and "God shall be all in all" to eternity.

Daniel having thus interpreted the dream to the satisfaction of Nebuchadnezzar, who gave him no interruption,—so full was the interpretation that he had no question to ask, and so plain, that he had no objection to make,—he closes all with a solemn assertion, First. Of the Divine original of this dream, the great God, (so he calls him to express his own high thoughts of him, and to beget the like in the mind of this great king,) he has "made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter," which the gods of the magicians could not do. And thus a full confirmation was given to that great argument which Isaiah had long before urged against idolaters, and particularly the idolaters of Babylon, when he challenged the gods they worshipped to "shew things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods," Isa. xli. 23, and by this proved the God of Israel to be the true God, that he "declares the end from the beginning," Isa. xlvi. 10. Secondly. Of the undoubted certainty of the things foretold by this dream. He who makes known these things is the same that has himself designed and determined them, and will by his providence effect them, and we are sure his counsel shall stand, and cannot be altered, and therefore "the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure." Note, Whatever God has made known we may depend upon.

46 Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him. 47 The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldest reveal this secret. 48 Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. 49 Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

PERSIAN OFFICER.

One might have expected that, when Nebuchadnezzar was contriving to make his own kingdom everlasting, he would have been enraged at Daniel, who foretold the fall of it, and that another kingdom, of another nature, should be the everlasting kingdom; but, instead of resenting it as an affront he received it as an oracle. And here we are told what the expressions were of the impressions it made upon him.

First. He was ready to look upon Daniel as a little god. Though he saw him to be a man, yet from this wonderful discovery he had made, both of his secret thoughts, in telling him the dream, and of things to come, in telling him the interpretation of it, he concluded that he had certainly a divinity lodged in him, worthy his adoration, and therefore he "fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel," ver. 46. It was the custom of the country by prostration to give honour to kings, because they have something of a Divine power in them; "I have said ye are gods." And therefore this king, who had often received such veneration from others, now paid the like to Daniel, whom he supposed to have in him a Divine knowledge, which he was so struck with an admiration of that he could not contain himself, but forgot both that Daniel was a man and that himself was a king. Thus did God magnify divine revelation, and make it honourable, extorting from a proud potentate such a veneration but for one glimpse of it. He worshipped Daniel, and "commanded that they should offer an oblation" to him, and burn incense. Herein he cannot be justified, but may very well be excused, when Cornelius was thus ready to worship Peter, and John the angel, who both knew better things. But though it is not here mentioned, yet we have reason to think that Daniel refused these honours that he paid him, and said, as St. Peter to Cornelius, "Stand up, I myself also am a man;" or, as the angel to St. John, "See thou do it not;" for it is not said that the oblation was offered unto him, though the king commanded it, or rather said it, for so the word is; he said in his haste, 'Let an oblation be offered to him.' And that Daniel did say something to him, which turned his eyes and thoughts another way, is intimated in what follows, ver. 47, "The king answered Daniel." Note, It is possible for those to express a great honour for the ministers of God's word who yet have no true love for the word. "Herod feared John," and "heard him gladly," and yet went on in his sins, Mar. vi. 20.

Secondly. He readily acknowledged the God of Daniel to be the great God, the true God, the only living and true God. If Daniel will not suffer himself to be worshipped, he will (as Daniel, it is likely, directed him) worship God, by confessing, ver. 47, "Of a truth your God is a God of gods," such a God as there is no other, above all gods in dignity, over all gods in dominion. He is "a Lord of kings," from whom they derive their power, and to whom they are accountable; and he is both a discoverer and revealer of secrets; what is most secret he sees and can reveal, and what he has revealed is what was secret and which none but he could reveal, 1 Cor. ii. 10.

Thirdly. He preferred Daniel, made him a "great man," ver. 48. God made him a great man indeed when he took him into communion with himself, a greater man than Nebuchadnezzar could make him; but because God had magnified him, therefore the king magnified him. Doth wealth make men great? The king "gave him many great gifts;" and he had no reason to refuse them, when they all put him into so much the greater capacity of doing good to his brethren in captivity. These gifts were grateful returns for the good services he had done, and not aimed at or bargained for by him, as the rewards of divination were by Balaam. Doth power make a man great? He made him "ruler over the whole province of Babylon," which no doubt had a mighty influence upon the other provinces; he made him likewise chancellor of the university, "chief of the governors, over all the wise men of Babylon," to instruct them whom he had thus outdone; and since they could not do what the king would have them do, they shall be obliged to do what Daniel would have them do. Thus it is fit "the fool should be servant to the wise in heart." Seeing Daniel could reveal this secret, ver. 47, the king thus advanced him. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to advance and employ those that receive Divine revelation, and are much conversant with it, even as Daniel here shewed himself to be well acquainted with the kingdom of heaven. Joseph, like Daniel here, was advanced in the court of the king of Egypt, for his interpreting of his dreams; and he called him Zaphnath-paaneah,—'a revealer of secrets,' as the king of Babylon here calls Daniel; so that the preambles to their patents of honour are the same,—for and in consideration of their good services done to the crown in revealing secrets.

Fourthly. He preferred his companions for his sake, and upon his special instance and request, ver. 49. Daniel himself "sat in the gate of the king," as president of the council, chief justice, or prime minister of state, or perhaps chamberlain of the household; but he used his interest for his friends as became a good man, and procured places in the government for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. They that had helped him with their prayers shall share with him in his honours, such a grateful sense had he even of that service. The preferring of them would be a great stay and help to Daniel in his place and business. And these pious Jews being thus preferred in Babylon, had great opportunity of serving their brethren in captivity, and of doing them many good offices, which, no doubt, they were ready to do. Thus, sometimes, before God brings his people into trouble, he prepares it that it may be easy to them.

CHAPTER III.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we left Daniel's companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in honour and power, princes of the provinces, and preferred for their relation to the God of Israel, and the interest they had in him; I know not whether I should say, 'It were well if this honour had all the saints; no, there are many whom it would not be good for; the saints' honour is reserved for another world. But here we have those same three men as much under the king's displeasure as then they were in his favour, and yet more truly, more highly honoured by their God, than there they were honoured by their prince, both by the grace wherewith he enabled them rather to suffer than to sin, and by the miraculous, glorious deliverance he wrought for them out of their sufferings.' It is a very memorable story, a glorious instance of the power and goodness of God, and a great encouragement to the constancy of his people in trying times. The apostle refers to it when he mentions among the believing heroes those who by faith quenched the violence of fire, Heb. xi. 34. We have here, I. Nebuchadnezzar's erecting and dedicating a golden image, and his requiring all his subjects, of what rank or degree soever, to fall down and worship it, and the general compliance of his people with that command, ver. 1—7. II. Information given against the Jewish princes for refusing to worship this golden image, ver. 8—12. III. Their constant persisting in that refusal, notwithstanding his rage and menaces, ver. 13—18. IV. The casting of them into the fiery furnace for their refusal, ver. 19—23. V. Their miraculous preservation in the fire by the power of God, and their invitation out of the fire by the favour of the king, who was by this miracle convinced of his error in casting them in, ver. 24—27. VI. The honour which the king gave to God hereupon, and the favour he shewed to those faithful worthies, ver. 28—30.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king made an image of gold, whose height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits: he set it up in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. 2

PLAINS NEAR BABYLON—DURA.

Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes, the governors, and the captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, to come to the dedication of the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. 3 Then the princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, were gathered together unto the dedication of the image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and they stood before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. 4 Then an herald cried aloud, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages, 5 That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up: 6 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 7 Therefore at that time, when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of musick, all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up.

We have no certainty concerning the date of this story, only that if this image that Nebuchadnezzar dedicated had any relation to that which he dreamed of, it is probable it happened not long after that; some reckon it to be about the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, a year before Jehoiachin's captivity, in which Ezekiel was carried away. Observe,

First. A golden image set up to be worshipped. Babylon was full of idols already, yet nothing will serve this imperious prince but they must have one more; for those who have forsaken the one only living God, and begin to set up many gods, will find the gods they set up so unsatisfying, and their desire after them so insatiable, that they will multiply them without measure, wander after them endlessly, and never know when they have enough. Idolaters are fond of novelty and variety; "They choose new gods;" they that have many will wish to have more. Nebuchadnezzar the king, that he might exert the prerogative of his crown, to make what gods he thought fit, set up this image, ver. 1. Observe, 1. The valuableness of it. It was an "image of gold," not all gold, sure; as rich as he was it is likely he could not afford that, but overlaid with gold. Note, The worshippers of false gods are not wont to stick at charges in setting up images, and worshipping them; they lavish gold out of the bag for that purpose, Isa. xlvi. 6, which shames our niggardliness in the worship of the true God. 2. The vastness of it. It was threescore cubits high and six cubits broad. It exceeded the ordinary stature of a man fifteen times, for that is reckoned but four cubits, or six feet, as if its being monstrous would make amends for its being lifeless. But why did Nebuchadnezzar set up this image? Some suggest it was to clear himself from the imputation of being turned Jew, because he had lately spoken with great honour of the God of Israel, and had preferred some of his worshippers. Or perhaps he set it up as an image of himself, and designed to be himself worshipped in it. Proud princes affect to have Divine honours paid them. Alexander did so, pretending himself to be the son of Jupiter Olympus. He was told that in the image he had seen in his dream he was represented by the head of gold, who was to be succeeded by kingdoms of baser metal; but here he sets up to be himself the whole image, for he makes it all of gold. See here, 1st. How the good impressions that were then made upon him were quite lost, and quickly. He then acknowledged that the God of Israel is of a truth a God of gods and a Lord of kings, and yet now, in defiance of the express law of that God, he sets up an image to be worshipped; not only continues in his former idolatries, but contrives new ones. Note, Strong convictions often come short of a sound conversion. Many in a pang have owned the absurdity and dangerousness of sin, and yet have gone on in it. 2nd. How that very dream, and the interpretation of it, which then made such good impressions upon him, now had a quite contrary effect. Then it made him fall down as a humble worshipper of God; now it made him set up for a bold competitor with God. Then he thought it a great thing to be the golden head of the image, and owned himself obliged to God for it; but, his mind rising with his condition, now he thinks that too little, and, in contradiction to God himself and his oracle, he will be all in all.

Secondly. A general convention of the states summoned to attend the solemnity of the dedication of this image, ver. 2, 3. Messengers are dispatched to all parts of the kingdom to gather together the princes, dukes, and lords, all the peers of the realm, with all officers, civil and military, the captains and commanders of the forces, the judges, the treasurers or general receivers, the counsellors, and the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, they must all come to the dedicating of this image, upon pain and peril of what shall fall thereon. He summons the great men, for the greater honour of his idol; it is therefore mentioned to the glory of Christ that kings shall bring presents unto him. If he can bring them to pay homage to his golden image, he doubts not but the inferior people will follow of course. In obedience to the king's summons, all the magistrates and officers of that vast kingdom leave the services of their particular countries, and come to Babylon to the dedicating of this golden image; long journeys many of them took, and expensive ones, upon a very foolish errand; but as the idols are senseless things, such are the worshippers.

Thirdly. A proclamation made, commanding all manner of persons present before the image, upon the signal given, to fall down prostrate, and worship the image, under the style and title of, "The golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up." A herald proclaims this aloud throughout this vast assembly of grandees, with their numerous train of servants and attendants, and a great crowd of people, no doubt, that were not sent for; let them all take notice: 1. That the king doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to fall down and worship the golden image; whatever other gods they worship at other times, now they must worship this. 2. That they must all do this just at the same time, in token of their communion with each other in this idolatrous service. And that, in order hereunto, notice shall be given by a concert of music, which would likewise serve to adorn the solemnity, and to sweeten and soften the minds of those that were loth to yield, and to bring them to comply with the king's command. This mirth and gaiety in the worship would be very agreeable to carnal, sensual minds, that are strangers to that spiritual worship which is owing to God, who is a Spirit.

Fourthly. The general compliance of the assembly with this command, ver. 7. They heard the sound of the musical instruments, both wind instruments and hand instruments, the cornet and flute, with the harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, the melody of which they thought was ravishing,—and fit enough it was to excite such a devotion as they were then to pay,—and immediately they all, as one man, as soldiers that are wont to be exercised by beat of drum, "all the people, nations, and languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image." And no marvel, when it was proclaimed that whosoever would not worship this golden image should be immediately thrown "into the midst of a burning, fiery furnace," ready prepared for that purpose, ver. 6. Here were the charms of music to allure them into a compliance, and the terrors of the fiery furnace to frighten them into a compliance. Thus beset with temptations, they all yielded. Note, That way that sense directs the most will go; there is nothing so bad which the careless world will not be drawn to by a concert of music, or driven to by a fiery furnace. And by such methods as these false worship hath been set up and maintained.

8 Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans came near, and accused the Jews. 9 They spake and said to the king Nebuchadnezzar, O king, live for ever. 10 Thou, O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, shall fall down and worship the golden image: 11 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 12 There are certain Jews whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have not regarded thee: they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. 13 Then Nebuchadnezzar in his rage and fury commanded to bring Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Then they brought these men before the king. 14 Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up? 15 Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? 16 Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. 17 If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. 18 But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

It was strange that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego should be present at this assembly, when it is likely they knew for what intent it was called together. Daniel, we may suppose, was absent, either his business calling him away or having leave from the king to withdraw, unless we suppose that he stood so high in the king's favour that none durst complain of him for his non-compliance. But why did not his companions keep out of the way? Surely because they would obey the king's orders as far as they could, and would be ready to bear a public testimony against this gross idolatry. They did not think it enough not to bow down to the image, but being in office thought themselves obliged to stand up against it, though it was the image which the king their master set up, and would be a golden image to them that worshipped it. Now,

First. Information is brought to the king, by certain Chaldeans, against these three gentlemen, that they did not obey the king's edict, ver. 8. Perhaps these Chaldeans that accused them were some of those magicians or astrologers that were particularly called Chaldeans, ch. ii. 2, 4, who bore a grudge to Daniel's companions for his sake, because he had eclipsed them, and so had these his companions. They, by their prayers, had obtained the mercy which saved the lives of these Chaldeans, and behold how they requite them, evil for good; for their love they are their adversaries. Thus "Jeremiah stood before God to speak good for them" who afterwards "digged a pit for his life," Jer. xviii. 20. We must not think it strange if we meet with such ungrateful men. Or, perhaps they were such of the Chaldeans as expected the places to which they were advanced, and envied them their preferments; "and who can stand before envy?" They appeal to the king himself concerning the edict, with all due respect to his majesty, and the usual compliment, "O king, live for ever," as if they aimed at nothing but his honour, and to serve his interest, when really they were putting upon him that which would endanger the ruin of him and his kingdom. They beg leave, 1. To put him in mind of the law he had lately made, that all manner of persons, without exception of nation or language, should "fall down and worship the golden image;" they put him in mind also of the penalty which, by the law, was to be inflicted upon recusants, that they were to be "cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace," ver. 10, 11. It cannot be denied but that this was the law; whether a righteous law or no, ought to be considered. 2. To inform him that these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, had not conformed to this edict, ver. 12. It is likely Nebuchadnezzar had no particular design to ensnare them in making the law, for then he would himself have had his eye upon them, and would not have needed this information; but their enemies, that sought an occasion against them, laid hold on this, and were forward to accuse them. To aggravate the matter, and incense the king the more against them, 1st. They put him in mind of the dignity to which the criminals had been preferred. Though they were Jews, foreigners, captives, men of a despised nation and religion, yet the king had "set them over the affairs of the province of Babylon;" it was therefore very ungrateful, and an insufferable piece of insolence, for them to disobey the king's command that had shared so much of the king's favour. And besides, the high station they were in would make their refusal the more scandalous, to be of ill example, and to have an ill influence upon others, and therefore it was necessary it should be severely animadverted upon. Thus princes that are incensed enough against innocent people commonly want not those about them who do all they can to make them worse. 2nd. They suggest that it was done maliciously, contumaciously, and in contempt of him and his authority: They have "set no regard upon thee," for they serve not the gods thou servest, and which thou requirest them to serve, nor "worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Secondly. These three pious Jews are immediately brought before the king, and arraigned and examined upon this information. Nebuchadnezzar fell into a great passion, and "in his rage and fury commanded" them to be seized, ver. 13. How little was it the honour of this mighty prince that he had rule over so many nations, when at the same time he had no "rule over his own spirit," that there were so many who were subjects and captives to him, when he himself was a perfect slave to his own brutish passions, and led captive by them; how unfit was he to rule reasonable men who could not himself be ruled by reason! It needed not be a surprise to him to hear that these three men did not now serve his gods, for he knew very well they never had done it; and their religion, which they had always adhered to, forbade them to do it. Nor had he any reason to think they did it in contempt of his authority, who had in all instances shewed themselves respectful and dutiful to him as their prince; but it was especially unseasonable at this time, when he was in the midst of his devotions, dedicating his golden image, to be in such a rage and fury, and so much to discompose himself. The discretion of a man, one would think, should at least have deferred this anger. True devotion calms the spirit, quiets and meekens it; but superstition, and a devotion to false gods, inflames men's passions, inspires them with rage and fury, and turns them into brutes. "The wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion," so was the wrath of this king; and yet, when he was in such a heat, these three men were brought before him, and appeared with an undaunted courage and unshaken constancy.

Thirdly. The case is laid before them in short, and it is put to them whether they will comply or no? 1. The king asked them whether it was true that they had not worshipped the golden image when others did, ver. 14. 'Is it of purpose?' so some read it; was it designedly and deliberately done, or was it only through inadvertency that you have not served my gods? What! you that I have nourished and brought up, that have been educated and maintained at my charge, that I have been so kind to, and done so much for, you that have been in such reputation for wisdom, and therefore should better have known your duty to your prince; what! "Do not you serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?" Note, The faithfulness of God's servants to him has often been the wonder of their enemies and persecutors, who think it strange that they run not with them to the same excess of riot. 2. He was willing to admit them to a new trial. If they did on purpose not do it before, yet, it may be, upon second thoughts they will change their mind; it is therefore repeated to them upon what terms they now stand, ver. 15. 1st. The king is willing that music shall play again only for their sakes, to soften them into a compliance; and if they will not, like the deaf adder, stop their ears, but will hearken to the voice of the charmers, and will worship the golden image, well and good, their former omission shall be pardoned. But, 2nd. The king is resolved, if they persist in their refusal, that they shall immediately be "cast into the fiery furnace," and shall not have so much as an hour's reprieve. Thus doth the matter lie in a little compass,—turn or burn; and because he knew they buoyed themselves up in their refusal with a confidence in their God, he insolently sets him at defiance; and "Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" let him, if he can. Now he forgot what he himself once owned, that their God was a "God of gods," and a "Lord of kings," ch. ii. 47. Proud men are still ready to say, as Pharaoh, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" or as Nebuchadnezzar, Who is the Lord, that I should fear his power?

Fourthly. They give in their answer, which they all agree in, that they still adhere to their resolution, not to worship the golden image, ver. 16—18. We have here such an instance of fortitude and magnanimity as is scarce to be paralleled. We call these the three children, and they were indeed young men; but we should rather call them the three champions, the first three of the worthies of God's kingdom among men. They did not break out into any intemperate heat or passion against those that did worship the golden image, did not insult or affront them; nor did they rashly thrust themselves upon the trial, or go out of their way to court martyrdom; but, when they were duly called to the fiery trial, they quitted themselves bravely, with a conduct and courage that became sufferers for so good a cause. The king was not so daringly bad in making this idol but they were as daringly good in witnessing against it. They keep their temper admirably well, do not call the king a tyrant or an idolater,—the cause of God needs not the wrath of man; but, with an exemplary calmness and sedateness of mind they deliberately give in their answer, which they resolve to abide by. Observe,

1. Their gracious and generous contempt of death, and the noble negligence with which they look upon the dilemma that they are put to: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter." They do not in sullenness deny him an answer, nor stand mute, but they tell him they are in no care about it. 'There needs not an answer,' so some read it; they are resolved not to comply, and the king is resolved they shall die if they do not. The matter therefore is determined, and what needs it be disputed? But it is better read, 'We want not an answer for thee,' nor have it to seek, but come prepared. 1st. They needed no time to deliberate concerning the matter of their answer, for they did not in the least hesitate whether they should comply or no. It was a matter of life and death, and one would think they might have considered awhile before they had resolved; life is desirable, and death is dreadful. But when the sin and duty that were in the case were immediately determined by the letter of the second commandment, and no room was left to question that, the life and death that were in the case were not to be considered. Note, Those that would avoid sin must not parley with temptation; when that which we are allured or affrighted to is manifestly evil, the motion is rather to be rejected with indignation and abhorrence than reasoned with. Stand not to pause about it, but say as Christ has taught us, "Get thee behind me, Satan." 2nd. They needed no time to contrive how they should word it; while they were advocates for God, and were called out to witness in his cause, they doubted not but it should be "given them in that same hour what they should speak," Mat. x. 19. They were not contriving an evasive answer, when a direct answer was expected from them; no, nor would they seem to court the king not to insist upon it. Here is nothing in their answer that looks like compliment; they begin not as their accusers did, with, "O king, live for ever;" no artful insinuation, ad captandam benevolentiam,—'to put him into a good humour;' but every thing that is plain and downright: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee." Note, Those that make their duty their main care need not be careful concerning the event.

2. Their believing confidence in God, and their dependence upon him, ver. 18. This was it that enabled them to look with so much contempt upon death, death in pomp, death in all its terrors. They trusted in the living God, and by that faith chose rather to suffer than to sin; they therefore feared not the wrath of the king, but endured, because by faith they had an eye to him that is invisible, Heb. xi. 25, 27. "If it be so," if we are brought to this strait, if we must be thrown into the fiery furnace unless we serve thy gods, know then, 1st. That though we worship not thy gods, yet we are not atheists; there is a God, whom we can call ours, to whom we faithfully adhere. 2nd. That we serve this God, we have devoted ourselves to his honour, we employ ourselves in his work, and depend upon him to protect us, provide for us, and reward us. 3rd. Thus we are well assured this God is "able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace;" whether he will or no, we are sure he can either prevent our being cast into the furnace or rescue us out of it. Note, The faithful servants of God will find him a master able to bear them out in his service, and control and overrule all the powers that are armed against them; "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst." 4th. That we have reason to hope he will deliver us, partly because, in such a vast appearance of idolaters, it would be very much for the honour of his great name to deliver them, and partly because Nebuchadnezzar had defied him to do it, "Who is that God that shall deliver you?" God sometimes appears wonderfully for the silencing of the blasphemies of the enemy, as well as for the answering of the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxv. 18—22; Deu. xxxii. 27. But if he do not deliver us from the fiery furnace, he will deliver us out of thy hand. He can but torment and kill the body, and after that there is no more that he can do; then they are got out of his reach, delivered out of his hand. Note, Good thoughts of God will help very much to carry us through sufferings, and a full assurance that he is with us while we are with him; and if he be for us we need not fear what man can do unto us. Let him do his worst, God will deliver us either from death or in death.

3rd. Their firm resolution however to stick to their principles; ver. 18, "But if not," though God should not think fit to deliver us from the fiery furnace, which yet we know he can do,—if he should suffer us to fall into thy hand, and fall by thy hand,—yet be it known unto thee, O king, we will not serve these gods, though they are thy gods, nor worship this golden image, though thou thyself hast set it up. They are neither ashamed nor afraid to own their religion, and tell the king to his face that they do not fear him, they will not yield to him. Would they have consulted with flesh and blood, much might have been said to bring them to a compliance, especially when there was no other way of avoiding death, so great a death. 1st. They were not required to abjure their own God, or to renounce his worship, no, nor by any verbal profession or declaration to own this golden image to be a god, but only to bow down before it, which they might do with a secret reserve of their hearts for the God of Israel, inwardly detesting this idolatry, as Naaman bowed in the house of Rimmon. 2nd. They were not to fall into a course of idolatry; it was but one single act that was required of them, which would be done in a minute, and the danger was over, and they might afterwards declare their sorrow for it. 3rd. The king that commanded it had an absolute power; they were under it, not only as subjects but as captives, and if they did it, it was purely by coercion and duress, and that would serve to excuse them. 4th. He had been their benefactor, had educated and preferred them, and in gratitude to him they ought to go as far as they could, though it were to strain a point, a point of conscience. 5th. They were now driven into a strange country, and to those that were so driven out it was in effect said, "Go and serve other gods," 1 Sam. xxvi. 19; it was taken for granted that in their disposition they would serve other gods, and it was made a part of the judgment, Deu. iv. 28. They might be excused if they go down the stream, when it is so strong. 6th. Did not their kings, and their princes, and their fathers, yea, and their priests too, set up idols even in God's temple, and worship them there, and not only bow down to them, but erect altars, burn incense, and offer sacrifices, even their own children, to them? Did not all the ten tribes for many ages worship gods of gold at Dan and Bethel? and shall they be more precise than their fathers? Communis error facit jus,—'What all do must be right.' 7th. If they should comply they would save their lives and keep their places, and so be in a capacity to do a great deal of service to their brethren in Babylon, and to do it long, for they were young men, and rising men. But there is enough in that one word of God wherewith to answer and silence these, and many more such like carnal reasonings, "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to any images, nor worship them." They know they must obey God rather than man. They must rather suffer than sin, and must not do evil that good may come, and therefore none of these things move them; they are resolved rather to die in their integrity than live in their iniquity. While their brethren, who yet remained in their own land, were worshipping images of theirs, these here in Babylon would not be brought to it by constraint; but as if they were good by antiperistasis, were most zealous against idolatry in an idolatrous country. And truly, all things considered, the saving of them from this sinful compliance was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace as the saving of them out of the fiery furnace was in the kingdom of nature. These were they who formerly resolved not to defile themselves with the king's meat, and now they as bravely resolved not to defile themselves with his gods. Note, A steadfast, self-denying adherence to God and duty in lesser instances, will qualify and prepare us for the like in greater; and in this we must be resolute, never under any pretence whatsoever to worship images, or to yield our consent with them that do so.

19 Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: therefore he spake, and commanded that they should heat the furnace one seven times more than it was wont to be heated. 20 And he commanded the most mighty men that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to cast them into the burning fiery furnace. 21 Then these men were bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats, and their other garments, and were cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 22 Therefore because the king's commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. 23 And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 24 Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonied, and rose up in haste, and spake, and said unto his counsellors, Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the king, True, O king. 25 He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God. 26 Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and spake, and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, ye servants of the most high God, come forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, came forth of the midst of the fire. 27 And the princes, governors, and captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them.

COAT, HOSEN, AND HATS.—FROM PERSEPOLIS.—ver. 21.

In those verses we have,

First. The casting of these three faithful servants of God into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar had himself known and owned so much of the true God, that one would have thought, though his pride and vanity carried him to make this golden image, and set it up to be worshipped, yet that what these young men now said, (whom he had formerly found to be wiser than all his wise men,) should have revived his convictions, and at least have engaged him to dispense with them; but it proved quite otherwise.

1. Instead of being convinced by what they said, he was exasperated, and made more outrageous, ver. 19. It made him "full of fury," and the "form of his visage was changed" against these men. Note, Brutish passions, the more they are indulged, the more violent they grow, and even change the countenance, to the great reproach of the wisdom and reason of a man. Nebuchadnezzar in this heat exchanged the awful majesty of a prince upon his throne, or a judge upon the bench, for the frightful fury of a wild bull in a net. Would men in a passion but see their faces in a glass, they would blush at their own folly, and turn all their displeasure against themselves.

2. Instead of mitigating their punishment in consideration of their quality, and the posts of honour they were in, he ordered it to be heightened,—that they should "heat the furnace seven times more than it was wont to be heated" for other malefactors; that is, that they should put seven times more fuel to it, which, though it would not make their death more grievous, but rather dispatch them the sooner, yet was designed to signify that the king looked upon their crime as seven times more heinous than the crimes of others, and so made their death the more ignominious. But God brought glory to himself out of this foolish instance of the tyrant's rage; for, though it would not have made their death the more grievous, yet it did make their deliverance much the more illustrious.

3. He ordered them to be bound in their clothes, and cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace, which was done accordingly, ver. 20, 21. They were bound that they might not struggle or make any resistance, were bound in their clothes, for haste, or that they might be consumed the more slowly and gradually. But God's providence ordered it for the increase of the miracle, in that their clothes were not so much as singed. They were bound in their coats or mantles, their hosen or breeches, and their hats or turbans; as if, in detestation of their crime, they would have their clothes to be burnt with them. What a terrible death was this! to be "cast bound into the midst of a burning fiery furnace," ver. 23. It makes one's flesh tremble to think of it, and horror to take hold on one. It is amazing that the tyrant was so hard-hearted as to inflict such a punishment, and the confessors so stout-hearted as to submit to it, rather than sin against God; but what is this to the second death? to that furnace into which the tares shall be cast in bundles? to that lake which burns eternally with fire and brimstone? Let Nebuchadnezzar heat his furnace as hot as he can, a few minutes will finish the torment of those who are cast into it. But hell-fire tortures, and doth not kill. The pain of damned sinners is more exquisite, and "the smoke of their torment ascends for ever and ever;" and "they have no rest," no intermission, no cessation of their pain, "who have worshipped the beast, and his image," Rev. xiv. 10, 11; whereas their pain would be soon over that were cast into this furnace for not worshipping this Babylonian beast and his image.

4. It was a remarkable providence that the men, the mighty men, that bound them and threw them into the furnace, were themselves consumed or suffocated by the flame, ver. 22. The king's commandment was urgent, that they should dispatch them quickly, and be sure to do it effectually, and therefore they resolved to go to the very mouth of the furnace, that they might throw them into the midst of it, but were in such haste that they would not take time to arm themselves accordingly. The apocryphal additions to Daniel say that the flame ascended forty-nine cubits above the mouth of the furnace. Probably God ordered it so that the wind blew it directly upon them with such violence that it smothered them. God did thus immediately plead the cause of his injured servants, and take vengeance for them on their persecutors, whom he punished, not only in the very act of their sin, but by it. But these men were only the instruments of cruelty, he that bade them do it had the greater sin; yet they suffered justly for executing an unjust decree, and it is very likely they did it with pleasure, and were glad to be so employed; and Nebuchadnezzar himself was reserved for a farther reckoning. There is a day coming when proud tyrants will be punished, not only for the cruelties they have been guilty of, but for employing those about them in their cruelties, and so exposing them to the judgments of God.

Secondly. The deliverance of these three faithful servants of God out of the furnace. When they were cast bound into the midst of that devouring fire we might well conclude we should hear no more of them, that their very bones would be calcined; but to our amazement we here find that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego are yet alive.

1. Nebuchadnezzar finds them walking in the fire. "He was astonied, and rose up in haste," ver. 24. Perhaps the slaying of the men that executed his sentence was that which astonied him, as well it might, for he had reason to think his own turn would be next, or it was some unaccountable impression upon his own mind that astonied him, and made him rise up in haste, and go to the furnace to see what was become of those he had cast into it. Note, God can strike those with astonishment whose hearts are most hardened, both against him and against his people. He that made the soul can make his sword to approach to it, even to that of the greatest tyrant. In his astonishment he calls his counsellors about him, and appeals to them, whether we did not cast three men bound into the fire. It seems it was done by order, not only by the king, but of the council. They durst not but concur with him, which he forced them to do, that they might share with him in the guilt and odium. "True, O king," say they, we did order such an execution to be done, and it was done; but now, saith the king, I have been looking into the furnace, and "I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire," ver. 25. 1st. They were loosed from their bonds. The fire, which did not so much as singe their clothes, burnt the cords wherewith they were tied, and set them at liberty. Thus God's people have their hearts enlarged, through the grace of God, by those very troubles with which their enemies designed to straiten and hamper them. 2nd. They had no hurt, made no complaint, felt no pain or uneasiness in the least. The flame did not scorch them, the smoke did not stifle them, they were alive, and as well as ever, in the midst of the flames. See how the God of nature can, when he pleaseth, control the powers of nature, to make them serve his purposes. Now was fulfilled in the letter that gracious promise, Isa. xliii. 2, "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." By faith they "quench the violence of the fire, quench the fiery darts of the wicked." 3rd. They "walked in the midst of the fire." The furnace was large, so that they had room to walk; they were unhurt, so that they were able to walk; their minds were easy, so that they were disposed to walk, as in a paradise or garden of pleasure: "Can a man walk upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt?" Pr. vi. 28. Yes, they did it with as much pleasure as the king of Tyrus "walked up and down in the midst of his stones of fire," his precious stones, that sparkled as fire, Eze. xxviii. 14. They were not striving to get out, finding themselves unhurt; but, leaving it to that God who preserved them in the fire to bring them out of it, they walked up and down in the midst of it, unconcerned. One of the apocryphal writings relates at large the prayer which Azariah, one of the three, prayed in the fire, wherein he laments the calamities and iniquities of Israel, and entreats God's favour to his people; and the song of praise, which they all three sung in the midst of the flames; in both which there are remarkable strains of devotion. But we have reason to think, with Grotius, that they were composed by some Jew of a later age, not as what were used, but only as what might have been used, on this occasion, and therefore we justly reject them as no part of holy writ. 4th. There was a fourth seen with them in the fire, whose form, in Nebuchadnezzar's judgment, was "like the Son of God;" he appeared as a Divine person, a messenger from heaven, not as a servant, but as a Son. 'Like an angel,' so some; and angels are called "sons of God," Job xxxviii. 7. In the apocryphal narrative of this story it is said, "The angel of the Lord came down into the furnace;" and Nebuchadnezzar here saith, (ver. 28,) that God sent his angel and delivered them; and it was an angel that shut the lions' mouths when Daniel was in the den, ch. vi. 22. But some think it was the eternal Son of God, the angel of the covenant, and not a created angel. He appeared often in our nature before he assumed it for good and all; and never more seasonably, nor to give a more proper indication and presage of his great errand into the world, in the fulness of time, than now, when to deliver his chosen out of the fire he came and walked with them in the fire. Note, Those that suffer for Christ have his gracious presence with them in their sufferings, even in the fiery furnace, even in the valley of the shadow of death, and therefore even there they need fear no evil. Hereby Christ shewed that what is done against his people he takes as done against himself; whoever throws them into the furnace doth in effect throw him in; "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest," Acts ix. 5.

2. Nebuchadnezzar calls them out of the furnace, ver. 26. He "came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace; bids them "come forth, and come hither;" 'Come forth, come,' so some read it. He speaks with a great deal of tenderness and concern, and stands ready to lend them his hand, and help them out. He is convinced, by their miraculous preservation, that he did ill to cast them into the furnace, and therefore he doth not "thrust them out privily; nay, verily, but he will come himself and fetch them out," Acts xvi. 37. Observe the respectful title that he gives them; when he was in the heat of his fury and rage against them it is likely he called them rebels and traitors, and all the ill names he could invent, but now he owns them for "the servants of the most high God," a God who now appears "able to deliver them out of his hand." Note, Sooner or later God will convince the proudest of men that he is the most high God, and above them, and too hard for them, even in those things wherein they deal proudly and presumptuously, Ex. xviii. 11. He will likewise let them know who are his servants, and that he owns them, and will stand by them; Elijah prayed, 1 Kin. xviii. 36, "Let it be known that thou art God, and that I am thy servant." Nebuchadnezzar now embraces those whom he had abandoned, and is very officious about them, now he perceives them to be the favourites of heaven. Note, What persecutors have done against God's servants, when God opens their eyes they must, as far as they can, undo again.

How the fourth, whose "form was like the Son of God," withdrew, and whether he vanished away or visibly ascended, we are not told; but of the other three we are informed, 1st. That they "came forth out of the midst of the fire," as Abraham their father out of Ur, that is, the fire of the Chaldees, into which, saith this tradition of the Jews, he was cast, for refusing to worship idols, and out of which he was delivered as those his three children were When they had their discharge they did not tempt God by staying in any longer, but came forth as brands out of the burning. 2nd. That it was made to appear, to the full satisfaction of all the amazed spectators, that they had not received the least damage by the fire, ver. 27. All the great men came together to view them, and found that there was not so much as "a hair of their head singed." Here that was true in the letter which our Saviour spoke figuratively, for an assurance to his suffering servants, that they should sustain no real damage; Lu. xxi. 18, "There shall not a hair of your head perish." Their clothes did not so much as change colour, or smell of fire, much less were their bodies in the least scorched or blistered. No, "the fire had no power on them." The Chaldeans worshipped the fire as a sort of an image of the sun; so that, in restraining the fire now, God put contempt, not only upon their king, but upon their god too, and shewed that "his voice divides the flames of fire," as well as the floods of water, Ps. xxix. 7, when he pleaseth to make a way for his people through the midst of it. It is our God only that is the consuming fire, Heb. xii. 29; other fire, if he but speak the word, shall not consume.

28 Then Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God. 29 Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill: because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. 30 Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon.

The strict observations that were made, super visum corporis,—'on inspecting their bodies,' by the princes and governors, and all the great men who were present upon this public occasion, and who could not be supposed partial in favour of the confessors, contributed much to the clearing of this miracle, and the magnifying of the power and grace of God in it. "That indeed a notable miracle has been done is manifest, and we cannot deny it," Acts iv. 16. Let us now see what effect it had upon Nebuchadnezzar.

First. He gives glory to the God of Israel, as a God able and ready to protect his worshippers; ver. 28, "Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego." Let him have the honour, both of the faithful allegiance which his subjects bear to him and the powerful protection he grants to them, neither of which can be paralleled between any other nation and their gods. The king doth himself acknowledge and adore him, and thinks it is fit he should be acknowledged and adored by all; "Blessed be the God of Shadrach." Note, God can extort confessions of his blessedness, even from those that have been ready to "curse him to his face." 1. He gives him the glory of his power, that he was able to protect his worshippers against the most mighty and malignant enemies; "There is no other god that can deliver after this sort," ver. 29; no, not this golden image which he had set up. For this reason there was no other god that obliged his worshippers to cleave to him only, and to suffer death rather than worship any other, as the God of Israel did; for they could not engage to bear them out in so doing, as he could. If God can work such deliverance as no other can, he may demand such obedience as no other may. 2. He gives him the glory of his goodness, that he was ready to do it; ver. 28, "He hath sent his angel and delivered his servants." Bel could not save his worshippers from being burnt at the mouth of the furnace, but the God of Israel saved his from being burnt when they were cast into the midst of the furnace, because they refused to worship any other god. By this Nebuchadnezzar was plainly given to understand that all the great success which he had had, and should yet have, against the people of Israel, which he gloried in, as if he had therein overpowered the God of Israel, was owing purely to their sin. If the body of that nation had faithfully adhered to their own God, and the worship of him only, as these three men did, they should all have been delivered out of his hand, as these three men were. And this was a necessary instruction for him at this time.

Secondly. He applauds the constancy of these three men in their religion, and describes it to their honour, ver. 28. Though he is not himself persuaded to own their God for his, and to worship him, because if he do so he knows he must worship him only, and renounce all others, and he calls him the God of Shadrach, not, My God, yet he commends them for sticking to him, and not serving or worshipping any other god but their own. Note, There are many who are not religious themselves, and yet will own they are clearly in the right that are religious, and are stedfast in their religion. Though they are not themselves persuaded to close with it, they will commend those who, having closed with it, cleave to it. If men have given up their names to that God who will alone be served, let them stick to their principles, and serve him only, whatever it cost them. Such a constancy in the true religion will turn to men's praise, even among them that are without, when unsteadiness, treachery, and double dealing, are what all men will cry shame on. He commends them that they did this, 1. With a generous contempt of their lives, which they valued not in comparison with the favour of God, and the testimony of a good conscience. They yielded their own bodies to be cast into the fiery furnace, rather than they would not only not forsake their God, but not affront him by once paying that homage to any other which is due to him alone. Note, Those shall have their praise, if not of men, yet of God, who prefer their souls before their bodies, and will rather lose their lives than forsake their God. Those know not the worth and value of religion that do not think it worth suffering for. 2. They did it with a glorious contradiction to their prince. They "changed the king's word," that is, they went contrary to it; and thereby put contempt upon both his precepts and threatenings, and made him repent and revoke both. Note, Even kings themselves must own that when their commands are contrary to the commands of God, he is to be obeyed, and not they. 3. They did it with a gracious confidence in their God. They trusted in him that he would stand by them in what they did, that he would either bring them out of the fiery furnace back to their place on earth or lead them through the fiery furnace forward to their place in heaven; and in this confidence they became fearless of the king's wrath, and regardless of their own lives. Note, A stedfast faith in God will produce a stedfast faithfulness to God. Now this honourable testimony, thus publicly borne by the king himself, to these servants of God, we may well think would have a good influence upon the rest of the Jews that were, or should be, captives in Babylon. Their neighbours could not with any confidence urge them to do that, nor could they for shame do it, which their brethren were so highly applauded by the king himself for not doing. Nay, and what God did for these his servants would help not only to keep the Jews close to their religion while they were in captivity, but to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, for which end they were sent into captivity; and when it had had that blessed effect upon them, they might be assured God would deliver them out of that furnace, as now he delivered their brethren out of this.

Thirdly. He issues out a royal edict, strictly forbidding any to speak evil of the God of Israel, ver. 29. We have reason to think that both the sins and the troubles of Israel had given great occasion, though no just occasion, to the Chaldeans to blaspheme the God of Israel, and it is likely Nebuchadnezzar himself had encouraged it. But now, though he is no true convert, nor is wrought upon to worship him, yet he resolves never to speak ill of him again, nor to suffer others to do so. "Whoever shall speak any thing amiss," 'any error,' so some; or, rather, any reproach or blasphemy; whoever shall speak with contempt of the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, they shall be counted the worst of malefactors, and dealt with accordingly; they shall be cut in pieces,—as Agag was by the sword of Samuel,—and their houses shall be demolished and made a dunghill. The miracle now wrought by the power of this God, in defence of his worshippers, publicly in the sight of the thousands of Babylon, was a sufficient justification of this edict; and it would contribute much to the ease of the Jews in their captivity, to be by this law screened from the fiery darts of reproach and blasphemy, with which otherwise they would have been continually annoyed. Note, It is a great mercy to the church, and a good point gained, when its enemies, though they have not their hearts turned, yet have their mouths stopped, and their tongues tied. If a heathen prince laid such a restraint upon the proud lips of blasphemers, much more should Christian princes do it. Nay, in this thing, one would think men should be a law to themselves, and that those who have so little love to God that they care not to speak well of him, yet could never find in their hearts, for we are sure they could never find cause, to speak any thing amiss of him.

Fourthly. He not only reverseth the attainder of these three men, but restores them to their places in the government; 'makes them to prosper,' so the word is, and prefers them to greater and more advantageous trusts than they had been in before. He promoted them in the province of Babylon, which was so much to their honour, and the comfort of their brethren in captivity there. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to prefer and employ men of stedfastness in religion; for those are most likely to be faithful to them who are faithful to God, and it is likely to be well with them when God's favourites are made theirs.

CHAPTER IV.

The penman of this chapter is Nebuchadnezzar himself; the story concerning him here recorded is given us in his own words, as he himself drew it up, and published it; but Daniel, a prophet by inspiration, inserts it in his history, and so it has become a part of sacred writ, and a very observable part. Nebuchadnezzar was as daring a rival with God Almighty for the sovereignty as perhaps any mortal man ever was; but here he fairly owns himself conquered, and gives it under his hand that the God of Israel is above him. Here is, I. The preface to his narrative, wherein he acknowledges God's dominion over him, ver. 1—3. II. The narrative itself, wherein he relates, 1. His dream, which puzzled the magicians, ver. 1—18; 2. The interpretation of his dream by Daniel, who shewed him that it was a prognostication of his own fall, advising him therefore to repent and reform, ver. 19—27; 3. The accomplishment of it, in his running stark mad for seven years, and then recovering the use of his reason again, ver. 28—36; 4. The conclusion of the narrative, with an humble acknowledgment and adoration of God as Lord of all, ver. 37. This was extorted from him by the overruling power of that God who hath all men's hearts in his hand, and stands upon record a lasting proof of God's supremacy, a monument of his glory, a trophy of his victory, and a warning to all not to think of prospering while they lift up or harden their hearts against God.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. 2 I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me. 3 How great are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is from generation to generation.

Here is, First. Something of form, which was usual in writs, proclamations, or circular letters, issued out by the king, ver. 1. The royal style which Nebuchadnezzar makes use of has nothing in it of pomp or fancy, but plain and short, and unaffected—Nebuchadnezzar the king. If at other times he made use of great swelling words of vanity in his title, now he laid them all aside, for he was old, he was lately recovered from a distraction which had humbled and mortified him, and was now in the actual contemplation of God's greatness and sovereignty. The declaration is directed not only to his own subjects, but to all to whom this present writing shall come, to "all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth." He is not only willing they should all hear of it, though it carry the account of his own infamy, (which perhaps none durst have published, if he had not done it himself, and therefore Daniel publisheth the original paper,) but he strictly chargeth and commandeth all manner of persons to take notice of it; for all are concerned, and it may be profitable to all. He salutes those to whom he writes in the usual form, "Peace be multiplied unto you." Note, It becomes kings, with their commands, to disperse their good wishes, and, as fathers of their country, to bless their subjects. So the common form with us, 'We send greeting.' Omnibus quibus hæ presentes liter, pervenerintæ salutem,—'To all to whom these presents shall come, health;' and sometimes, salutem sempiternam,—'health and salvation everlasting.'

Secondly. Something of substance and matter. He writes this,

1. To acquaint others with the providences of God that had been concerning him; ver. 2, "I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God" (so he calls the true God) "hath wrought toward me." He thought it seemly, so the word is,—that it was his duty, and did well become him, that it was a debt he owed to God and the world, now he was recovered from his distraction,—to relate to distant places, and record for future ages, how justly God had humbled him, and how graciously he had at length restored him. All the nations, no doubt, had heard what befel Nebuchadnezzar, and rang of it; but he thought it fit that they should have a distinct account of it from himself, that they might know the hand of God in it, and what impressions were made upon his own spirit by it, and might speak of it not as a matter of news, but a matter of religion. The events concerning him were not only wonders to be admired, but signs to be instructed by, signifying to the world that Jehovah is greater than all gods. Note, We ought to shew to others God's dealings with us, both the rebukes we have been under, and the favours we have received; and though the account hereof may reflect disgrace upon ourselves, as this here did upon Nebuchadnezzar, yet we must not conceal it, as long as it may redound to the glory of God. Many will be forward to tell what God has done for their souls, because that turns to their own praise, who care not for telling what God has done against them, and how they deserved it; whereas we ought to give glory to God, not only by praising him for his mercies, but by confessing our sins, accepting the punishment of our iniquity, and in both taking shame to ourselves, as this mighty monarch here doth.

2. To shew how much he was himself affected with them, and convinced by them, ver. 3. We should always speak of the word and works of God with concern and seriousness, and shew ourselves affected with those great things of God which we desire others should take notice of. 1st. He admires God's doings. He speaks of them as one amazed; "How great are his signs, and how mighty are his wonders!" Nebuchadnezzar was now old, had reigned above forty years, and had seen as much of the world, and the revolutions of it, as most men ever did, and yet never till now, when himself was nearly touched, was he brought to admire surprising events as God's signs, and his wonders. Now, how great, how mighty, are they! Note. The more we see events to be the Lord's doing, and see in them the product of a Divine power, and the conduct of a Divine wisdom, the more marvellous they will appear in our eyes, Ps. cxviii. 23. 2nd. He infers from thence God's dominion. This is that he is at length brought to subscribe to, "His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom;" and not like his own kingdom, which he saw, and long since foresaw in a dream, hastening towards a period. He now owns there is a God that governs the world, and has an universal, incontestable, absolute dominion in and over all the affairs of the children of men. And it is the glory of this kingdom that it is everlasting; other reigns are confined to one generation, and other dynasties to a few generations, but "God's dominion is from generation to generation." It should seem Nebuchadnezzar here refers to what Daniel had foretold of a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up that should never be destroyed, ch. ii. 44, which, though meant of the kingdom of the Messiah, he understood of the providential kingdom. Thus we may make a profitable, practical use and application of those prophetical Scriptures which yet we do not fully, and perhaps not rightly, take the meaning of.

4 I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in mine house, and flourishing in my palace: 5 I saw a dream which made me afraid, and the thoughts upon my bed and the visions of my head troubled me. 6 Therefore made I a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me, that they might make known unto me the interpretation of the dream. 7 Then came in the magicians, the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers: and I told the dream before them; but they did not make known unto me the interpretation thereof. 8 But at the last Daniel came in before me, whose name was Belteshazzar, according to the name of my god, and in whom is the spirit of the holy gods: and before him I told the dream, saying, 9 O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, because I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret troubleth thee, tell me the visions of my dream that I have seen, and the interpretation thereof. 10 Thus were the visions of mine head in my bed; I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. 11 The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth: 12 The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it. 13 I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watcher and an holy one came down from heaven; 14 He cried aloud, and said thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches: 15 Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth: 16 Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him. 17 This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones: to the intent that the living may know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men. 18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now thou, O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof, forasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: but thou art able; for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee.

BANYAN TREE.

POSTURE OF HUMILIATION BEFORE A SUPERIOR.

Nebuchadnezzar, before he relates the judgments of God that had been brought upon him for his pride, gives an account of the fair warning he had of them before they came, which if he had duly regarded they might have been prevented. But therefore he was told of them, and of the issue of them before they came to pass, that when they did come to pass, by comparing them with the prediction of them, he might see and say that they were the Lord's doing; and might be brought to believe that there is a Divine revelation in the world, as well as a Divine providence, and that the works of God agree with his word.

Now in the account he here gives of his dream, by which he had notice of what was coming, we may observe,

First. The time when this alarm was given him, ver. 4. It was when he was "at rest in his house, and flourishing in his palace." He had newly conquered Egypt, and with it completed his victories, and ended his wars, and made himself monarch of all those parts of the world,—which was about the thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth year of his reign, Eze. xxix. 17,—then he had this dream, which was accomplished about a year after. Seven years his distraction continued, upon his recovery from which he penned this declaration, lived about two years after, and died in his forty-fifth year. He had undergone a long fatigue in his wars, had made many a tedious and dangerous campaign in the field; but now at length he is at rest in his house, and there is no adversary nor evil occurrent. Note, God can reach the greatest of men with his terrors then when they are most secure, and think themselves at rest and flourishing.

Secondly. The impression it made upon him; ver. 5, "I saw a dream which made me afraid." One would think no little thing would frighten him that had been a man of war from his youth, and used to look the perils of war in the face without change of countenance; yet, when God pleaseth, a dream strikes a terror upon him. His bed, no doubt, was soft and easy, and well guarded, and yet his own "thoughts upon his bed" make him uneasy, and the "visions of his head," the creatures of his own imagination, "trouble him." Note, God can make the greatest of men uneasy, even then when they say to their souls, "Take your ease, eat, drink, and be merry;" can make those that have been the troublers of the world, and have tormented thousands, to be their own troublers, their own tormentors, and those that have been the terror of the mighty a terror to themselves. By the consternation which this dream put him into, and the impression it made upon him, he perceived it to be not an ordinary dream, but sent of God on a special errand.

Thirdly. His consulting in vain with the magicians and astrologers concerning the meaning of it. He had not now forgot the dream, as before, ch. 2; he had it ready enough, but he wanted to know the interpretation of it, and what was prefigured by it, ver. 6. Orders are immediately given to summon "all the wise men of Babylon," that were such fools as to pretend by magic, divination, inspecting the entrails of beasts, or observations of the stars, to predict things to come; they must all come together to see if any or all of them in consultation could interpret the king's dream. It is likely these people had sometimes, in a like case, given the king some sort of satisfaction, and, by the rules of their art, had answered the king's queries so as to please him, whether it were right or wrong, hit or missed; but now his expectation from them was disappointed. He told them the dream, ver. 7, but they could not tell him the interpretation of it, though they had boasted with great assurance, ch. ii. 4, 7, that if they had but the dream told them they would, without fail, interpret it. But the key of this dream was in a sacred prophecy, Eze. xxxi. 3, &c., where the Assyrian is compared, as Nebuchadnezzar here, to a tree cut down for his pride; and that was a book they had not studied, or acquainted themselves with, else they might have been let into the mystery of this dream. Providence ordered it so, that they should be first puzzled with it, that Daniel's interpreting it afterwards might redound to the glory of the God of Daniel. Now was fulfilled what Isaiah foretold, ch. xlvii. 12, 13, that when the ruin of Babylon was drawing on, her enchantments and sorceries, her astrologers and star-gazers, should not be able to do her any service.

Fourthly. The court he made to Daniel to engage him to expound his dream to him. "At the last Daniel came in," ver. 8. Either he declined associating with the rest, because of their badness; or they declined his company, because of his goodness; or the king would rather his own magicians should have the honour of doing it, if they could, than that Daniel should have it; or Daniel being governor of the wise men, ch. ii. 48, was, as is usual, last consulted. Many make God's word their last refuge, and never have recourse to it till they are driven off from all other succours. He compliments Daniel very highly, takes notice of the name which he had himself given him, in the choice of which he thinks he was very happy, and that it was a good omen. His name was Belteshazzar, from Bel, the name of my god. He applauds his rare endowments, he has the spirit of the holy gods, so he tells him to his face, ver. 9, with which we may suppose Daniel was so far from being puffed up, that he was rather very much grieved, to hear that which he had by gift from the God of Israel, the true and living God, ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar's god, a dunghill deity. Here is a strange medley in Nebuchadnezzar, but such as is commonly found in those that side with their corruptions against their convictions.

1. He retains the language and dialect of his idolatry, and therefore it is to be feared is no convert to the faith and worship of the living God. He is an idolater, and his speech bewrayeth him; for he speaks of many gods, and is not brought to acquiesce in one as sufficient, no, not in Him who is all-sufficient. And some think, when he speaks of the spirit of the holy gods, he supposeth that there are some evil, malignant deities, whom men are concerned to worship only to prevent their doing them a mischief, and some that are good, beneficent deities, and that by the spirit of them Daniel was animated. He also owns that Bel was his god still, though he had once and again acknowledged the God of Israel to be Lord of all, ch. ii. 47; iii. 29. He also applauds Daniel, not as a servant of God, but as master of the magicians, ver. 9, supposing his knowledge to differ from theirs, not in kind, but only in degree; and he consulted him not as a prophet, but as a topping magician, so endeavouring to save the credit of the art, when those blundered and were nonplussed who were masters of the art. See how close his idolatry sat to him. He has got a notion of many gods, and hath chosen Bel for his god, and he cannot persuade himself to quit either his notion or his choice, though the absurdity of both had been evidenced to him more than once, beyond contradiction. He, like other heathens, would not change his gods, though they were no gods, Jer. ii. 11. Many persist in a false way, only because they think they cannot in honour leave it. See how loose his convictions sat, and how easily he had dropped them. He once called the God of Israel "a God of gods," ch. ii. 47; now he sets him upon a level with the rest of those whom he calls the holy gods. Note, If convictions be not speedily prosecuted, it is a thousand to one but in a little time they are quite lost and forgotten. Nebuchadnezzar, not going forward with the acknowledgments he had been brought to make of the sovereignty of the true God, soon went backward, and relapsed to the same veneration he had always had for his false gods. And yet,

2. He professeth a great opinion of Daniel, whom he knows to be a servant of the true God, and of him only. He looked upon him as one that had such an insight, such a foresight, as none of his magicians had; "I know that no secret troubleth thee." Note, The spirit of prophecy quite outdoes the spirit of divination, even the enemies themselves being judges; for so it was adjudged here upon a fair trial of skill.

Fifthly. The particular account he gives him of his dream.

1. He saw a stately, flourishing tree, remarkable above all the trees of the wood. This tree was planted "in the midst of the earth," ver. 10, fitly representing him who reigned in Babylon, which was about the midst of the then known world. His dignity and eminence above all his neighbours was signified by the height of this tree, which was exceeding great, it "reached unto heaven." He overtopped those about him, and aimed to have Divine honours given him; nay, he overpowered those about him, and the potent armies he had the command of, with which he carried all before him, is signified by the strength of this tree. It grew and was strong; and so much was Nebuchadnezzar and his growing greatness the talk of the nations, so much had they their eye upon him, —some a jealous eye, all a wondering eye,—that the sight of this tree is said to be "to the end of all the earth." This tree had every thing in it that was pleasant to the eye, and good for food; ver. 12, "The leaves thereof were fair;" noting the pomp and splendour of Nebuchadnezzar's court, which was the wonder of strangers, and the glory of his own subjects. Nor was this tree for sight and state only, but for use. 1st. For protection. The boughs of it were for shelter, both to the beasts and to the fowls. Princes should be a screen to their subjects from the heat and from the storm, should expose themselves to secure them, and study how to make them safe and easy. If the bramble be promoted over the trees, he invites them to come and trust in his shadow, such as it is, Jud. ix. 15. It is protection that draws allegiance. The kings of the earth are to their subjects but as the shadow of a great tree; but Christ is to his subjects as the "shadow of a great rock," Isa. xxxii. 2. Nay, because that, though strong, yet may be cold, they are said to be hid under the "shadow of his wings," Ps. xvii. 8, where they are not only safe, but warm. 2nd. For provision. The Assyrian was compared to a cedar, Eze. xxxi. 6, which affords shadow only; but this tree here had much fruit, in it was "meat for all," and "all flesh was fed of it." This mighty monarch, it should seem by this, not only was great, but did good; he did not impoverish, but enrich his country, and by his power and interest abroad brought wealth and trade to it. They that exercise authority would be called benefactors, Lu. xxii. 25; and the most effectual course they can take to support their authority is to be really benefactors. And see what is the best that great men with their wealth and power can attain to, and that is, to have the honour of having many to live upon them, and to be maintained by them; for, as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them.

2. He heard the doom of this tree read, which he perfectly remembered, and relates it here, perhaps word for word as he heard it. The sentence was passed upon it by an angel, whom he saw come down from heaven, and heard him proclaim this sentence aloud. This angel is here called "a watcher," or watchman; not only because angels by their nature are spirits, and therefore neither slumber nor sleep, but because by their office they are ministering spirits, and attend continually to their ministrations, watching all opportunities of serving their great Master. They, as watchers, encamp round them that fear God, to deliver them, and bear them up in their hands. This angel was a messenger, or ambassador, so some read it, and "a holy one." Holiness becomes God's house, therefore angels that attend, and are employed by him, are holy ones; they preserve the purity and rectitude of their nature, and are in every thing conformable to the Divine will. Let us review the doom passed upon the tree.

1st. Orders are given that it be cut down, ver. 14. Now also the axe is laid to the root of this tree. Though it is never so high, never so strong, that cannot secure it when its day comes to fall; the beasts and fowls, that are sheltered in and under the boughs of it, are driven away and dispersed. The branches are cropped, the leaves shaken off, and the fruit scattered. Note, Worldly prosperity, in its highest degree, is a very uncertain thing; and it is no uncommon thing for those that have lived in the greatest pomp and power to be stripped of all that which they trusted to and gloried in. By the turns of providence those that made a figure become captives; those that lived in plenty, and above what they had, are reduced to straits, and live far below what they had; and those, perhaps, are brought to be beholden to others, who, when time was, had many depending upon them, and making suit to them. But "the trees of righteousness" that are "planted in the house of the Lord," and bring forth fruit to him, shall not be cut down, nor shall their leaf wither.

2nd. Care is taken that the root be preserved; ver. 15, "Leave the stump of it in the earth," exposed to all weathers; there let it lie neglected and buried in the grass. Let the beasts, that formerly sheltered themselves under the boughs, now repose themselves upon the stump; but that it may not be raked to pieces, or trodden to dirt, and to shew that it is yet reserved for better days, let it be hooped round with "a band of iron and brass," to keep it firm. Note, God in judgment remembers mercy, and may yet have good things in store for those whose condition seems most forlorn. There is "hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, that, through the scent of water, it will bud," Job xiv. 7—9.

3. The meaning of this is explained by the angel himself to Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 16. Whoever is the person signified by this tree he is sentenced to be deposed from the honour, state, and dignity of a man, to be deprived of the use of his reason, and to be and live like a brute, till "seven times pass over him." "Let a beast's heart be given unto him." This is surely the saddest and sorest of all temporal judgments, worse a thousand times than death, and though, like it, least felt by those that lie under it, yet to be dreaded and deprecated more than any others. Nay, whatever outward affliction God is pleased to lay upon us, we have reason to bear it patiently, and to be thankful that he continues to us the use of our reason, and the peace of our consciences. But those proud tyrants who "set their heart as the heart of God," Eze. xxviii. 2, justly may be deprived of the heart of man, and have a beast's heart given them.

4. The truth of it is confirmed; ver. 17, "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones." God has determined it; as a righteous Judge he has signed this edict; pursuant to his eternal counsel the decree is gone forth. And, 1st. The angels in heaven have subscribed to it, as attesting it, approving it, and applauding it. It is by the decree of the watchers; not that the great God needs the counsel or concurrence of the angels in any thing he determines or doth, but, as he useth their ministration in executing his counsels, so he is sometimes represented after the manner of men, as if he advised with them: "Whom shall I send?" Isa. vi. 8; "Who shall persuade Ahab?" 1 Kin. xxii. 20. So it notes the solemnity of this sentence. The king's breves, or short writs, pass, teste me ipso,—'in my presence;' but charters used to be signed, his testibus,—'in presence of us whose names are under-written;' such was Nebuchadnezzar's doom, it was by the decree of the watchers. 2nd. The saints on earth petitioned for it as well as the angels in heaven; the demand is by the word of the holy ones. God's suffering people, that had long groaned under the heavy yoke of Nebuchadnezzar's tyranny, cried to him for vengeance. They made the demand, and God gave this answer to it; for when the "oppressed cry to God he will hear," Ex. xxii. 27. This sentence was passed in Ahab's time, that there should be no more rain, at Elijah's word, when he "made intercession against Israel," 1 Kin. xvii. 1.

5. The design of it is declared. Therefore orders are given for the cutting down of this tree, to the intent that the living may know that the Most High rules. This judgment must be executed, to convince the unthinking, unbelieving world, that verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth, a God that governs the world, that not only has a kingdom of his own in it, and administers the affairs of that kingdom, but rules also in the kingdom of men, in the dominion that one man has over another, and giveth that to whomsoever he will; from him promotion comes, Ps. lxxv. 6, 7. He advanceth men to power and dominion that little expected it, and crosseth the projects of the ambitious and aspiring. Sometimes he sets up the basest of men, and serves his own purposes by them; mean men, as David from the sheepfold; "raiseth the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes," Ps. cxiii. 7, 8. Nay, sometimes he sets up ill men, to be a scourge to a provoking people. Thus he can do, thus he may do, thus he often doth, and gives not account of any of his matters. By humbling Nebuchadnezzar it was designed that the living should be made to know this; the dead know it, that are gone to the world of spirits, the world of retribution, they know that the Most High rules; but the living must be made to know it, and lay it to heart, that they may make their peace with God before it be too late.

Thus has Nebuchadnezzar fully and faithfully related his dream, what he saw, and what he heard, and then demands of Daniel the interpretation of it, ver. 18, for he found no one else was able to do it, but is confident he was, "for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee;" or, of the holy God, the proper title of the God of Israel. Much may be expected from those that have in them the spirit of the holy God. Whether Nebuchadnezzar had any jealousy that it was his own doom that was read by this dream, doth not appear. Perhaps he was so vain and secure as to imagine that it was some other prince that was rival with him, whose fall he had the pleasing prospect of given him in this dream; but, be it for him or against him, he is very solicitous to know the true meaning of it, and depends upon Daniel to give it him. Note, When God gives us general warnings of his judgments, we should be desirous to understand his mind in them, to hear "the Lord's voice crying in the city."

19 Then Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, was astonied for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake, and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies. 20 The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth; 21 Whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation: 22 It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth. 23 And whereas the king saw a watcher and an holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him; 24 This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree of the most High, which is come upon my lord the king: 25 That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. 26 And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule. 27 Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.

We have here the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which, when once it is applied to himself, and it is declared that he is the tree in the dream, (mutato nomine de te fabula narratur,—'change but the name, the fable speaks of thee,') when once it is said, Thou art the man, there needs little more to be said for the explication of the dream; out of his own mouth he is judged; so shall his doom be, himself has decided it. The thing was so plain, that Daniel, upon hearing the dream, was "astonied for one hour," ver. 19. He was struck with amazement and terror at so great a judgment coming upon so great a prince; his flesh trembled for fear of God. He was likewise struck with confusion when he found himself under a necessity of being the man that must bring to the king these heavy tidings, which, having received so many favours from the king, he had rather he should have heard from any one else; so far is he from desiring the woful day, that he dreads it, and the thoughts of it trouble him. They that come after the ruined sinner are said to be astonished at his day, as they that went before and saw his coming, as Daniel here, were affrighted, Job xviii. 20.

First. The preface to the interpretation is a civil compliment, which, as a courtier, he passeth upon the king. The king observed him to stand as one astonished, and thinking he was loth to speak out for fear of offending him, he encouraged him to deal plainly and faithfully with him. "Let not the dream or the interpretation thereof trouble thee." This he speaks, either, 1. As one that sincerely desired to know the truth. Note, Those that consult the oracles of God must be ready to receive them as they are, whether they be for them or against them, and must accordingly give their ministers leave to be free with them. Or, 2. As one that despised the truth, and set it at defiance. When we see how regardless he was of this warning afterwards, we are tempted to think this was his meaning,—Let it not trouble thee, for I am resolved it shall not trouble me, nor will I lay it to heart. But whether he have any concern for himself or no, Daniel is concerned for him, and therefore wishes "the dream be to them that hate thee." Let the ill it bodes light on the head of thine enemies, not on thine head. Though Nebuchadnezzar was an idolater, a persecutor, and an oppressor of the people of God, yet he was at present Daniel's prince, and therefore, though he foresees, and is now going to foretell, ill concerning him, he dare not wish ill to him.

Secondly. The interpretation itself is only a repetition of the dream, with application to the king. As for the tree which thou sawest flourishing, ver. 20, 21, "It is thou, O king," ver. 22; and willing enough would the king be to hear this, as before to hear, "Thou art the head of gold," but for that which follows. He shews the king his present prosperous state in the glass of his own dream, "Thy greatness is grown," and reacheth as near heaven as human greatness can do, "and thy dominion is to the end of the earth," ch. ii. 37, 38. As for the doom passed upon the tree, ver. 23, it is "the decree of the Most High, which comes upon my lord the king," ver. 24. He must not only be deposed from his throne, but driven from men, and, being deprived of his reason, and having a beast's heart given him, his dwelling shall be "with the beasts of the field," and with them he shall be a fellow-commoner, he shall "eat grass as oxen," and like them lie out all weathers, and be "wet with the dew of heaven," and this till "seven times" pass over him, that is, seven years, and then he shall know that the "Most High ruleth;" and when he is brought to know and own that, he shall be restored to his dominion again; ver. 26, "Thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee," shall remain as firm as "the stump of the tree" in the ground, and thou shalt have it, "after thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule." God is here called the heavens, because it is in heaven that he hath "prepared his throne," Ps. ciii. 19, from thence he "beholdeth all the sons of men," Ps. xxxiii. 13. "The heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's;" and the influence which the visible heavens have upon this earth is intended as a faint representation of the dominion the God of heaven has over this lower world. We are said to "sin against heaven," Lu. xv. 19. Note, Then only we may expect comfortably to enjoy our right in, and government of, both ourselves and others, when we dutifully acknowledge God's title to and dominion over us, and all we have.

Thirdly. The close of the interpretation is the pious counsel which Daniel, as a prophet, gave the king, ver. 27. Whether he appeared concerned or not at the interpretation of the dream, a word of advice would be very seasonable; if careless, to awaken him; if troubled, to comfort him. And it is not inconsistent with the dream, and the interpretation of it, for Daniel knew not but it might be conditional, like the prediction of Nineveh's destruction. Observe, 1. How humbly he gives his advice, and with what tenderness and respect; "O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee." Take it in good part, as coming from love, and well meant, and let it not be misinterpreted. Note, Sinners need to be courted to their own good, and spoken fair to do well for themselves. The apostle beseeches men to "suffer a word of exhortation," Heb. xiii. 22. We think it a good point gained if people will be persuaded to take good counsel kindly, nay, if they will take it patiently. 2. What his advice is. He doth not counsel him to enter into a course of physic, for the preventing of the distemper in his head, but to break off a course of sin that he was in, to reform his life. He wronged his own subjects, and dealt unfairly with his allies, and he must break off this by righteousness, by rendering to all their due, making amends for wrong done, and not triumphing over right with might. He had been cruel to the poor, to God's poor, to the poor Jews, and he must break off this iniquity by shewing mercy to those poor, pitying those oppressed ones, setting them at liberty, or making their captivity easy to them. Note, It is necessary, in repentance, that we not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only do no wrong to any, but do good to all. 3. What the motive is with which he backs this advice; "If it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity." Though it should not wholly prevent the judgment, yet by this means a reprieve may be obtained, as by Ahab's humbling himself, 1 Kin. xxi. 29; either the trouble may be the longer before it comes, or the shorter when it doth come; yet he cannot assure him of this, but it may be it may prove so. Note, The very probability of preventing a temporal judgment is inducement enough to a work so good in itself as the leaving of our sins, and reforming of our lives, much more the certainty of preventing our eternal ruin. 'That will be a healing of thine error,' so some read it. Thus the quarrel will be taken up, and all will be well again.

28 All this came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar. 29 At the end of twelve months he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon. 30 The king spake, and said, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? 31 While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; The kingdom is departed from thee. 32 And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

33 The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's dream accomplished, and Daniel's application of it to him justified and confirmed. How he took it we are not told, whether he was pleased with Daniel, or displeased; but here we have,

First. God's patience with him. All this came upon him, but not till twelve months after, ver. 29. So long there was a "lengthening of his tranquillity," though it doth not appear that he broke off his sins, or shewed any mercy to the poor captives; for this was still God's quarrel with him, that he "opened not the house of his prisoners," Isa. xiv. 17. Daniel having counselled him to repent, God so far confirmed his word that he gave him space to repent; he let him alone this year also, this one year more, before he brought this judgment upon him. Note, God is therefore longsuffering with provoking sinners, because he is not willing that "any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," 2 Pet. iii. 9.

Secondly. His pride and haughtiness, and abuse of that patience. He walked upon the "palace of the kingdom of Babylon," in pomp and pride, pleasing himself with the view of that vast city, which, with all the territories thereunto belonging, was under his command, and he said, either to himself or to those about him, perhaps some foreigners to whom he was shewing his kingdom, and the glory of it, "Is not this great Babylon?" Yes; it is great, of vast extent, no less than forty-five miles compass within the walls. It is full of inhabitants, and they full of wealth; it is a golden city, and that is enough to speak it great, Isa. xiv. 4. See the grandeur of the houses, walls, towers, and public edifices, (every thing in Babylon he thinks looks great,) and this great Babylon "I have built." Babylon was built many ages before he was born, but because he had fortified and beautified it,—and we may suppose much of it was rebuilt during his long and prosperous reign,—he boasts that he has built it; as Augustus Cæsar boasted concerning Rome, Lateritiam inveni, marmoream reliqui,—'I found it brick, but I left it marble.' He boasts that he built it "for the house of the kingdom," that is, the metropolis of his empire. This vast city, compared with the countries that belonged to his dominions, was but as one house. He built it with the assistance of his subjects, yet boasts that he did it by the might of his power; he built it for his security and convenience, yet, as if he had no occasion for it, boasts that he built it purely "for the honour of his majesty." Note, Pride and self-conceitedness is a sin that most easily besets great men, who have great things in the world. They are apt to take the glory to themselves which is due to God only,

Thirdly. His punishment for his pride. When he was thus strutting and vaunting himself, and adoring his own shadow, while the proud "word was in the king's mouth," the powerful word came from heaven, by which he was immediately deprived, 1. Of his honour as a king; "The kingdom is departed from thee." When he thought he had erected impregnable bulwarks for the preserving of his kingdom, now, in an instant, it is departed from him. When he thought it so well guarded that none could take it from him, behold, it departs of itself. As soon as he becomes utterly incapable to manage it, it is of course taken out of his hands. 2. He is deprived of his honour as a man; he loseth his reason, and, by that means, loseth his dominion; "They shall drive thee from men," ver. 32. And it was fulfilled, ver. 33, he "was driven from men the same hour;" that is, on a sudden he fell stark mad, distracted in the highest degree that ever any man was. His understanding and memory were gone, and all the faculties of a rational soul broken, so that he became a perfect brute in the shape of a man. He went naked, and on all fours, like a brute; did himself shun the society of reasonable creatures, and run wild in the fields and woods, and was driven out by his own servants, who, after some time of trial, despairing of his return to his right mind, abandoned him, and looked after him no more. He had not the spirit of a beast of prey, not that of the royal lion, but of the abject and less honourable species, for he was made to eat grass as oxen, and probably he did not speak with human voice, but lowed like an ox. Some think his body was all covered with hair; however, the hair of his head and beard, being never cut or combed, grew "like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws."

Let us pause a little and view this miserable spectacle, and let us receive instruction from it. 1st. Let us see here what a mercy it is to have the use of our reason; how thankful we ought to be for it; and how careful we ought to be not to do any thing which may either provoke God or may have a natural tendency to put us out of the possession of our own souls. Let us learn how to value our own reason, and to pity the case of those that are under the prevailing power of melancholy, or distraction, or are delirious, and to be very tender in our censures of them, and carriage towards them; for it is a temptation common to men, and a case which some time or other may be our own. 2nd. Let us see here the vanity of human glory and greatness. Is this Nebuchadnezzar the Great? What! this despicable animal, that is meaner than the poorest beggar? Is this he that looked so glorious in the throne, so formidable in the camp, that had politics enough to subdue and govern kingdoms, and now not so much sense as to keep his own clothes on his back? "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?" Isa. xiv. 16. Never let the "wise man then glory in his wisdom," or "the mighty man in his strength." 3rd. Let us see here how God resists the proud, and delights to abase them, and put contempt upon them. Nebuchadnezzar would be more than a man, and therefore God justly makes him less than a man; and puts him upon a level with the beasts that sets up for a rival with his Maker: see Job xl. 11—13.

34 And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the most High, and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation: 35 And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? 36 At the same time my reason returned unto me; and for the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned unto me; and my counsellors and my lords sought unto me; and I was established in my kingdom, and excellent majesty was added unto me. 37 Now I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's recovery from his distraction, and his return to his right mind, "at the end of the days" prefixed, that is, of the seven years. So long he continued a monument of God's justice, and a trophy of his victory over the children of pride, and he was made more so by being struck mad than if he had been in an instant struck dead with a thunderbolt. Yet it was a mercy to him that he was kept alive; for while there is life there is hope, that we may yet praise God, as he did here. "At the end of the days," saith he, "I lifted up mine eyes unto heaven," ver. 34, looked no longer down towards the earth as a beast, but began to look up as a man. Os homini sublime dedit,—'Heaven gave to man an erect countenance.' But there was more in it than this; he looked up as a devout man, as a penitent, as an humble petitioner for mercy, being perhaps never till now made sensible of his own misery. And now,

First. He hath the use of his reason so far restored to him that with it he glorifies God, and humbles himself under his mighty hand. He was told that he should continue in that forlorn case till he should know that "the Most High rules;" and here we have him brought to the knowledge of that, "Mine understanding returned to me, and I blessed the Most High." Note, Those may justly be reckoned void of understanding that do not bless and praise God; nor do men ever rightly use their reason till they begin to be religious, nor live as men till they live to the glory of God. As reason is the substratum, or subject of religion, so that creatures which have no reason are not capable of religion, so religion is the crown and glory of reason; and we have our reason in vain, and shall one day wish we had never had it, if we do not glorify God with it. This was the first act of Nebuchadnezzar's returning reason; and when this became the employment of it he was then, and not till then, qualified for all the other enjoyments of it. And till he was for a great while disabled to exercise it in other things he never was brought to apply it to this, which is the great end for which our reason is given us. His folly was the means whereby he became wise; he was not recovered by his dream of this judgment,—that was soon forgotten, like a dream,—but he is made to feel it, and then his ear is opened to discipline. To bring him to himself he must first be beside himself. And by this it appears that what good thoughts there were in his mind, and what good work was wrought there, was not of himself, for he was not his own man, but it was the gift of God. Let us see what Nebuchadnezzar is now at length effectually brought to the acknowledgment of; and we may learn from it what to believe concerning God.

1. That the Most High God lives for ever, and his being knows neither changing or period, for he has it of himself. His flatterers often complimented him with, O king, live for ever; but he is now convinced there is no king lives for ever, but the God of Israel only, who is still the same.

2. That his kingdom is like himself, everlasting, and his "dominion from generation to generation." There is no succession, no revolution in his kingdom. As he lives, so he reigns, for ever, and of his government there is no end.

3. That all nations before him are as nothing; he has no need of them, he makes no account of them. The greatest of men, in comparison with him, are less than nothing. Those that think highly of God think meanly of themselves.

4. That his kingdom is universal, and both the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth are his subjects, and under his check and control. Both angels and men are employed by him, and accountable to him; the highest angel is not above his command, nor the meanest of the children of men beneath his cognizance. The angels of heaven are his armies, the inhabitants of the earth his tenants.

5. That his power is irresistible, and his sovereignty uncontrollable, for "he doth according to his will," according to his design and purpose, according to his decree and counsel. Whatever he pleaseth, that he doth; whatever he appointeth, that he performeth; and none can resist his will, change his counsel, or "stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" None can arraign his proceedings, inquire into the meaning of them, or demand a reason for them. Woe to him that strives with his Maker, that saith to him, What doest thou? or, Why doest thou so?

6. That every thing that God doth is well done. His works are truth, for they all agree with his word; his ways are judgment, both wise and righteous, exactly consonant to the rules both of prudence and equity, and no fault to be found with them.

7. That he has power to humble the haughtiest of his enemies that act in contradiction to him or competition with him. Those that walk in pride, he is able to abase them, ver. 37; he is able to deal with those that are most confident of their own sufficiency to contend with him.

Secondly. He has the use of his reason so far restored to him as with it to re-enjoy himself, and the pleasures of his re-established prosperity; ver. 36, "At the same time my reason returned to me." He had said before, ver. 34, that his "understanding returned" to him, and here he mentions it again, for the use of our reason is a mercy we can never be enough thankful for. Now his lords sought to him,—he did not need to seek to them; and they soon perceived, not only that he had recovered his reason and was fit to rule, but that he had recovered it with advantage, and was more fit to rule than ever. It is likely the dream and the interpretation of it was well known, and much talked of at court; and the former part of the prediction being fulfilled, that he should go distracted, they doubted not but that, according to the prediction, he should come to himself again at seven years' end, and, in confidence of that, when the time was expired, were ready to receive him; and then his "honour and brightness returned" to him, the same he had before his madness seized him. He is now established in his kingdom as firm as if there had been no such interruption given him; he becomes a fool that he may be wise, wiser than ever; and he that but the other day was in the depth of disgrace and ignominy has now

"excellent majesty" added to him, beyond what he had when he went from kingdom to kingdom conquering and to conquer. Note, 1. When men are brought to honour God, particularly by a penitent confession of sin, and a believing acknowledgment of his sovereignty, then, and not till then, they may expect that God will put honour upon them—will not only restore them to the dignity they lost by the sin of the first Adam, but add excellent majesty to them from the righteousness and grace of the second Adam. 2. Afflictions shall last no longer than till they have done the work for which they were sent. When this prince is brought to own God's dominion over him he is then restored to a dominion over himself. 3. All the accounts we take and give of God's dealing with us ought to conclude with praises to him. When Nebuchadnezzar is restored to his kingdom, he praises, and extols, and honours the King of heaven, ver. 37, before he applies himself to his secular business. Therefore we have our reason, that we may be in a capacity of praising him; and therefore our prosperity, that we may have cause to praise him.

It was not long after this that Nebuchadnezzar ended his life and reign. Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius, (Præp. Evang. i. 9,) reports from the tradition of the Chaldeans, that upon his deathbed he foretold the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. Whether he continued in the same good mind that here he seems to have been in, we are not told, nor doth any thing appear to the contrary but that he did; and if so great a blasphemer and persecutor did find mercy he was not the last. And if our charity may reach so far as to hope he did, we must admire free grace, by which he lost his wits for awhile, that he might save his soul for ever.

CHAPTER V.

The destruction of the kingdom of Babylon had been long and often foretold when it was at a distance. In this chapter we have it accomplished, and a prediction of it the very same night that it was accomplished. Belshazzar now reigned in Babylon; some compute he had reigned seventeen years, others but three; we have here the story of his exit and the period of his kingdom. We must know that, about two years before this, Cyrus king of Persia, a growing monarch, came against Babylon with a great army. Belshazzar met him, fought him, and was routed by him in a pitched battle. He and his scattered forces retired into the city, where Cyrus besieged them; they were very secure, because the river Euphrates was their bulwark, and they had twenty years' provision in the city; but in the second year of the siege he took it, as is here related. We have in this chapter, I. The riotous, idolatrous, and sacrilegious feast which Belshazzar made, in which he filled up the measure of his iniquity, ver. 1—4. II. The alarm given him in the midst of his jollity, by a handwriting on the wall, which none of his wise men could read, or tell him the meaning of, ver. 5—9. III. The interpretation of the mystical characters by Daniel, who was at length brought in to him, and dealt plainly with him, and shewed him his doom written, ver. 10—28. IV. The immediate accomplishment of the interpretation in the slaying of the king and seizing of the kingdom, ver. 30, 31.

BELSHAZZAR the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand. 2 Belshazzar, whiles he tasted the wine, commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem; that the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, might drink therein. 3 Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was at Jerusalem; and the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, drank in them. 4 They drank wine, and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. 5 In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaister of the wall of the king's palace: and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote. 6 Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. 7 The king cried aloud to bring in the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers. And the king spake, and said to the wise men of Babylon, Whosoever shall read this writing, and shew me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the third ruler in the kingdom. 8 Then came in all the king's wise men: but they could not read the writing, nor make known to the king the interpretation thereof. 9 Then was king Belshazzar greatly troubled, and his countenance was changed in him, and his lords were astonied.

We have here Belshazzar the king very gay, but all of a sudden very gloomy, and in straits in the fulness of his sufficiency. See how he affronts God, and God affrights him; and wait what will be the issue of this contest, and whether he that hardened his heart against God prospered.

First. See how the king affronted God, and put contempt upon him. He "made a great feast," or banquet of wine; probably it was some anniversary solemnity in honour of his birthday, or coronation day, or of some of their idols. Historians say that Cyrus, who was now with his army besieging Babylon, knew of this feast, and presuming that they then would be off their guard, somno vinoque sepulti,—'buried in sleep and wine,' took that opportunity to attack the city, and so with the more ease made himself master of it. Belshazzar upon this occasion invited "a thousand of his lords" to come and drink with him; perhaps they were such as had signalised themselves in defence of the city against the besiegers. Or these were his great council of war, with whom, when they had well drunk, he would advise what was farther to be done. And they were to look upon it as a great favour that he drank wine before them, for it was the pride of those eastern kings to be seldom seen. He drank wine before them, for he made this feast, as Ahasuerus did, to shew the honour of his majesty. Now, in this sumptuous feast,

1. He put an affront upon the providence of God, and bid defiance to his judgments. His city was now besieged, a powerful enemy was at his gates, his life and kingdom lay at stake; in all this the hand of the Lord was gone out against him, and by it he called him to "weeping and mourning, and girding with sackcloth." God's voice cried in the city, as Jonah to Nineveh, "Yet forty days," or fewer, and Babylon shall be destroyed. He should therefore, like the king of Nineveh, have proclaimed a fast; but, as one resolved to walk contrary to God, he proclaims a feast, and behold, "joy and gladness, slaying oxen, killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine," as if he dared the Almighty to do his worst, Isa. xxii. 12, 13. To shew how little fear he had of being forced to surrender for want of provisions, he spent thus extravagantly. Note, Security and sensuality are sad presages of approaching ruin. Those that will not be warned by the judgments of God may expect to be wounded by them.

2. He put an affront upon the temple of God, and bid defiance to his sanctuary; ver. 2, "While he tasted the wine he commanded to bring" the vessels of the temple, that they might drink in them. When he tasted how rich and fine the wine was, 'O,' said he, 'it is a pity but we should have holy vessels to drink such delicate wine as this in;' which was looked upon as a piece of wit, and, to carry on the humour, the vessels of the temple were presently sent for. Nay, there seems to have been something more in it than a frolic, and that it was done in a malicious despite to the God of Israel. The heart of his people was very much upon these sacred vessels, as appears by Jer. xxvii. 16, 18; their principal care in their return was about these, Ezr. i. 7. Now we may suppose they had an expectation of their deliverance approaching, reckoning the seventy years of their captivity near a period, and some of them might perhaps have given out some words to that purpose, that shortly they should have the vessels of the sanctuary restored to them; in defiance of which, Belshazzar here proclaims them to be his own, will keep them in store no longer, but make use of them among his own plate. Note, That mirth is sinful indeed, and fills the measure of men's iniquity apace, which profanes sacred things, and jests with them. This ripened Babylon for ruin, that no songs would serve them but the songs of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 3, no vessels but the vessels of the sanctuary. Let those who thus sacrilegiously alienate what is dedicated to God and his honour know that he will not be mocked.

3. He put an affront upon God himself, and bid defiance to his deity; for "they drank wine, and praised the gods of gold and silver," ver. 4. They gave that glory to images, the work of their own hands, and creatures of their own fancy, which is due to the true and living God only. They praised them, either with sacrifices offered to them or with songs sung in honour of them. When their heads were giddy, and their hearts merry with wine, they were in the fittest frame to praise the gods of gold and silver, wood and stone; for one would think men in their senses, that had the command of a clear and sober thought, could not be guilty of so gross an absurdity; they must be intoxicated ere they could be so infatuated. Drunken worshippers, that are not men, but beasts, are the most proper for the service of dunghill deities, that are not gods, but devils. "They have erred through wine," Isa. xxviii. 7. They drank wine, and praised their idol gods, as if they had been the founders of their feast, and the givers of all good things to them. Or, when they were drinking wine, they praised their gods, by drinking healths to them. And the king drank wine before them, ver. 1, that is, he began the health, first to this god, and then to the other, till they went through the beadroll, or farrago, of them, those of wood and stone not excepted. Note, Immorality and impiety, vice and profaneness, strengthen the hands, and advance the interests one of another. Drunken frolics were an introduction to idolatry, and then idolatrous healths were a shoeing-horn to farther drunkenness.

Secondly. See how God affrighted the king, and struck a terror upon him. Belshazzar and his lords are in the midst of their revels, the cups going round apace, and all disposed to merriment—drinking confusion, it may be, to Cyrus and his army, and roaring out huzzas in confidence of the speedy raising of the siege. But the hour was come when that must be fulfilled which had been long ago said of the king of Babylon, when his city should be besieged by the Persians and Medes; Isa. xxi. 2—4, "The night of my pleasures has he turned into fear to me." The mirth of this ball at court must be spoiled, and a damp cast upon their jollity, though the king himself be master of the revels; presently, when God speaks the word, we have him and all his guests in the utmost confusion, and the end of their mirth heaviness.

1. There appear the "fingers of a man's hand" writing "on the plaster of the wall," before the king's face, ver. 5; the angel Gabriel, say the rabbins, directing these fingers, and writing by them. 'That Divine hand (saith a rabbin of our own, Dr. Lightfoot,) that had written the two tables for a law to his people now writes the doom of Babel and Belshazzar upon the wall.' Here was nothing sent to frighten them which made a noise, or threatened their lives; no claps of thunder or flashes of lightning; no destroying angel with his sword drawn in his hand; only a pen in the hand, writing upon the wall, "over against the candlestick," where they might all see it by the light of their own candle. Note, God's written word is sufficient to put the proudest, boldest sinner into a fright, when he is pleased to give it the setting on. "The king saw the part of the hand that wrote," but saw not the person whose hand it was, which made the thing more frightful. Note, What we see of God, the part of the hand that writes in the book of the creatures and the book of the Scriptures, ("Lo, these are parts of his ways," Job xxvi. 14,) may serve to possess us with awful thoughts concerning that of God which we do not see. If this be the finger of God, what is his arm made bare? And what is he?

2. The king is immediately seized with a panic fear; ver. 6, "His countenance was changed." His colour went and came, "the joints of his loins were loosed," so that he had no strength in them, but was struck with a pain in his back, as is usual in a great fright; "his knees smote one against another," so violently did he tremble, like an aspen leaf. But what was the matter? Why is he in such a fright? He perceives not what is written, and how doth he know but it may be some happy presage of deliverance to him and to his kingdom. But the business was his thoughts troubled him; his own guilty conscience flew in his face, and told him he had no reason to expect any good news from heaven, and that the hand of an angel could write nothing but terror to him. He that knew himself liable to the justice of God presently concludes this is an arrest in his name, a summons to appear before him. Note, God can soon awaken the most secure, and make the heart of the stoutest sinner to tremble; and there needs no more to do it but to let loose his own thoughts upon him; they will soon play the tyrant, and give him trouble enough.

3. The wise men of Babylon are presently called in to see what they can make of this writing upon the wall, ver. 7. The king cried aloud, as one in haste, as one in earnest, to bring the whole college of magicians to try if they can read this writing, and shew the interpretation of it; for the king and all his lords cannot pretend to it, it is out of their sphere. The study of Divine revelation (such as they had, or thought they had,) and converse with the world of spirits was, by the heathen, confined to one profession, and none other meddled with it; but what is written to us by the finger of God is legible to all. Whoever will may read the mind of God in the Scriptures. To engage these wise men to exert the utmost of their skill in this matter, and provoke them to an emulation in the attempt, he promiseth that whoever would give him a satisfactory account of this writing should be dignified with the highest honours of the court. He knew what these pretenders to wisdom aimed at, and what would please them, and therefore promiseth them a scarlet robe and a gold chain—glorious things in their eyes that know no better. Nay, he should be primus par regni,—'chief minister of state;' the third ruler in the kingdom, next to the king and his heir apparent.

4. The king is disappointed in his expectations from them. They could none of them read the writing, much less interpret it, ver. 8; which increaseth the king's confusion, ver. 9. He likes the thing yet worse and worse, and fears that mischief is towards him. His lords also, that had been partners with him in his jollity, are now sharers with him in his terrors; they also were astonished, and at their wits' end. And neither their numbers nor their refreshment by wine would serve to keep up their spirits. The reason why the wise men could not read the writing, was not because it was written in any language or characters unknown to them, but God either cast a mist before their eyes or put such confusion upon their spirits that they could not read it, that the honour of expounding this mystical writing might be reserved for Daniel. Note, The terror of an awakened, convinced conscience may justly be increased by the utter insufficiency of all creatures to give it ease or satisfaction.

10 Now the queen by reason of the words of the king and his lords came into the banquet house: and the queen spake and said, O king, live for ever: let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed: 11 There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods; and in the days of thy father light and understanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, I say, thy father, made master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers; 12 Forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same Daniel, whom the king named Belteshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation. 13 Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, whom the king my father brought out of Jewry? 14 I have even heard of thee, that the spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light and understanding and excellent wisdom is found in thee. 15 And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not shew the interpretation of the thing: 16 And I have heard of thee, that thou canst make interpretations, and dissolve doubts: now if thou canst read the writing, and make known to me the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler in the kingdom. 17 Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation. 18 O thou king, the most high God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour: 19 And for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him: whom he would he slew; and whom he would he kept alive; and whom he would he set up; and whom he would he put down. 20 But when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him: 21 And he was driven from the sons of men; and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven; till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will. 22 And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this; 23 But hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified: 24 Then was the part of the hand sent from him; and this writing was written. 25 And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. 26 This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. 27 TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. 28 PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. 29 Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

Here is, First. The information given to the king by the queen-mother, concerning Daniel, how fit he was to be consulted in this difficult case. It is supposed this queen was the widow of Evil-merodach, and was the famous Nitocris, whom Herodotus mentions as a woman of extraordinary prudence. She was not present at the feast, as the king's wives and concubines were, ver. 2; it was not agreeable to her age and gravity to keep a merry night. But tidings of the fright which the king and his lords were put into being brought to her apartment, she came herself to the banqueting house, to recommend to the king a physician for his melancholy. She bespeaks him not to be discouraged by the insufficiency of his wise men to solve this riddle, for there was a man in his kingdom that had more than once helped his grandfather in such exigences, and no doubt could help him, ver. 11, 12. She could not undertake to read the writing herself, but directs him to one that could; let Daniel be called now, who should have been called first. Now observe,

1. The high character she gives of Daniel. He is a man "in whom is the spirit of the holy gods," who has something in him more than human; not only the spirit of a man, which in all is the candle of the Lord, but a Divine spirit. According to the language of her country and religion she could not give a higher encomium of any man; she speaks honourably of him, as a man that had, 1st. An admirably good head. "Light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him." Such an insight had he into things secret, and such a foresight of things to come, that it was evident he was Divinely inspired; he had "knowledge and understanding" beyond all the other wise men for "interpreting of dreams," explaining of enigmas or hard sentences, untying knots, and dissolving doubts. Solomon had a wonderful sagacity of this kind, but it should seem that in these things Daniel had more of an immediate Divine direction; behold, a greater than Solomon himself is here. Yet what was the wisdom of them both, compared with the treasures of wisdom hid in Christ? 2nd. He had an admirably good heart. "An excellent spirit" was found in him, which was a great ornament to his wisdom and knowledge, and qualified him to receive that gift; for "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy." He was of an humble, holy, heavenly spirit, had a devout and gracious spirit, a spirit of zeal for the glory of God and the good of men. This was indeed an excellent spirit.

2. The account she gives of the respect that Nebuchadnezzar had for him. He was much in his esteem, and was preferred by him. "The king thy father," that is, thy grandfather; but even to many generations Nebuchadnezzar might well be called the father of that royal family, for he it was that raised it to such a pitch of grandeur. "The king, I say, thy father, made him master of the magicians." Perhaps Belshazzar had sometimes in his pride spoken slightly of Nebuchadnezzar and his politics, and the methods of his government, and the ministers he employed, and thought himself wiser than he, and therefore his mother harps upon that. "The king, I say, thy father," to whose good management all thou hast is owing, he pronounced him chief of, and gave him dominion over, all the wise men of Babylon, and named him Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, thinking thereby to put honour upon him. But Daniel, by constantly making use of his Jewish name himself, (which he resolved to stick to, in token of his faithful adherence to his religion,) had worn out that name; only the queen dowager remembered it, otherwise he was generally called Daniel. Note, It is a very good office to revive the remembrance of the good services of worthy men, who are themselves modest, and willing they should be forgotten.

3. The motion she makes concerning him; "Let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation." By this it appears that Daniel was now forgotten at court; Belshazzar was a stranger to him, knew not that he had such a jewel in his kingdom; with the new king there came in a new ministry, and the old one was laid aside. Note, There are a great many valuable men, and such as might be made very useful, that lie long buried in obscurity, and some that have done eminent services, that lived to be overlooked, and taken no notice of; but, whatever men are, God is not unrighteous to forget the services done to his kingdom. Daniel, being turned out of his place, lived privately, and sought not any opportunity to be reinstated therein; yet he lived near the court, and within call,—though Babylon was now besieged,—that he might be ready, if there were occasion, to do any good office, by what interest he had among the great ones, for the children of his people. But providence so ordered it that now, just at the fall of that monarchy, he should by the queen's means be brought to court again, that he might lie there ready for preferment in the ensuing government. Thus do the righteous shine forth out of obscurity, and before honour is humility.

Secondly. The introducing of Daniel to the king, and his request to him to read and expound the writing. Daniel was "brought in before the king," ver. 13. He was now near ninety years of age, so that his years and honours, and former preferments, might have entitled him to a free admission into the king's presence, yet he was willing to be conducted in as a stranger by the master of the ceremonies. Now, 1. The king asks, with an air of haughtiness, "Art thou that Daniel who art of the children of the captivity?" Being a Jew, and a captive, he was loth to be beholden to him, if he could have helped it. 2. He tells him what an encomium he had heard of him, ver. 14, that "the spirit of the gods" was in him; and he had sent for him to try whether he deserved so high a character or no. 3. He acknowledgeth that all his wise men of Babylon were baffled; they could not read this writing, nor shew the interpretation, ver. 15. But, 4. He promiseth him the same rewards he had promised them, if he would do it, ver. 16. It was strange the magicians, when now, and in Nebuchadnezzar's time once and again, they were nonplussed, did not offer at something to save their credit. If they had with a good assurance said, This is the meaning of such a dream, such a writing, who could disprove them? But God so ordered it that they had nothing at all to say, as when Christ was born the heathen oracles were struck dumb.

Thirdly. The interpretation which Daniel gave of these mystic characters, which was so far from easing the king of his fears, that we may suppose it increased them rather. Daniel was now in years, and Belshazzar was young, and therefore he seems to take a greater liberty of dealing plainly and roundly with him than he had done upon the like occasions with Nebuchadnezzar. In reproving any man, especially great men, there is need of wisdom to consider all circumstances, for they are the reproofs of instruction that are the way of life. In Daniel's discourse here,

1. He undertakes to read the writing which gave them this alarm, and to shew them the interpretation of it, ver. 15. He slights the offer he made him of rewards, is not pleased that it was mentioned, for he is none of those that divine for money; what gratuities Nebuchadnezzar gave him afterwards he thankfully accepted them, but he scorned to indent for them, or to read the writing to the king for, and in consideration of, such and such honours promised him. No, "let thy gifts be to thyself," for they will not be long thine, and give thy fee to another,—to any of the wise men whom thou hadst most mind should have earned it; I value it not. Daniel sees his kingdom now at this last gasp, and therefore looks with contempt upon his gifts and rewards. And thus should we despise all the gifts and rewards this world can give, did we see, as we may by faith, its final period hastening on. Let it give its perishing gifts to another, there are better gifts which we have our eyes and hearts upon; but let us do our duty in the world, do it all the real service we can, read God's writing to it in a profession of religion, and by an agreeable conversation make known the interpretation of it, and then trust God for his gifts, his rewards, in comparison of which all the world can give is mere trash and trifles.

2. He largely recounts to the king God's dealings with his father Nebuchadnezzar, which were intended for instruction and warning to him, ver. 18—21. This is not intended for a flourish or an amusement, but is a necessary preliminary to the interpretation of the writing. Note, That we may understand aright what God is doing with us, it is of use to us to review what he has done with others.

1st. He describes the great dignity and power to which the Divine providence had advanced Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 18, 19. He had "a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour," for aught we know, above what any heathen prince ever had before him. Now he thought he got it by his own extraordinary conduct and courage, and ascribed his successes to a projecting active genius of his own; but Daniel tells him, who now enjoyed what he had laboured for, that it was the Most High God, the God of gods, and Lord of kings, as Nebuchadnezzar himself had called him, that gave him that kingdom, that vast dominion, that majesty wherewith he presided in the affairs of it, and that glory and honour which by his prosperous management he acquired. Note, Whatever degree of outward prosperity any arrive to, they must own it is of God's giving, not their own getting. Let it never be said, "My might, and the power of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth," this preferment; but let it always be remembered that it is God that gives men power to get wealth, and gives success to their endeavours. Now, the power which God gave to Nebuchadnezzar is here described to be very great, in respect both of ability and of authority. First. His ability was so strong that it was irresistible; such was the majesty that God gave him, so numerous the forces he had at command, and such an admirable dexterity he had at commanding them, that which way soever his sword turned it prospered; he could captivate and subdue nations by threatening them, without striking a stroke, for "all people trembled and feared before him," and would compound with him for their lives upon any terms. See what force is, and what the fear of it doth. It is that by which the brutal part of the world, even of the world of mankind, both governs and is governed. Secondly. His authority was so absolute that it was uncontrollable. The power which was allowed him, which descended upon him, or which at least he assumed, was without contradiction, was absolute and despotic. None shared with him either in the legislative or the executive part of it; but in dispensing punishments he condemned or acquitted at pleasure; "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he saved alive," though both were equally innocent, or equally guilty. The jus vitæ et necis,—'the power of life and death,' was entirely in his hand. In dispensing rewards he granted or denied preferments at pleasure; "whom he would set up, and whom he would put down," merely for a humour, and without giving a reason so much as to himself; but it is all ex mero motu,—'of his own good pleasure,' and stat pro ratione voluntas,—'his will stands for a reason.' Such was the constitution of the Eastern monarchies, such the manner of their kings.

2nd. He sets before him the sins which Nebuchadnezzar had been guilty of, whereby he had provoked God against him. First. He carried it insultingly towards those that were under him, and grew tyrannical and oppressive. The description given of his power intimates his abuse of his power, and that he was directed in what he did by humour and passion, not by reason and equity; so that he often condemned the innocent and acquitted the guilty, both which are an abomination to the Lord. He deposed men of merit, and preferred unworthy men, to the great detriment of the public, and for this he is accountable to the Most High God, that gave him his power. Note, It is a very hard and rare thing for men to have an absolute arbitrary power, and not to make an ill use of it. Camden has a distich of Giraldus, wherein he speaks of it as a rare instance concerning our King Henry the Second of England, that never any man had so much power and did so little hurt with it.

Glorior hoc uno, quod nunquam vidimus unum,
Nec potuisse magis, nec nocuisse minus,—

'Of him I can say, exulting, that with the same power to do harm no one was ever more inoffensive.'

But that was not all. Secondly. He carried it insolently towards the God above him, and grew proud and haughty, ver. 20. His heart was lifted up, and there his sin and ruin began; his mind was hardened in pride, hardened against the commands of God, and his judgments, he was wilful and obstinate, and neither God's word nor rod made any lasting impression upon him. Note, Pride is a sin that hardens the heart in all other sins, and renders the means of repentance and reformation ineffectual.

3rd. He reminds him of the judgments of God that were brought upon him for his pride and obstinacy. How he was deprived of his reason, and so "deposed from his kingly throne," ver. 20; driven from among men, to dwell with the wild asses, ver. 21. He that would not govern his subjects by rules of reason had not reason sufficient for the government of himself. Note, Justly doth God deprive men of their reason when they become unreasonable, and will not use it, and of their power when they become oppressive, and use it ill. He continued like a brute till he knew and embraced that first principle of religion, "that the most high God rules;" and it is rather by religion than reason that man is distinguished from and dignified above the beasts; and it is more his honour to be a subject to the supreme Creator than to be lord of inferior creatures. Note, Kings must know, or shall be made to know, that the Most High God rules in their kingdoms—that is an imperium in imperio,—'an empire within an empire,' not to be excepted against—and that he appoints over them whomsoever he will. As he makes heirs, so he makes princes.

3. In God's name he exhibits articles of impeachment against Belshazzar. Before he reads him his doom from the handwriting on the wall, he shews him his crime, that God may be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth. Now that which he lays to his charge is,

1st. That he had not taken warning by the judgments of God upon his father; ver. 22, "Thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this." Note, It is a great offence to God if our hearts be not humbled before him to comply both with his precepts and with his providences, humbled by repentance, obedience, and patience; nay, he expects from the greatest of men that their hearts should be humbled before him by an acknowledgment that, as great as they are, to him they are accountable. And it is a great aggravation of the unhumbleness of our hearts when we know enough to humble them, but do not consider and improve it, particularly when we know how others have been broken that would not bend, how others have fallen that would not stoop, and yet we continue stiff and inflexible. It makes the sin of children the more heinous if they tread in the steps of their parents' wickedness, though they have seen how dear it has cost them, and how pernicious the consequences of it have been. Do we know this, do we know all this, and yet are we not humbled?

2nd. That he had affronted God more impudently than Nebuchadnezzar himself had done. Witness the revels of this very night in the midst of which he was seized with this horror; ver. 23, "Thou hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven," hast swelled with rage against him, and taken up arms against his crown and dignity in this particular instance, that thou hast profaned the vessels of his house, and made the utensils of his sanctuary instruments of thine iniquity, and, in an actual designed contempt of him, hast "praised the gods of silver and gold, which see not, nor hear, nor know" any thing, as if they were to be preferred before the God that sees, and hears and knows every thing. Sinners that are resolved to go on in sin are well enough pleased with gods that neither see, nor hear, nor know, for then they may sin securely; but they will find to their confusion that, though those are the gods they choose, those are not the gods they must be judged by, but One to whom all things are naked and open.

3rd. That he had not answered the end of his creation and maintenance; "The God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified." This is a general charge, which stands good against us all; look how we shall answer it. Observe, First. Our dependence upon God as our creator, preserver, benefactor, owner, and ruler. Not only from his hand our breath was at first, but in his hand our breath is still; it is he that holds our souls in life, and if he take away our breath we die. Our times being in his hand, so is our breath, by which our times are measured. "In him we live, and move, and have our being;" we live by him, live upon him, and cannot live without him. The way of man is not in himself, not at his own command, at his own disposal, but his are all our ways; for our hearts are in his hand, and so are the hearts of all men, even of kings, who seem to act most as free agents. Secondly. Our duty to God in consideration of this dependence. We ought to glorify him, to devote ourselves to his honour, and employ ourselves in his service, to make it our care to please him, and our business to praise him. Thirdly. Our default in this duty notwithstanding that dependence; we have not done it; for we "have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God." This is the indictment against Belshazzar. There needs no proof, it is made good by the notorious evidence of the fact, and his own conscience cannot but plead guilty to it; and, therefore,

4th. He now proceeds to read the sentence as he found it written upon the wall. Then, saith Daniel, when thou wast come to such a height of impiety as thus to trample upon the most sacred things, then when thou wast in the midst of thy sacrilegious idolatrous feast, then was the part of the hand, the writing fingers sent from him, from that God whom thou didst so daringly affront, and who had borne so long with thee, but would bear no longer; he sent them, and this writing thou now seest was written, ver. 24. It is he that now "writes bitter things against thee," and "makes thee to possess thine iniquities," Job xiii. 26. Note, As the sin of sinners is written in the book of God's omniscience, so the doom of sinners is written in the book of God's law; and the day is coming when those books shall be opened, and they shall be judged by them.

Now the writing was "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," ver. 25. It is well we have an authentic exposition of them annexed, else we could make little of them, so concise are they; the signification of them is, 'he hath numbered, he hath weighed, and they divide.' The Chaldean wise men, because they knew not that there is but one God only, could not understand who this 'He' should be, and for that reason, some think, the writing puzzled them.

First. Mene; that is repeated, for the thing is certain: Mene, Mene, that signifies, both in Hebrew and Chaldee, 'he hath numbered and finished;' which Daniel explains thus, ver. 26, "God hath numbered thy kingdom," that is, the years and days of the continuance of it; these were numbered in the counsel of God, and now they are finished; the term has expired for and during which thou wast to hold it, and now it must be surrendered. Here is an end of thy kingdom.

Secondly. Tekel; that signifies in Chaldee, "thou art weighed;" and in Hebrew, 'thou art too light;' so Dr. Lightfoot. For this king and his actions are weighed in the just and unerring balances of Divine equity. God doth as perfectly know his true character as the goldsmith knows the weight of that which he has weighed in the nicest scales. God doth not give judgment against him till he has first pondered his actions, and considered the merits of his case: But thou art "found wanting," unworthy to have such a trust lodged in thee, a vain, light, empty man, a man of no weight or consideration.

Thirdly. Upharsin, which should be rendered, and Pharsin, or Peres; Pharsin, in Hebrew, signifies 'the Persians;' Paresin, in Chaldee, signifies 'dividing.' Daniel put both together, ver. 28, "Thy kingdom is divided," is rent from thee, and "given to the Medes and Persians," as a prey to be divided among them.

Now this may, without any force, be applied to the doom of sinners; mene, tekel, peres, may easily be made to signify 'death, judgment, and hell.' At death the sinner's days are numbered and finished; after death the judgment, when he will be "weighed in the balance, and found wanting;" and after judgment the sinner will be cut asunder, and given as a prey to the devil and his angels. Daniel doth not here give Belshazzar such advice and encouragement to repent as he had given Nebuchadnezzar, because he saw the decree was gone forth, and he would not be allowed any space to repent.

One would have thought Belshazzar would have been exasperated against Daniel, and, seeing his own case desperate, would have been in a rage against him. But he was so far convicted by his own conscience of the reasonableness of all he said, that he objected nothing against it, but, on the contrary, gave Daniel the reward he promised him, put on him the scarlet gown and the gold chain, and proclaimed him the "third ruler in the kingdom," ver. 29, because he would be as good as his word, and because it was not Daniel's fault if the exposition of the handwriting was not such as he desired. Note, Many shew great respect to God's prophets who yet have no regard to his word. Daniel did not value these titles and ensigns of honour, yet would not refuse them, because they were tokens of his prince's goodwill. But we have reason to think he received them with a smile, foreseeing how soon they would all wither with him that bestowed them. They were like Jonah's gourd, which came up in a night, and perished in a night, and therefore it was folly for him to be exceeding glad of them.

30 In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. 31 And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.

Here is, First. The death of the king. Reason enough he had to tremble, for he was just falling into the hands of the king of terrors; ver. 30, "In that night," when his heart was merry with wine, the besiegers broke into the city, aimed at the palace; there they found the king, and gave him his death wound; he could not find any place so secret as to conceal him, or so strong as to protect him. Heathen writers speak of Cyrus's taking Babylon by surprise, with the assistance of two deserters that shewed him the best way into the city. And it was foretold what a consternation it would be to the court, Jer. li. 11, 39. Note, Death comes as a snare upon those whose hearts are overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness.

Secondly. The transferring of the kingdom into other hands. From the head of gold we now descend to the breast and arms of silver. "Darius the Mede took the kingdom" in partnership with, and by the consent of, Cyrus, who had conquered it, ver. 31. They were partners in war and conquest, and so they were in dominion, ch. vi. 28. Notice is taken of his age, that he was now sixty-two years old; for which reason Cyrus, who was his nephew, gave him the precedency. Some observe that, he being now sixty-two years old in the last year of the captivity, he was born in the eighth year of it, and that was the year when Jeconiah was carried captive, and all the nobles, &c: see 2*Kin*. xxiv. 13—15. Just at that time, when the most fatal stroke was given, was a prince born, that, in process of time, should avenge Jerusalem upon Babylon, and heal the wound that was now given. Thus deep are the counsels of God concerning his people, thus kind are his designs towards them.

CHAPTER VI.

Daniel doth not give a continued history of the reigns in which he lived, nor of the state affairs of the kingdoms of Chaldea and Persia, though he was himself a great man in those affairs; for what are those to us? But he selects such particular passages of story as serve for the confirmation of our faith in God, and the encouragement of our obedience to him; for the things written aforetime were written for our learning. It is a very observable, improvable story that we have in this chapter, how Daniel by faith "stopped the mouth of lions," and so obtained a good report, Heb. xi. 33. The three children were cast into the fiery furnace for not committing a known sin; Daniel was cast into the lion's den for not omitting a known duty; and God's miraculous delivering both them and him is left upon record for the encouragement of his servants in all ages to be resolute and constant, both in their abhorrence of that which is evil and in their adherence to that which is good, whatever it cost them. In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's preferment in the court of Darius, ver. 1—3. II. The envy and malice of his enemies against him, ver. 4, 5. III. The decree they obtained against prayer for thirty days, ver. 6—9. IV. Daniel's continuance and constancy in prayer, notwithstanding that decree, ver. 10. V. Information given against him for it, and the casting of him into the den of lions, ver, 11—17. VI. His miraculous preservation in the lions' den, and deliverance out of it, ver. 18—23. VII. The casting of his accusers into the den, and their destruction there, ver. 24. VIII. The decree which Darius made upon this occasion in honour of the God of Daniel, and the prosperity of Daniel afterwards, ver. 25—28. And this God is our God for ever and ever.

IT pleased Darius to set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes, which should be over the whole kingdom; 2 And over these three presidents; of whom Daniel was first: that the princes might give accounts unto them, and the king should have no damage. 3 Then this Daniel was preferred above the presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm. 4 Then the presidents and princes sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom; but they could find none occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. 5 Then said these men, We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.

We are here told, concerning Daniel,

First. What a great man he was. When Darius, upon his accession to the crown of Babylon by conquest, new-modelled the government, he made Daniel prime minister of state,—set him at the helm, and made him first commissioner both of the treasury and of the great seal. Darius's dominion was very large, All he got by his conquests and acquests was, that he had so many more countries to take care of. No more can be expected from himself than what one man can do, and therefore others must be employed under him. He "set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes," ver. 1, and appointed them their districts in which they were to administer justice, preserve the public peace, and levy the king's revenue. Note, Inferior magistrates are ministers of God to us for good, as well as the sovereign, and therefore we must submit ourselves both to the king as supreme and to the governors that are constituted and commissioned by him, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. Over these princes there was a triumvirate, or three presidents, who were to take and state the public accounts, to receive appeals from the princes, or complaints against them in case of maladministration, that "the king should have no damage," ver. 2, that he should not sustain loss in his revenue, and that the power he delegated to the princes might not be abused to the oppression of the subject; for by that the king, whether he think so or no, receives real damage, both as it alienates the affections of his people from him and provokes the displeasure of his God against him. Of these three Daniel was the chief, because he was found to go beyond them all, in all manner of princely qualifications. He was "preferred above the presidents and princes," ver. 3; and so wonderfully well pleased the king with his management that he "thought to set him over the whole realm," and let him place and displace at his pleasure. Now,

1. We must take notice of it to the praise of Darius, that he would prefer a man thus, purely for his personal merit, and his fitness for business; and those sovereigns that would be well served must go by that rule. Daniel had been a great man in the kingdom that was conquered, and for that reason, one would think, would have been looked upon as an enemy, and, as such, imprisoned or banished. He was a native of a foreign kingdom, and a ruined one, and upon that account might have been despised as a stranger and captive. But Darius it seems was very quicksighted in judging of men's capacities, and was soon aware that this Daniel had something extraordinary in him, and therefore, though no doubt he had creatures of his own not a few, that expected preferment in this new conquered kingdom, and were gaping for it, and those that had been long his confidants would depend upon it that they should be now his presidents, yet so well did he consult the public welfare that, finding Daniel to excel them all in prudence and virtue, and probably having heard of his being Divinely inspired, he made him his right hand.

2. We must take notice of it, to the glory of God, that, though Daniel was now very old, (it is above seventy years since he was brought a captive to Babylon,) yet he was as able as ever for business, both in body and mind; and that he who had continued faithful to his religion, notwithstanding all the temptations of the foregoing reigns, in a new government was as much respected as ever. He kept in by being an oak, not by being a willow; by a constancy in virtue, not by a pliableness to vice. Such honesty is the best policy, for it secures a reputation; and those who thus honour God he will honour them.

Secondly. What a good man he was. "An excellent spirit was in him," ver. 3. And he was faithful to every trust, dealt fairly between the sovereign and the subject, and took care that neither should be wronged, so that there was no error or fault to be found in him, ver. 4. He was not only not chargeable with any treachery or dishonesty, but not with any mistake or indiscretion. He never made any blunder, nor had any occasion to plead inadvertency or forgetfulness for his excuse. This is recorded for an example to all that are in places of public trust, to approve themselves both careful and conscientious, that they may be free not only from fault but error; not only from crime, but from mistake.

Thirdly. What ill-will was borne him, both for his greatness and for his goodness. The presidents and princes envied him because he was advanced above them, and probably hated him because he had a watchful eye upon them, and took care they should not wrong the government to enrich themselves. See here, 1. The cause of envy, and that is every thing that is good. Solomon complains of it as a vexation, that "for every right work a man is envied of his neighbour," Eccl. iv. 4, that the better a man is the worse he is thought of by his rivals; Daniel is envied because he has a more excellent spirit than his neighbours. 2. The effect of envy, and that is every thing that is bad. Those that envied Daniel sought no less than his ruin; his disgrace would not serve them, it was his death they desired. "Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who can stand before envy?" Pr. xxvii. 4. Daniel's enemies set spies upon him to observe him in the management of his place; they "sought to find occasion" against him, something on which to ground an accusation "concerning the kingdom," some instance of neglect or partiality, some hasty word spoken, some person borne hard upon, or some necessary business overlooked; and if they could but have found the mote, the mole-hill of a mistake, it would have been soon improved to the beam, to the mountain of an unpardonable misdemeanour. But they could find no occasion against him; they owned they could not. Daniel always acted honestly, and now the more warily, and stood the more upon his guard, because of his observers, Ps. xxvii. 11. Note, We have all need to walk circumspectly, because we have many eyes upon us, and some that watch for our halting. Those especially have need to carry their cup even that have it full. They concluded at length they should not find any occasion against him, except "concerning the law of his God," ver. 5. It seems, then, Daniel kept up the profession of his religion and held it fast, without wavering or shrinking, and yet that was no bar to his preferment; there was no law requiring him to be of the king's religion, or incapacitating him to bear office in the state unless he would. It was all one to the king what God he prayed to, so long as he did the business of his place faithfully and well; he was at the king's service usque ad aras,—'as far as the altars,' but there he left him. In this matter, therefore, his enemies hoped to ensnare him. Quærendum est crimen læsæ religionis ubi majestatis deficit,—'When treason could not be charged upon him he was charged with impiety.'—Grot. Note, It is an excellent thing, and much for the glory of God, when those who profess religion carry themselves so inoffensively in their whole conversation that their most watchful, spiteful enemies may find no occasion of blaming them, save only in the matters of their God, in which they walk according to their consciences. It is observable, that when Daniel's enemies could find no occasion against him concerning the kingdom, they had so much sense of justice left that they did not suborn witnesses against him to accuse him of crimes he was innocent of, and to swear treason upon him, wherein they shame many that were called Jews and are called Christians.

6 Then these presidents and princes assembled together to the king, and said thus unto him, King Darius, live for ever. 7 All the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, and the princes, the counsellors, and the captains, have consulted together to establish a royal statute, and to make a firm decree, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any God or man for thirty days, save of thee, O king, he shall be cast into the den of lions. 8 Now, O king, establish the decree, and sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 9 Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree. 10 Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.

PRINCES OF PERSIA.—FROM PERSEPOLIS.

Daniel's adversaries could have no advantage against him by any law now in being, they therefore contrive a new law, by which they hope to ensnare him, and in such a matter as they knew they should be sure of him; and such was his fidelity to his God that they gained their point. Here is,

First. Darius's impious law. I call it Darius's, because he gave the royal assent to it, and otherwise it had not been of force; but it was not properly his,—he contrived it not, and was perfectly wheedled to consent to it. The presidents and princes framed the edict, brought in the bill, and by their management it was agreed to by the convention of the states, who, perhaps, were met at this time upon some public occasion. It is pretended that this bill, which they would have to pass into a law, was the result of mature deliberation, that "all the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, princes, counsellors, and captains had consulted together" about it, and that they not only agreed to it, but advised it, for divers good causes and considerations, that they had done what they could to establish it for a firm decree; nay, they intimate to the king that it was carried nemine contradicente,—'unanimously.' "All the presidents" are of this mind, and yet we are sure that Daniel, the chief of the three presidents, did not agree to it, and have reason to think that many more of the princes excepted against it, as absurd and unreasonable. Note, It is no new thing for that to be represented, and with great assurance too, as the sense of the nation, which is far from being so; and that which few approve of is sometimes confidently said to be that which all agree to. But, O the infelicity of kings, who, being under the necessity of seeing and hearing with other people's eyes and ears, are many times wretchedly imposed upon! These designing men, under colour of doing honour to the king, but really intending the ruin of his favourite, press him to pass this into a law, and make it a royal statute, "that whosoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days," save of the king, should be put to death after the most barbarous manner, should "be cast into the den of lions," ver. 7. This is the bill they have been hatching, and they lay it before the king to be signed and passed into a law. Now,

1. There is nothing in it that has the least appearance of good, but that it magnifies the king, and makes him seem both very great and very kind to his subjects, which they suggest will be of good service to him now he is newly come to his throne, and will confirm his interests. All men must be made to believe that the king is so rich, and withal so ready to all petitioners, that none in any want or distress need to apply themselves either to God or man for relief, but to him only. And for thirty days together he will be ready to give audience to all that have any petition to present to him. It is indeed much for the honour of kings to be benefactors to their subjects, and to have their ears open to their complaints and requests; but if they pretend to be their sole benefactors, and undertake to be to them instead of God, and challenge that respect from them which is due to God only, it is their disgrace, and not their honour. But,

2. There is a great deal in it that is apparently evil. It is bad enough to forbid asking a petition of any man,—must not a beggar ask an alms? or one neighbour beg a kindness of another? if the child want bread, must not he ask it of his parents, or be cast into the den of lions if he do? nay, they that have business with the king, may they not petition those about him to introduce them? but it was much worse, and an impudent affront to all religion, to forbid asking a petition of any god. It is by prayer that we give glory to God, fetch in mercy from God, and so keep our communion with God; and to interdict prayer for thirty days is for so long to rob God of all the tribute he has from man, and to rob man of all the comfort he has in God. When the light of nature teacheth us that the providence of God has the ordering and disposing of all our affairs, doth not the law of nature oblige us, by prayer, to acknowledge God and seek to him? Doth not every man's heart direct him, when he is in want or distress, to call upon God? and must this be made high treason? We could not live a day without God; and can man live thirty days without prayer? Will the king himself be tied up for so long from praying to God? or, if it be allowed him, will he undertake to do it for all his subjects? Did ever any nation thus slight their gods? But see what absurdities malice will drive men to. Rather than not bring Daniel into trouble for praying to his God, they will deny themselves and all their friends the satisfaction of praying to theirs. Had they proposed only to prohibit the Jews from praying to their God, Daniel would have been as effectually ensnared; but they knew the king would not pass such a law, and therefore made it thus general. And the king, puffed up with a fancy that this would set him up as a little god, was fond of the feather in his cap, (for so it was, and not a flower in his crown,) and "signed the writing and the decree," ver. 9, which, being once done, according to the constitution of the united kingdom of the Medes and Persians, it was not upon any pretence whatsoever to be altered or dispensed with, or the breach of it pardoned.

Secondly. Daniel's pious disobedience to this law, ver. 10. He did not retire into the country, or abscond for some time, though he knew the law was levelled against him; but, because he knew it was so, therefore he stood his ground, knowing that he had now a fair opportunity of honouring God before men, and shewing that he preferred his favour, and his duty to him, before life itself. "When Daniel knew that the writing was signed," he might have gone to the king and expostulated with him about it; nay, he might have remonstrated against it, as grounded upon a misinformation that all the presidents had consented to it, whereas he that was chief of them had never been consulted about it; but he went to his house and applied himself to his duty, cheerfully trusting God with the event. Now observe,

1. Daniel's constant practice, which we had not been told but upon this occasion; but we have reason to think it was the general practice of the pious Jews. 1st. He prayed in his house sometimes himself alone, and sometimes with his family about him, and made a solemn business of it. Cornelius was a man that "prayed in his house," Acts x. 30. Note, Every house not only may be, but ought to be, a house of prayer; where we have a tent, God must have an altar, and on it we must offer spiritual sacrifices. 2nd. In every prayer he gave thanks. When we pray to God for the mercies we want we must praise him for those we have received. Thanksgiving must be a part of every prayer. 3rd. In his prayer and thanksgiving he had an eye to God as his God, his in covenant, and set himself as in his presence. He did this before his God, and with a regard to him. 4th. When he prayed and gave thanks he "kneeled upon his knees," which is the most proper gesture in prayer, and most expressive of humility, and reverence, and submission to God. Kneeling is a begging posture, and we come to God as beggars, beggars for our lives, whom it concerns to be imprtunate. 5th. He "opened the windows of his chamber," that the sight of the visible heavens might affect his heart with an awe of that God who dwells above the heavens. But that was not all; he opened them towards Jerusalem, the holy city, though now in ruins, to signify the affection he had for its very stones and dust, Ps. cii. 14, and the remembrance he had of its concerns daily in his prayers. Thus, though he himself lived great in Babylon, yet he testified his concurrence with the meanest of his brethren the captives, in remembering Jerusalem and preferring it before his chief joy, Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6. Jerusalem was the place which God had chosen to put his name there; and, when the temple was dedicated, Solomon's prayer to God was, that if the people should, in the land of their enemies, pray unto him with their eye towards the land which he gave them and the city he had chosen, and the house that was built to his name, that then he would hear and maintain their cause, 1 Kin. viii. 48, 49, to which prayer Daniel had reference in this circumstance of his devotions. 6th. He did this three times a day, three times every day, according to the example of David; Ps. lv. 17, "Morning, evening, and at noon I will pray." It is good to have our hours of prayer, not to bind but to mind conscience; and if we think our bodies require refreshment by food thrice a day, can we think seldomer will serve our souls? This is, sure, as little as may be to answer the command of praying always. 7th. He did this so openly and avowedly that all that knew him knew it to be his practice; and he thus shewed it, not because he was proud of it,—in the place where he was there was no room for that temptation, for it was not reputation but reproach that attended it,—but because he was not ashamed of it. Though Daniel was a great man, he did not think it below him to be thrice a day upon his knees before his Maker, and to be his own chaplain; though he was an old man, he did not think himself past it, nor, though it had been his practice from his youth up, was he weary of this well-doing. Though he was a man of business, vast business, for the service of the public, he did not think that would excuse him from the daily exercises of devotion. How inexcusable, then, are they who have but little to do in the world, and yet will not do thus much for God and their souls! Daniel was a man famous for prayer and for success in it, Eze. xiv. 14, and he came to be so by thus making a conscience of prayer, and making a business of it daily; and in thus doing God blessed him wonderfully.

2. Daniel's constant adherence to this practice, even when it was made by the law a capital crime. When he "knew that the writing was signed" he continued to do as he did aforetime, and altered not one circumstance of the performance. Many a man, yea, and many a good man, would have thought it prudence to omit it for these thirty days, when he could not do it without hazard of his life. He might have prayed so much the oftener when those days were expired, and the danger was over; or he might have performed the duty at another time and in another place, so secretly that it would not be possible for his enemies to discover it, and so he might both satisfy his conscience and keep up his communion with God, and yet avoid the law, and continue in his usefulness. But if he had done so it would have been thought, both by his friends and by his enemies, that he had thrown up the duty for this time through cowardice and base fear, which would have tended very much to the dishonour of God, and the discouragement of his friends. Others that moved in a lower sphere might well enough act with caution; but Daniel, that has so many eyes upon him, must act with courage, and the rather because he knows the law, when it was made, was particularly levelled against him. Note, We must not omit duty for fear of suffering, no, nor so much as seem to come short of it. In trying times great stress is laid upon our confessing Christ before men, Mat. x. 32; and we must take heed, lest, under pretence of discretion, we be found guilty of cowardice in the cause of God. If we do not think this example of Daniel obligeth us to do likewise, yet I am sure it forbids us to censure those that do, for God owned him in it. By his constancy to his duty now it appears he had never been used to admit any excuse for the omission of it; for if ever any excuse would have served to put it by, this would have served now. 1st. That it was forbidden by the king, his master, and in honour of the king too. But it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that,—we are to obey God rather than men. 2nd. That it would be the loss of his life; but it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that, that they who throw away their souls (as those certainly do that live without prayer) to save their lives, make but an ill bargain for themselves; and, though herein they make themselves, like the king of Tyre, wiser than Daniel, at their end they will be fools.

11 Then these men assembled, and found Daniel praying and making supplication before his God. 12 Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 13 Then answered they and said before the king, That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day. 14 Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him: and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him. 15 Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed. 16 Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee. 17 And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords; that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

Here is, First. Proof made of Daniel's praying to his God, notwithstanding the late edict to the contrary; ver. 11, "These men assembled," they came 'tumultuously together,' so the word is, the same that was used ver. 6, borrowed from Ps. ii. 1, "Why do the heathen rage?" They came together to visit Daniel, perhaps under pretence of business, at that time which they knew to be his usual hour of devotion; and if they had not found him so engaged they would have upbraided him with his faint-heartedness and distrust of his God; but, which they rather wished to do, they found him on his knees, "praying and making supplication before his God." "For his love they are his adversaries," but, like his father David, he "gives himself unto prayer," Ps. cix. 4.

Secondly. Complaint made of it to the king. When they had found occasion against Daniel concerning the law of his God, they lost no time, but applied themselves to the king, ver. 12; and having appealed to him whether there was not such a law made, and gained from him a recognition of it, and that it was so ratified as that it might not be altered, they proceeded to accuse Daniel, ver. 13. They describe him so, in the information they give, as to exasperate the king, and incense him the more against him; He is "of the children of the captivity of Judah." He is of Judah, that despicable people, and now a captive in a despicable state, that can call nothing his own but what he has by the king's favour, and yet he "regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed." Note, It is no new thing for that which is done faithfully in conscience towards God to be misrepresented as done obstinately, and in contempt of the civil powers; that is, for the best saints to be reproached as the worst men. Daniel regarded God, and therefore prayed, and we have reason to think prayed for the king and his government, yet this is construed as not regarding the king. That excellent spirit which Daniel was endued with, and that established reputation which he had gained, could not protect him from these poisonous darts. They do not say he makes his petition to his God, lest Darius should take notice of that to his praise, but only he makes his petition, which is a thing the law forbids.

Thirdly. The great concern the king was in hereupon. He now perceived that, whatever they pretended, it was not to honour him, but in spite to Daniel, that they had proposed that law, and now is "sore displeased with himself" for gratifying them in it, ver. 14. Note, When men indulge a proud, vain-glorious humour, and please themselves with that which feeds it, they know not what vexations they are preparing for themselves. Their flatterers may prove their tormentors, and are but spreading a net for their feet. Now the king sets his heart to deliver Daniel; both by argument and by authority he labours "till the going down of the sun to deliver him;" that is, to persuade his accusers not to insist upon his prosecution. Note, We often do that through inconsideration which afterwards we see cause a thousand times to wish undone again, which is a good reason why we should ponder the path of our feet, for then all our ways will be established.

Fourthly. The violence with which the prosecutors demanded judgment, ver. 15. We are not told what Daniel said. The king himself is his advocate, he needs not plead his own cause, but silently commits himself and it to Him that judges righteously; but the prosecutors insist upon it that the law must have its course. It is a fundamental maxim in the constitution of the government of the Medes and Persians, which is now become the universal monarchy, that "no decree or statute which the king establisheth may be changed." The same we find, Est. i. 19; viii. 8. The Chaldeans magnified the will of their king by giving him a power to make and unmake laws at his pleasure, to slay and keep alive whom he would. The Persians magnified the wisdom of their king by supposing that, whatever law he solemnly ratified, it was so well made that there could be no occasion to alter it, or dispense with it,—as if any human foresight could, in forming a law, guard against all inconveniences. But if this maxim be duly applied to Daniel's case, (as I am apt to think it is not, but perverted,) while it honours the king's legislative power it hampers his executive power, and incapacitates him to shew that mercy which upholds the throne, and to pass acts of indemnity, which are the glories of a reign. Those who allow not the sovereign's power to dispense with a disabling statute yet never question his power to pardon an offence against a penal statute: but Darius is denied this power. See what need we have to pray for princes that God would give them wisdom, for they are often embarrassed with great difficulties, even the wisest and best are.

Fifthly. The executing of the law upon Daniel. The king himself, with the utmost reluctancy, and against his conscience, signs the warrant for his execution, and Daniel, that venerable grave man, that carried such a mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance, that had so often looked great upon the bench, and at the council board, and greater upon his knees, that had power with God and man, and had prevailed, purely for worshipping his God is brought, as if he had been one of the vilest of malefactors, and thrown into the den of lions, to be devoured by them, ver. 16. One cannot think of it without the utmost compasssion of the gracious sufferer, and the utmost indignation at the malicious prosecutors. To make sure work, the stone laid upon the mouth of the den is sealed, and the king (an over-easy man) is persuaded to do it with his own signet, ver. 17, that unhappy signet with which he had confirmed the law that Daniel falls by. But his lords cannot trust him, unless they add their signet too. Thus, when Christ was buried, his adversaries sealed the stone that was rolled to the door of his sepulchre.

Sixthly. The encouragement which Darius gave to Daniel to trust in God. "Thy God, whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee," ver. 16. 1. He justifies Daniel from guilt, owning all his crime to be serving his God continually, and continuing to do so even when it was made a crime. 2. He leaves it to God to free him from punishment, since he could not prevail to do it. He will deliver thee. He is sure his God can deliver him, for he believes him to be an Almighty God; and he has reason to think he will do it, having heard of his delivering Daniel's companions, in a like case, from the fiery furnace, and concluding him to be always faithful to those who approve themselves faithful to him. Note, Those who serve God continually he will continually preserve, and will bear them out in his service.

18 Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting: neither were instruments of musick brought before him: and his sleep went from him. 19 Then the king arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions. 20 And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions? 21 Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live for ever. 22 My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt. 23 Then was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God. 24 And the king commanded, and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, their children, and their wives; and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

Here is, First. The melancholy night which the king had upon Daniel's account, ver. 18. He had said, indeed, that God would deliver him out of the danger, but at the same time he could not forgive himself for throwing him into the danger, and justly might God deprive him of a friend whom he had himself used so barbarously. He went to his palace vexed at himself for what he had done, and calling himself unwise and unjust for not adhering to the law of God and nature, with a non obstante,—'a negative,' to the law of the Medes and Persians. He ate no supper, but passed the night fasting; his heart was already full of grief and fear; he forbade the music—nothing more unpleasing than songs sung to a heavy heart—he went to bed, but got no sleep; was full of tossings to and fro till the dawning of the day. Note, The best way to have a good night is to keep a good conscience; then we may lay us down in peace.

Secondly. The solicitous inquiry he made concerning Daniel the next morning, ver. 19, 20. He was up early, very early; for how could he lie in bed when he could not sleep for dreaming of Daniel, nor lie awake quietly for thinking of him? And he was no sooner up but he went in haste to the den of lions,—for he could not satisfy himself to send a servant, that would not sufficiently testify his affection to Daniel, nor had he patience to stay so long as till a servant would return. When he comes to the den, not without some hopes that God had graciously undone what he had wickedly done, he cries with a lamentable voice, as one full of concern and trouble, O Daniel, art thou alive? He longs to know, yet trembles to ask the question, fearing to be answered with the roaring of the lions after more prey; "O Daniel, servant of the living God," has "thy God whom thou servest" made it to appear that he is "able to deliver thee from the lions?" If he rightly understood himself when he called him the living God, he could not doubt of his ability to keep Daniel alive, for he that has life in himself quickens whom he will; but has he thought fit, in this case, to exert his power? What he doubted of, we are sure of, that the servants of the living God have a master who is well able to protect them and bear them out in his service.

Thirdly. The joyful news he meets with, that Daniel is alive, is safe and well, and unhurt in the lions' den, ver. 21, 22. Daniel knew the king's voice, though it was now a lamentable voice, and spoke to him with all the deference and respect that was due to him, "O king, live for ever." He doth not reproach him for his unkindness to him, and his easiness in yielding to the malice of his prosecutors; but, to shew that he has heartily forgiven him, he meets him with his good wishes. Note, We should not upbraid those with the unkindnesses they have done us, who we know did them with reluctancy, and are very ready to upbraid themselves with them. The account Daniel gives the king is very pleasant—it is triumphant.

1. God has preserved his life by a miracle. Darius had called him Daniel's God, thy God whom thou servest; to which Daniel doth, as it were, echo back, Yea, he is my God, whom I own, and who owns me, for he hath sent his angel. The same bright and glorious being that was seen in the form of the Son of God with the three children in the fiery furnace, had visited Daniel, and, it is likely, in a visible appearance, had enlightened the dark den, and kept Daniel company all night, and had shut the lions' mouths, that they had not in the least hurt him. The angel's presence made even the lions' den his stronghold, his palace, his paradise; he never had had a better night in his life. See the power of God over the fiercest creatures, and believe his power to restrain the roaring lion that goes about continually seeking to devour from hurting those that are his. See the care God takes of his faithful worshippers, especially when he calls them out to suffer for him. If he keep their souls from sin, comfort their souls with peace, and receive their souls to himself, he doth in effect stop the lions' mouths, that they cannot hurt them. See how ready the angels are to minister for the good of God's people, for they own themselves their fellow-servants.

2. God has therein pleaded his cause. He was represented to the king as disaffected to him and his government. We do not find he said any thing in his own vindication, but left it to God to clear up his integrity as the light, and he did it effectually, by working a miracle for his preservation. Daniel, in what he had done, had not offended either God or the king. "Before him" whom I prayed to "innocency was found in me." He pretends not to a meritorious excellency, but the testimony of his conscience concerning his sincerity is his comfort, as also that "Before thee, O king, I have done no hurt," nor designed thee any affront.

Fourthly. The discharge of Daniel from his confinement. His prosecutors cannot but own that the law is satisfied, though they are not; or, if it be altered, it is by a power superior to that of the Medes and Persians, and therefore no cause can be shewn why Daniel should not be fetched out of the den; ver. 23, "The king was exceeding glad" to find him alive, and gave orders immediately that they should take him out of the den, as Jeremiah out of the dungeon; and when they searched "no manner of hurt was found upon him;" he was nowhere crushed or scarred, but was kept perfectly well, "because he believed in his God." Note, Those who boldly and cheerfully trust in God to protect them in the way of their duty shall never be made ashamed of their confidence in him, but shall always find him a present help.

Fifthly. The committing of his prosecutors to the same prison, or place of execution rather, ver. 24. Darius is animated by this miracle wrought for Daniel, and now begins to take courage and act like himself. Those that would not suffer him to shew mercy to Daniel, now God has done it for him, shall be made to feel his resentment, and he will do justice for God, who hath shewn mercy for him. Daniel's accusers, now his innocency is cleared, and Heaven itself is become his compurgator, have the same punishment inflicted upon them which they designed against him, according to the law of retaliation, made against false accusers, Deu. xix. 18, 19; such they were to be reckoned, now Daniel was proved innocent, for, though the fact was true, yet it was not a fault. They were cast into the den of lions, which perhaps was a punishment newly invented by themselves; however, it was what they maliciously designed for Daniel. Nec lex est justior ulla quam necis artifices arte perire sua.—'No law can be more just than that which adjudges the devisers of barbarity to perish by it.' Ps. vii. 15, 16; ix. 15, 16. And now Solomon's observation is verified, Pr. xi. 8, "The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead." In this execution we may observe, 1. The king's severity in ordering their wives and children to be thrown to the lions with them. How righteous are God's statutes above those of the nations, for God commanded that the children should not die for the fathers' crimes, Deu. xxiv. 16. Yet it was done in extraordinary cases, as that of Achan, and Saul, and Haman. 2. The lions' fierceness. They had the mastery of them immediately, and tore them to pieces before they "came to the bottom of the den." This verified and magnified the miracle of their sparing Daniel; for hereby it appeared that it was not because they had not appetite, but because they had not leave. Mastiffs that are kept muzzled are the more fierce when the muzzle is taken off; so were these lions. And the Lord is known by those judgments which he executeth.

25 Then king Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. 26 I make a decree, That in every dominion of my kingdom men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel: for he is the living God, and stedfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end. 27 He delivereth and rescueth, and he worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions. 28 So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

Darius here studies to make some amends for the dishonour he had done both to God and Daniel, in casting Daniel into the lions' den, by doing honour to both.

First. He gives honour to God by a decree published to all nations, by which they are required to fear before him. And this is a decree which is indeed fit to be made unalterable, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, for it is the everlasting Gospel preached to them that dwell on the earth; Rev. xiv. 7, "Fear God, and give glory to him." Observe,

1. To whom he sends this decree. "To all people, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth," ver. 25. These are big words, and it is true that all the inhabitants of the earth are obliged to that which is here decreed; but here they mean no more but "every dominion of his kingdom," which, though it contained many nations, yet not all nations. But so it is, those that have much are ready to think they have all.

2. What the matter of the decree is. That "men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel." This goes farther than Nebuchadnezzar's decree upon the like occasion, for that only restrained people from speaking amiss of this God, but this requires them to fear before him, to keep up and express awful, reverend thoughts of him. And well might this decree be prefaced as it is, with "Peace be multiplied unto you," for the only foundation of true and abundant peace is laid in the fear of God, for that is true wisdom. If we live in the fear of God, and walk according to that rule, peace shall be upon us, peace shall be multiplied to us. But though this decree goes far it doth not go far enough. Had he done right, and come up to his present convictions, he should have commanded all men not only to tremble and fear before this God, but to love him and trust in him, to forsake the service of their idols, and to worship him only, and call upon him, as Daniel did. But idolatry had been so long and so deeply rooted, that it was not to be extirpated by the edicts of princes, nor by any power less than that which went along with the glorious Gospel of Christ.

3. What are the causes and considerations moving him to make this decree. They are sufficient to have justified a decree for the total suppression of idolatry, much more will they serve to support this. There is good reason why all men should fear before this God; for, 1st. His being is transcendent. He is the "living God," lives as a God; whereas the gods we worship are dead things, have not so much as an animal life. 2nd. His government is incontestable. He has a kingdom and a dominion; he not only lives, but reigns, as an absolute sovereign. 3rd. Both his being and his government are unchangeable. He is himself "stedfast for ever," and "with him is no shadow of turning." And his kingdom, too, is "that which shall not be destroyed" by any external force, nor has his dominion any thing in itself that threatens a decay, or tends towards it, and therefore "it shall be even to the end." 4th. He has an ability sufficient to support such an authority, ver. 27. He delivereth his faithful servants from trouble, and rescueth them out of trouble; he worketh signs and wonders, quite above the utmost power of nature to effect, both in heaven and in earth, by which it appears that he is sovereign Lord of both. 5th. He has given a fresh proof of all this in delivering his servant "Daniel from the power of the lions." This miracle, and that of the delivering of the three children, were wrought in the eyes of the world, were seen, published, and attested by two of the greatest monarchs that ever were, and were illustrious confirmations of the first principles of religion, abstracted from the narrow scheme of Judaism, effectual confutations of all the errors of heathenism, and very proper preparations for pure catholic Christianity.

Secondly. He puts honour upon Daniel; ver. 28, "So this Daniel prospered." See how God brought to him good out of evil. This bold stroke which his enemies made at his life was a happy occasion of taking them off, and their children too, who otherwise would still have stood in the way of his preferment, and have been upon all occasions vexatious to him; and now he prospered more than ever, was more in favour with his prince and reputation with the people, which gave him a great opportunity of doing good to his brethren. Thus "out of the eater" (and that was a lion too) "came forth meat, and out of the strong sweetness."

CHAPTER VII.

The six former chapters of this book were historical; we now enter, with fear and trembling, upon the six latter, which are prophetical, wherein are many things dark and hard to be understood, which we dare not positively determine the sense of; and yet many things plain and profitable, which I trust God will enable us to make a good use of. In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's vision of the four beasts, ver. 1—8. II. His vision of God's throne of government and judgment, ver. 9—14. III. The interpretation of these visions given him by an angel that stood by, ver. 15—28. Whether those visions look as far forward as the end of time, or whether they were to have a speedy accomplishment, is hard to say, nor are the most judicious interpreters agreed concerning it.

IN the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon Daniel had a dream and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters. 2 Daniel spake and said, I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea. 3 And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another. 4 The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings: I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it. 5 And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh. 6 After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl; the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it. 7 After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns. 8 I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.

The date of this chapter plæceth it before ch. v., which was in the last year of Belshazzar, and ch. vi., which was in the first of Darius; for Daniel had those visions in the first year of Belshazzar, when the captivity of the Jews in Babylon was drawing near a period. Belshazzar's name here is in the original spelt differently from what it used to be: before it was Bel-she-azar, 'Bel is he that treasures up riches;' but this is Bel-eshe-zar, 'Bel is on fire by the enemy.' Bel was the god of the Chaldeans; he had prospered, but is now to be consumed.

We have in these verses Daniel's vision of the four monarchies that were oppressive to the Jews. Observe,

First. The circumstances of this vision. Daniel had interpreted Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and now he is himself honoured with like Divine discoveries, ver. 1. He had visions of his head upon his bed, when he was asleep; so God sometimes revealed himself and his mind to the children of men, when deep sleep fell upon them, Job xxxiii. 15; for when we are most retired from the world, and taken off from the things of sense, we are most fit for communion with God. But when he was awake he wrote the dream for his own use, lest he should forget it, as a dream which passeth away; and he told the sum of the matters to his brethren the Jews, for their use, and gave it them in writing, that it might be communicated to those at a distance, and preserved for their children after them, who should see these things accomplished. The Jews, misunderstanding some of the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, flattered themselves with hopes that, after their return to their own land, they should enjoy a complete and uninterrupted tranquillity; but that they might not so deceive themselves, and their calamities be made doubly grievous by the disappointment, God, by this prophet, lets them know that they shall have tribulation. Those promises of their prosperity were to be accomplished in the spiritual blessings of the kingdom of grace; as Christ has told his disciples they must expect persecution, and the promises they depend upon will be accomplished in the eternal blessings of the kingdom of glory. Daniel both wrote these things and spake them, to intimate that the church should be taught both by the Scriptures and by ministers' preaching,—both by the written word and by word of mouth; and ministers in their preaching are to tell the sum of the matters that are written.

Secondly. The vision itself, which foretells the revolutions of government in those nations which the church of the Jews, for the following ages, was to be under the influence of.

1. He observed the four winds to strive upon the great sea, ver. 2. They strove which should blow strongest, and at length blow alone. This represents the contests among princes for empire, and the shakings of the nations by these contests, to which those mighty monarchies he was now to have a prospect of owed their rise. One wind from any point of the compass, if it blow hard, will cause a great commotion in the sea; but what a tumult must needs be raised when the four winds strive for mastery! That is it which the kings of the nations are contending for in their wars, which are as noisy and violent as the battle of the winds. But how is the poor sea tossed and torn, how terrible are its concussions, how violent its convulsions, while the winds are at strife which shall have the sole power of troubling it? Note, This world is like a stormy tempestuous sea; thanks to the proud ambitious winds that vex it.

2. He saw "four great beasts come up from the sea," from the troubled waters, in which aspiring minds love to fish. The monarchs and monarchies are represented by beasts, because too often it is by brutish rage and tyranny that they are raised and supported. These beasts were diverse one from another, ver. 3, of different shape, to note the different genius and complexion of the nations in whose hands they were lodged.

1st. The first beast was "like a lion," ver. 4. This was the Chaldean monarchy, that was fierce and strong, and made the kings absolute. This lion had eagle's wings, with which to fly upon the prey. It notes the wonderful speed that Nebuchadnezzar made in his conquest of kingdoms. But he soon sees the wings plucked, a full stop put to the career of their victorious arms. Divers countries, that had been tributaries to them, revolt from them, and make head against them, so that this monstrous animal, this winged lion, is made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart is given to it. It has lost the heart of a lion, which it had been famous for, (one of our English kings was called Cœur de Lion,) hath lost his courage, and is become feeble and faint, dreading every thing, and daring nothing; they are put in fear, and made to know themselves to be but men. Sometimes the valour of a nation strangely sinks and becomes cowardly and effeminate, so that what was the head of the nations in an age or two becomes the tail.

2nd. The second beast was "like a bear," ver. 5. This was the Persian monarchy, less strong and generous than the former, but no less ravenous. This bear "raised up itself on one side" against the lion, and soon mastered it. 'It raised up one dominion,' so some read it. Persia and Media, which in Nebuchadnezzar's image were the two arms in one beast, now set up a joint government. This bear had "three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth," the remains of those nations it had devoured, which were the marks of its voraciousness, and yet an indication that, though it had devoured much, it could not devour all; there were some ribs still stuck in the teeth of it, which it could not conquer. Whereupon it was said to it, Arise, devour much flesh; let the bones, the ribs, alone that cannot be conquered, and set upon that which will be an easier prey. The princes will stir up both the kings and the people to push on their conquests, and let nothing stand before them. Note, Conquests unjustly made are but like those of the beasts of prey, and in this much worse, that the beasts prey not upon those of their own kind, as wicked and unreasonable men do.

3rd. The third beast was like a leopard, ver. 6. This was the Grecian monarchy founded by Alexander the Great; active, crafty, and cruel, "like a leopard." He had "four wings of a fowl;" the lion seems to have had but two wings, but the leopard has four; for, though Nebuchadnezzar made great dispatch in his conquests, Alexander made much greater. In six years' time he gained the whole empire of Persia, a great part beside of Asia, made himself master of Syria, Egypt, India, and other nations. This beast had four heads; upon Alexander's death his conquests were divided among his four chief captains—Seleucus Nicanor had Asia the Great; Perdiccas, and after him Antigonus, had Asia the Less; Cassander had Macedonia, and Ptolemeus had Egypt. Dominion was given to this beast; it was given of God, from whom alone promotion comes.

4th. The fourth beast was more fierce, and formidable, and mischievous than any of them, unlike any of the other, nor is there any among the beasts of prey to which it might be compared, ver. 7. The learned are not agreed concerning this anonymous beast. Some make it to be the Roman empire, which when it was in its glory comprehended ten kingdoms, Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, Sarmatia, Pannonia, Asia, Greece, and Egypt; and then the little horn which rose by the fall of three of the other horns, ver. 8, they make to be the Turkish empire, which rose in the room of Asia, Greece, and Egypt. Others make this fourth beast to be the kingdom of Syria, the family of the Seleucidæ, which was very cruel and oppressive to the people of the Jews, as we find in Josephus and the history of the Maccabees. And herein that empire was diverse from those that went before, that none of the preceding powers compelled the Jews to renounce their religion, but the kings of Syria did, and used them barbarously. Their armies and commanders were the great iron teeth with which they devoured and brake in pieces the people of God; and they trampled upon the residue of them. The ten horns are then supposed to be ten kings that reigned successively in Syria; and then the little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes, the last of the ten, who by one means or other undermined three of the kings, and got the government. He was a man of great ingenuity, and therefore is said to have eyes like the eyes of a man; and was very bold and daring,—had a mouth speaking great things. We shall meet with him again in these prophecies.

9 I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. 10 A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. 11 I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. 12 As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time. 13 I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. 14 And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

Whether we understand the fourth beast to signify the Syrian empire or the Roman, or the former as a figure of the latter, it is plain these verses are intended for the comfort and support of the people of God, in reference to the persecutions they were likely to sustain, both from the one and from the other, and from all their proud enemies in every age; for it is written for their learning on whom the ends of the world are come, that they also, through patience and comfort of this Scripture, might have hope. Three things are here discovered that are very encouraging:

First. That there is a judgment to come, and God is the judge. Now men have their day, and every pretender thinks he should have his day, and struggles for it. But "he that sits in heaven laughs at them," for he sees that "his day is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13; ver. 9, "I beheld till the thrones were cast down," not only the thrones of these beasts, but all rule, authority, and power that is set up in opposition to the kingdom of God among men, 1 Cor. xv. 24. Such are the thrones of the kingdoms of the world in comparison with God's kingdom; they that see them set up need but wait awhile, and they will see them cast down. 'I beheld till thrones were set up,' so it may as well be read, Christ's throne, and the throne of his Father. One of the rabbins confesseth that these thrones are set up, one for God, another for the Son of David. It is the judgment that is here set, ver. 10. Now this is intended, 1st. To speak God's wise and righteous government of the world by his providence; and an unspeakable satisfaction it gives to all good men in the midst of the convulsions and revolutions of states and kingdoms, that the "Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom ruleth over all," Ps. ciii. 19; that, "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth," Ps. lviii. 11. 2nd. Perhaps it points at the destruction brought by the providence of God upon the empire of Syria, or that of Rome, for their tyrannizing over the people of God. But, 3rd. It seems principally designed to describe the last judgment; for, though it follow not immediately upon the dominion of the fourth beast, nay, though it be yet to come, perhaps many ages to come, yet it was intended that in every age the people of God should encourage themselves under their troubles with the belief and prospect of it. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, Jude 14. Doth the mouth of the enemy speak great things? ver. 8. Here are far greater things which the mouth of the Lord has spoken. Many of the New Testament predictions of the judgment to come have a plain allusion to this vision here, especially St. John's vision of it, Rev. xx. 11, 12.

1. The judge is the "Ancient of days" himself, God the Father, the glory of whose presence is here described. He is called the "Ancient of days," because he is God from everlasting to everlasting. Among men we reckon that "with the ancient is wisdom," and days shall speak. Shall not all flesh then be silent before him who is the "Ancient of days?" The glory of the Judge is here set forth by his garment, which was white as snow, noting his splendour and purity in all the administrations of his justice, and the hair of his head clean and white, as the pure wool, that, as the white and hoary head, he may appear venerable.

2. The throne is very formidable. It is "like the fiery plain," dreadful to the wicked that shall be summoned before it. And the throne being moveable upon wheels, or at least the chariot in which he rode his circuit, the wheels thereof are as burning fire, to devour the adversaries; for "our God is a consuming fire," and with him are "everlasting burnings," Isa. xxxiii. 14. This is enlarged upon, ver. 10. As to all his faithful friends there "proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb a pure river of water of life," Rev. xxii. 1, so to all his implacable enemies there issues and comes forth from his throne a fiery stream of brimstone," Isa. xxx. 33; a fire that shall devour before him. He is a swift witness, and his word a word upon the wheels.

3. The attendants are numerous and very splendid. The Shechinah is always attended with angels; it is so here, ver. 10, a "thousand thousand minister to him," and "ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him." It is his glory that he has such attendance, but much more his glory that he neither needs them nor can be benefited by them. See how numerous the heavenly hosts are,—there are thousands of angels; and how obsequious they are,—they stand before God, ready to go on his errands, and to take the first intimation of his will and pleasure. They will particularly be employed as ministers of his justice in the last judgment, when the Son of Man shall come, and all the holy angels with him. Enoch prophesied that the Lord should come with his holy myriads.

4. The process is fair and unexceptionable; the judgment is set, publicly and openly, that all may have recourse to it, and the books are opened. As in courts of judgment, among men, the proceedings are in writing, and upon record, which is laid open when the cause comes to a hearing, the examination of witnesses is produced, and affidavits read to clear the matter of fact, the statute and common law books consulted to find out what is the law,—so in the judgment of the great day the equity of the sentence will be as incontestably evident as if there were books opened to justify it.

Secondly. That the proud and cruel enemies of the church of God will certainly be reckoned with and brought down in due time, ver. 11, 12. This is here represented to us,

1. In the destroying of the fourth beast. God's quarrel with this beast is, "because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake," bidding defiance to heaven, and triumphing over all that is sacred. This provokes God more than any thing, for the "enemy to behave himself proudly," Deu. xxxii. 27. Therefore Pharaoh must be humbled, because he hath said, "Who is the Lord?" and hath said, "I will pursue, I will overtake." Enoch foretold that therefore the Lord would come to judge the world, that he might "convince all that are ungodly of their hard speeches," Jude 15. Note, Great words are but idle words, for which men must give account in the great day. And see what comes of this beast that talks so big; he is slain, and "his body destroyed and given to the burning flame." The Syrian empire, after Antiochus, was destroyed; he himself died of a miserable disease, his family was rooted out, the kingdom wasted by the Parthians and Armenians, and at length made a province of the Roman empire by Pompey. And the Roman empire itself, (if we take that for the fourth beast,) after it began to persecute Christianity, declined and wasted away, and the body of it was destroyed. "So shall all thine enemies perish, O Lord, and be slain before thee."

2. In the diminishing and weakening of the other three beasts, ver. 12. They had their dominion taken away, and so were disabled to do the mischiefs they had done to the church and people of God; but a prolonging in life was given them, for a time and a season, a set time, the bounds of which they could not pass. The power of the foregoing kingdoms was quite broken, but the people of them still remain in a mean, and weak, and low condition. We may allude to this in describing the remainders of sin in the hearts of good people: they have corruptions in them, the lives of which are prolonged, so that they are not perfectly free from sin, but the dominion of them is taken away, so that sin doth not reign in their mortal bodies. And thus God deals with his church's enemies; sometimes he breaks the teeth of them (Ps. iii. 7) when he doth not break the neck of them; crusheth the persecution, but reprieves the persecutors, that they may have space to repent. And it is fit that God, in doing his own work, should take his own time and way.

Thirdly. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up and kept up in the world, in despite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness. Let the heathen rage and fret as long as they please, God will "set his king upon his holy hill of Zion." Daniel sees this in vision, and comforts himself and his friends with the prospect of it. This is the same with Nebuchadnezzar's foresight of the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands," which broke in pieces the image; but in this vision there is much more of pure Gospel than in that.

1. The Messiah is here called, "the Son of man," "one like unto the Son of man;" for he was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was found in fashion as a man: "I saw one like unto the Son of man," one exactly agreeing with the idea formed in the Divine counsels of him who, in the fulness of time, was to be the Mediator between God and man. He is "like unto the Son of man," but is indeed the Son of God. Our Saviour seems plainly to refer to this vision when he saith, Jno. v. 27, that the Father has therefore "given him authority to execute judgment," because he is "the Son of man," and because he is the person whom Daniel saw in vision, to whom a kingdom and dominion were to be given.

2. He is said to come with the clouds of heaven. Some refer this to his incarnation. He descended in the clouds of heaven, came into the world unseen, as the glory of the Lord took possession of the temple in a cloud. The empires of the world were beasts that rose out of the sea; but Christ's kingdom is from above, he is the Lord from heaven. I think it is rather to be referred to his ascension; when he returned to the Father, the eye of his disciples followed him till "a cloud received him out of their sight," Acts i. 9. He made that cloud his chariot, wherein he rode triumphantly to the upper world. He comes swiftly, irresistibly, and comes in state, for he comes with the clouds of heaven.

3. He is here represented as having a mighty interest in heaven. When the cloud received him out of the sight of his disciples, it is worth while to inquire, (as the sons of the prophets, concerning Elijah in a like case,) whither it carried him, where it lodged him; and here we are told abundantly to our satisfaction that he came to the "Ancient of days," for he ascended to "his Father and our Father, to his God and our God," Jno. xx. 17; from him he came forth, and to him he returns to be glorified with him, and to sit down at his right hand. It was with a great deal of pleasure that he said, "Now I go to him that sent me." But was he welcome? Yes, no doubt he was; for they brought him near before him: he was introduced into his Father's presence with the attendance and adorations of "all the angels of God," Heb. i. 6. God caused him to draw near and approach to him, as an advocate and undertaker for us, Jer. xxx. 31, that we through him might be made nigh. By this solemn near approach he made to the "Ancient of days" it appears that the Father accepted the sacrifice he offered, and the satisfaction he made, and was entirely well pleased with all he had done. He was brought near, as our High Priest, who for us enters within the pale, and as our forerunner.

4. He is here represented as having a mighty influence upon this earth, ver. 14. When he went to be glorified with his Father he had a "power given him over all flesh," Jno. xvii. 2, 5. With the prospect of this Daniel and his friends are here comforted, that not only the dominion of the church's enemies shall be taken away, ver. 12, but the church's Head and best friend shall have the dominion given him; to him "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess," Phil. ii. 9, 10. To him is given glory and a kingdom; and it is given by him who has an unquestionable right to give it, which, some think, with an eye to these words, our Saviour teaches us to acknowledge in the close of the Lord's Prayer, "For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory." It is here foretold that the kingdom of the exalted Redeemer shall be, 1st. A universal kingdom; the only universal monarchy, whatever others have pretended to, or aimed at. All people, nations, and languages shall fear him, and be under his jurisdiction, either as his willing subjects or as his conquered captives, to be either ruled or overruled by him. One way or other the kingdoms of the world shall all become his kingdoms. 2nd. An everlasting kingdom. His dominion shall not pass away to any successor, much less to any invader, and his kingdom is that which shall not be destroyed. Even the gates of hell, all the infernal powers and policies, shall not prevail against it. The church shall continue militant to the end of time, and triumphant to the endless ages of eternity.

15 I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the visions of my head troubled me. 16 I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things. 17 These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. 18 But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. 19 Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; 20 And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. 21 I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; 22 Until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. 23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. 24 And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. 25 And he shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. 26 But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end. 27 And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. 28 Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart.

Here is, First. The deep impressions which these visions made upon the prophet. God, in them, put honour upon him, and gave him satisfaction, yet not without a great alloy of pain and perplexity; ver. 15, "I Daniel was grieved in my spirit, in the midst of my body." The word here used for the body properly signifies a sheath or scabbard, for the body is no more to the soul; that is the weapon, it is that which we are principally to take care of. "The visions of my head troubled me;" and again, ver. 28, "my cogitations much troubled me." The manner in which these things were discovered to him quite overwhelmed him, and put his thoughts so much to the stretch that his spirits failed him, and the trance he was in tired him, and made him faint. The things themselves that were discovered amazed and astonished him, and put him into a confusion till by degrees he recollected and conquered himself, and set the comforts of the vision over against the terrors of it.

Secondly. His earnest desire to understand the meaning of them; ver. 16, "I came near to one of them that stood by," to one of the angels that appeared attending the Son of man in his glory, and asked him the truth; that is, the true intent and meaning of all this. Note, It is a very desirable thing to take the right and full sense of what we see and hear from God; and those that would know must ask by faithful and fervent prayer, and by accomplishing a diligent search.

Thirdly. The key that was given him to let him into the understanding of this vision. The angel told him, and told him so plainly that he made him know the interpretation of the thing, and so made him somewhat more easy.

1. The great beasts are great kings and their kingdoms, great monarchs and their monarchies, which shall "arise out of the earth," as those beasts did out of the sea, ver. 17. They are but terræ filii,—'from beneath,' savour of the earth, and their foundation is in the dust; they are of the earth earthy, and they are written in the dust, and to the dust they shall return.

2. Daniel pretty well understands the first three beasts, but concerning the fourth desires to be better informed; because it differed so much from the rest, and was exceeding dreadful, and not only so, but very mischievous, for it "devoured and brake in pieces," ver. 19. Perhaps this was it that put Daniel into such a fright, and this part of the visions of his head troubled him more than any of the rest. But especially he desired to know what the little horn was that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, and whose countenance was more fearless and formidable than that of any of his fellows, ver. 20. And this he was most inquisitive about, because it was this horn that "made war with the saints, and prevailed against them," ver. 21. While no more is intimated but that the children of men make war with one another, and prevail against one another, the prophet doth not shew himself so much concerned,—"Let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth," and be dashed in pieces one against another; but when they make war with the saints, when the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, are broken as earthen pitchers, it is time to ask, What is the meaning of this? Will the Lord cast off his people? Will he suffer their enemies to trample upon them, and triumph over them? What is this same horn that shall prevail so far against the saints? To this his interpreter answers, ver. 23—25, that this fourth beast is a fourth kingdom, that shall "devour the whole earth," or, as it may be read, the whole land; that the ten horns are ten kings, and the little horn is another king that shall subdue three kings, and shall be very abusive to God and his people; shall carry it, 1st. Very impiously toward God; he shall speak great words against the Most High, setting him, and his authority and justice, at defiance. 2nd. Very imperiously towards the people of God; he shall "wear out the saints of the Most High." He will not cut them off at once, but "wear them out" by long oppressions, and a constant course of hardships put upon them; ruining their estates, and weakening their families. The design of Satan has been to wear out the saints of the Most High, that they may be no more in remembrance; but the attempt is vain, for while the world stands God will have a church in it. He shall "think to change times and laws," to abolish all the ordinances and institutions of religion, and to bring everybody to say and do just as he would have them; he shall trample upon laws and customs, human and Divine, (Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis,—'He pulls down, he builds, he changeth square into round,') as if he meant to alter even the ordinances of heaven themselves. And in these daring attempts he shall for a time prosper and have success; they shall be given into his hand until time, times, and half a time, that is, for three years and a half; that famous prophetical measure of time which we meet with in the Revelation, which is sometimes called forty-two months, sometimes twelve hundred and sixty days, which shall come all to one. But at the end of that time the "judgment shall sit, and take away his dominion," ver. 26; which he expounds, ver. 11, "The beast was slain and his body destroyed." And, as Mr. Mede reads ver. 12, 'As to the rest of the beast,' that is, the ten horns, especially the little ruling horn, as he calls it, they had their dominion taken away.

Now, the question is, Who is this enemy, whose rise, reign, and ruin, is here foretold? Interpreters are not agreed; some will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Seleucidæ, and the little horn to be Antiochus, and shew the accomplishment of all this in the history of the Maccabees,—so Junius Piscator, Polanus, Broughton, and many others; but others will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Romans, and the little horn to be Julius Cæsar and the succeeding emperors, saith Calvin; the antichrist, the papal kingdom, saith Mr. Joseph Mede, that wicked one which, as this little horn, is to be consumed by the brightness of Christ's second coming. And the pope assumes a power to change times and laws, that is, 'an absolute despotic power;' 'potestas, αὐτοκρατορικὴ,' as he calls it. Others make the little horn to be the Turkish empire; so Luther, Vatablus, and others. Now I cannot prove either side to be in the wrong, and therefore, since prophecies sometimes have many fulfillings, and we ought to give Scripture its full latitude in this, as in many other controversies, I am willing to allow that they are both in the right; and that this prophecy has primary reference to the Syrian empire, and was intended for the encouragement of the Jews that suffered under Antiochus, that they might see even these melancholy times foretold, but it might foresee a glorious issue of them at last, and the final overthrow of their proud oppressors; and, which is best of all, might foresee, not long after, the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world, with the hopes of which it was usual with the former prophets to comfort the people of God in their distresses: but yet it has a farther reference, and foretells the like persecuting power and rage in Rome heathen, and no less in Rome papal, against the Christian religion, that was in Antiochus against the pious Jews and their religion. And St. John, in his visions and prophecies, which point primarily at Rome, has plain reference, in many particulars, to these visions here.

3. He has a joyful prospect given him of the prevalency of God's kingdom among men, and its victory over all opposition at last. And it is very observable, that, in the midst of the predictions of the force and fury of the enemies, this is brought in abruptly, ver. 18, and again ver. 22, before it comes in the course of the vision to be interpreted, ver. 26, 27. And this also refers, 1st. To the prosperous days of the Jewish church after it had weathered the storm under Antiochus, and the power which the Maccabees obtained over their enemies. 2nd. To the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world by the preaching of the Gospel. "For judgment Christ comes into this world," to rule by his Spirit, and to make all his saints "kings and priests to their God." 3rd. To the second coming of Jesus Christ, when the saints shall judge the world, shall sit down with him on his throne, and triumph in the complete downfall of the devil's kingdom.

Let us see what is here foretold. First. The "Ancient of days shall come," ver. 22. God shall judge the world by his Son, to whom he hath committed all judgment; and, as an earnest of that, he comes for the deliverance of his oppressed people, comes for the setting up of his kingdom in the world. Secondly. "The judgment shall sit," ver. 26. God will make it to appear that he judgeth in the earth, and will, both in wisdom and equity, plead his people's righteous cause. At the great day he will judge the "world in righteousness by that man whom he has ordained." Thirdly. The dominion of the enemy shall be taken away, ver. 26. All Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool, and shall be consumed and destroyed to the end. These words the apostle useth concerning the man of sin; 2 Thes. ii. 8, he shall be consumed with the "spirit of Christ's mouth," and "destroyed with the brightness of his coming." Fourthly. Judgment is "given to the saints of the Most High." The apostles are intrusted with the preaching of a Gospel by which the world shall be judged. All the saints, by their faith and obedience, condemn an unbelieving, disobedient world; in Christ their head they shall judge the world, shall "judge the twelve tribes of Israel," Mat. xix. 28. See what reason we have to honour them that fear the Lord; how mean and despicable soever the saints now appear in the eye of the world, and how much contempt soever is poured upon them, they are "the saints of the Most High," they are near and dear to God, and he owns them for his, and judgment is given to them. Fifthly. That which is most insisted upon is, that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever," ver. 18. And again, ver. 22, "The time came that the saints possessed the kingdom;" and again, ver. 27, "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." Far be it from us to infer from hence that dominion is founded on grace, or that this will warrant any, under pretence of saintship, to usurp kingship. No, Christ's kingdom is not of this world; but this speaks the spiritual dominion of the saints over their own lusts and corruptions, and their victories over Satan and his temptations, and the triumphs of the martyrs over death and its terrors. It likewise promiseth that the gospel kingdom shall be set up, a kingdom of light, holiness, and love; a kingdom of grace, the privileges and comforts of which now under the heavens shall be the earnest and firstfruits of the kingdom of glory in the heavens. When the empire became Christian, and princes used their power for the defence and advancement of Christianity, then the saints possessed the kingdom. The saints rule by the Spirit's ruling in them, and "this is the victory overcoming the world, even their faith," and by the making of the kingdoms of this world to become Christ's kingdom. But the full accomplishment of this will be in the everlasting happiness of the saints, the kingdom that cannot be moved, which we, according to his promise, look for, that is "the greatness of the kingdom," the crown of glory that fades not away—that is the "everlasting kingdom." See what an emphasis is laid upon this, ver. 18: "the saints shall possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever; and the reason is, because He whose saints they are is the Most High, and "his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom," ver. 27. He is so, and therefore theirs shall be so; "Because I live, you shall live also," Jno. xiv. 19. His kingdom is theirs; they reckon themselves exalted in his exaltation, and desire no greater honour and satisfaction to themselves than that all dominions should serve and obey him as they shall do, ver. 27. They shall either be brought into subjection to this golden sceptre or brought to destruction by this iron rod.

Daniel, in the close, when he ends that matter, tells us what impressions this vision made upon him. It overwhelmed his spirits to that degree that his countenance was changed, and it made him look pale; but he kept the matter in his heart. Note, The heart must be the treasury and storehouse of Divine things; there we must hide God's word, as the Virgin Mary kept the sayings of Christ, Lu. ii. 51. Daniel kept the matter in his heart, with design not to keep it from the church, but to keep it for the church, that what he had received from the Lord he might fully and faithfully deliver to the people. Note, It concerns God's prophets and ministers to treasure up the things of God in their minds, and there to digest them well. If we would have God's word ready in our mouths when we have occasion for it, we must keep it in our hearts at all times.

CHAPTER VIII.

The visions and prophecies of this chapter look only and entirely at the events that were then shortly to come to pass in the monarchies of Persia and Greece, and seem to have no farther reference at all. Nothing is here said of the Chaldean monarchy, for that was now just at its period, and therefore this chapter is not written in Chaldee, as the six foregoing chapters were, for the benefit of the Chaldeans, but in Hebrew, and so are the rest of the chapters to the end of the book, for the service of the Jews, that they might know what troubles were before them, and what the issue of them would be, and might provide accordingly. In this chapter we have, I. The vision of the ram, and the he-goat, and the little horn, that should fight and prevail against the people of God, for a certain limited time, ver. 1—14. II. The interpretation of this vision by an angel, shewing that the ram signified the Persian empire, the he-goat the Grecian, and the little horn a king of the Grecian monarchy, that should set himself against the Jews and religion, which was Antiochus Epiphanes, ver. 15—27. The Jewish church from its beginning had been all along more or less blessed with prophets, men Divinely inspired, to explain God's mind to them in his providences, and give them some prospect of what was coming upon them; but soon after Ezra's time Divine inspiration ceased, and there were no more any prophets till the gospel day dawned. And therefore the events of that time were here foretold by Daniel, and left upon record, that even then God might not leave himself without witness, or them without a guide.

IN the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first. 2 And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river of Ulai. 3 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and, behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. 4 I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great. 5 And as I was considering, behold, an he goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. 6 And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. 7 And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. 8 Therefore the he goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven. 9 And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. 10 And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. 11 Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. 12 And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practised, and prospered. 13 Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? 14 And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

Here is, First. The date of this vision, ver. 1. It was "in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar," which proved to be his last year, as many reckon; so that this chapter also should be, in order of time, before the fifth. That Daniel might not be surprised at the destruction of Babylon now at hand, God gives him a foresight of the destruction of other kingdoms hereafter, that in their day had been as potent as that of Babylon. Could we foresee the changes that shall be hereafter, when we are gone, we should the less admire, and be less affected with, the changes in our own days; for "that which is done is that which shall be done," Eccl. i. 9. Then it was that "a vision appeared to me, even to me Daniel." Here he solemnly attests the truth of it: it was to him, even to him, that the vision was shewn; he was the eye-witness of it. And this vision puts him in mind of a former vision, which "appeared to him at the first," in the first year of this reign, which he makes mention of, because this vision was an explication and confirmation of that, and points at many of the same events. That seems to have been a dream, a vision in his sleep; this seems to have been when he was awake.

Secondly. The scene of this vision. The place where that was laid was in "Shushan the palace," one of the royal seats of the kings of Persia, situated on the banks of the river Ulai, which surrounded the city. It was in the province of Elam, that part of Persia which lay next to Babylon. Daniel was not there in person, for he was now in Babylon, a captive, in some employment under Belshazzar, and might not go to such a distant country, especially being now an enemy's country, but he was there in vision; as Ezekiel, when a captive in Babylon, was often brought in the spirit to the land of Israel. Note, The soul may be at liberty when the body is in captivity; for when we are bound the spirit of the Lord is not bound. The vision related to that country, and therefore there he was made to fancy himself to be, as strongly as if he had really been there.

Thirdly. The vision itself, and the process of it.

1. He saw a ram with two horns, ver. 3. This was the second monarchy, of which the kingdom of Media and Persia were the two horns. The horns were very high, but that which came up last was the higher, and got the start of the former; so the last shall be first, and the first last. The kingdom of Persia, which rose last, in Cyrus, became more eminent than that of the Medes.

2. He saw this ram pushing all about him with his horns, ver. 4. Westward, towards Babylon, Syria, Greece, and the lesser Asia; northward, towards the Lydians, Armenians, and Scythians; and southward, towards Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt, for all these nations did the Persian empire, one time or other, make attempts upon, for the enlarging of their dominion. And at last he became so powerful that no beasts might stand before him. This ram, that is of a species of animals that are often preyed upon, becomes formidable even to the beasts of prey themselves, so that there was no standing before him, no escaping him, none that could deliver out of his hand, but all must yield to him. The kings of Persia did according to their will, prospered in all their ways abroad, and had an uncontrollable power at home, and became great. He thought himself great, because he did what he would; but to do good is that which makes men truly great.

3. He saw this ram overcome by a he-goat. He was considering the ram, and wondering so weak an animal should come to be so prevalent, with expectation what would be the issue, and behold a "he-goat came," ver. 5. This was Alexander the Great, the son of Philip, king of Macedonia; he came from the west, from Greece, which lay west from Persia. He fetched a great compass with his army; he came upon "the face of the whole earth." He did, in effect, conquer the world, and then sat down and wept because there was not another world to be conquered. Unus Pellæo juveni non sufficit orbis,—'One world was too little for the youth of Pellæ.' This he-goat (a creature famed for comeliness in going, Pr. xxx. 31,) went on with incredible swiftness, so that he "touched not the ground," so lightly did he move; he rather seemed to fly above the ground than to go upon the ground; or, 'none touched him in the earth,' that is, he met with little or no opposition. This he-goat, or buck, had a notable horn between his eyes, like a unicorn. He had strength, and knew his own strength; he saw himself a match for all his neighbours. Alexander pushed his conquests on so fast, and with so much fury, that none of the kingdoms he attacked had courage to make a stand, or give check to the progress of his victorious arms. In six years he made himself master of the greatest part of the then known world. Well might he be called a notable horn, for his name still lives in history as one of the most celebrated commanders in war that ever the world knew. Alexander's victories and achievements are still the entertainment of the ingenious. This he-goat came to the "ram that had two horns," ver. 6. Alexander, with his victorious army, attacked the kingdom of Persia, an army consisting of no more than thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse. He ran unto him, to surprise him ere he could get intelligence of his motions. "In the fury of his power" he came "close to the ram." Alexander, with his army, came up with Darius Codomannus, then emperor of Persia, being "moved with choler against him," ver. 7. It was with the greatest violence that Alexander pushed on his war against Darius, who, though he brought vast numbers into the field, yet, for want of conduct, was an unequal match for him; so that Alexander was too hard for him whenever he engaged him, "smote him, cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him," which three expressions, some think, refer to the three famous victories that Alexander obtained over Darius, at Granicus, at Issus, and at Arbela, by which he was at length totally routed, having in the last battle had six hundred thousand men killed,—so that Alexander became absolute master of all the Persian empire—broke his two horns, the kingdoms of Media and Persia. The ram, that had destroyed all before him, ver. 4, is now himself destroyed. Darius has no power to stand before Alexander, nor has he any friends or allies to help to deliver him out of his hand. Note, Those kingdoms that, when they had power, abused it, and, because none could oppose them, withheld not themselves from the doing of any wrong, may expect to have their power at length taken from them, and to be served in their own kind, Isa. xxxiii. 1.

4. He saw that he-goat made hereby very considerable, but the great horn that had done all this execution was broken, ver. 8. Alexander was about twenty years old when he began his wars. When he was about twenty-six he conquered Darius, and became master of the whole Persian empire; but when he was about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age, when he was strong, in his full strength, he was broken—not killed in war, in the bed of honour, but died of a drunken surfeit, or, as some suspect, by poison, and left no child living behind him to enjoy that which he had endlessly laboured for, but left a lasting monument of the vanity of worldly pomp and power, and their insufficiency to make a man happy.

5. He saw this kingdom divided into four parts, and that, instead of that one great horn, there came up "four notable ones,"—Alexander's four captains, to whom he bequeathed his conquests; and he had so much that, when it was divided among four, they had each of them enough for any one man. These four notable horns were towards the "four winds of heaven," the same with the four heads of the leopard, ch. vii. 6. The kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, Asia and Greece; Syria lying to the east, and Greece to the west, Asia Minor to the north, and Egypt to the south. Note, Those that heap up riches know not who shall gather them, nor whose all those things shall be which they have provided.

6. He saw a little horn that became a great persecutor of the church and people of God; and this was the principal thing that was intended to be shewed him in this vision, as afterwards, ch. xi. 30, &c. All agree that this was Antiochus Epiphanes, (so he called himself,) the illustrious; but others called him Antiochus Epimanes, Antiochus the furious. He is called here, as before, ch. vii. 8, a little horn, because he was in his original contemptible. There were others between him and the kingdom, and he was of a base, servile disposition, and had nothing in him of princely qualities, and had been for some time a hostage and prisoner at Rome, from whence he made his escape, and, though the youngest brother, and his elder living, got the kingdom. He waxed exceeding great "toward the south," for he seized upon Egypt; and "toward the east," for he invaded Persia and Armenia. But that which is here especially taken notice of is, the mischief that he did to the people of the Jews. They are not expressly named, for prophecies must not be too plain; but they are here described so that it would be easy for those who understood Scripture language to know who were meant; and the Jews, having notice of this before, might be awakened to prepare themselves and their children beforehand for these suffering, trying times.

1st. He set himself against "the pleasant land;" that is, the land of Israel, so called because it was the glory of all lands for fruitfulness, and all the delights of human life, but especially for the tokens of God's presence in it, and its being blessed with Divine revelations and institutions. It was mount Zion that was "beautiful for situation," and the "joy of the whole earth," Ps. xlviii. 2. The pleasantness of that land was, that there the Messiah was to be born, who would be both the consolation and the glory of his people Israel. Note, We have reason to reckon that a pleasant place which is a holy place, in which God dwells, and where we may have opportunity of communion with him. Surely "it is good to be here."

2nd. He fought against the host of heaven; that is, the people of God, the church, which is the kingdom of heaven, the church militant here on earth. The saints being born from above, and citizens of heaven, and doing the will of God, by his grace, in some measure, as the angels of heaven do it, may be well called a heavenly host. Or, the priests and Levites, who were employed in the service of the tabernacle, and there warred a good warfare, were this host of heaven. These Antiochus set himself against; he "waxed great to the host of heaven," in opposition to them, and in defiance of them.

3rd. He "cast down some of the host," that is, "of the stars," (for they are called the host of heaven,) "to the ground, and stamped upon them." Some of those that were most eminent both in church and state, that were burning and shining lights in their generation, he either forced to comply with his idolatries or put them to death. He got them into his hands, and then trampled upon them, and triumphed over them; as good old Eleazar and the seven brethren, whom he put to death with cruel tortures, because they would not eat swine's flesh, 2 Mac. vi. 7. He gloried in it, that herein he insulted Heaven itself, and "exalted his throne above the stars of God," Isa. xiv. 13.

4th. He "magnified himself even to the prince of the host." He set himself against the high priest Onias, whom he deprived of his dignity; or, rather, against God himself, who was Israel's king of old, who reigns for ever as Zion's king, who himself heads his own hosts that fight his battles. Against him Antiochus magnified himself; as Pharaoh, when he said, Who is the Lord? Note, Those who persecute the people of God persecute God himself.

5th. He took away "the daily sacrifice." The morning and evening lamb, which God appointed to be offered every day upon his altar to his honour, Antiochus forbade and restrained the offering of. No doubt he took away all other sacrifices; but the daily sacrifice only is mentioned, because that was the greatest loss of all other, for in that they kept up their constant communion with God, which they preferred before that which is only occasional. God's people reckon their daily sacrifice, their morning and evening exercises of devotion, to be the most needful of their daily business, and the most delightful of their daily comforts, and would not for all the world part with them.

6th. He cast down "the place of his sanctuary." He did not burn and demolish the temple, but he cast it down, when he profaned it, made it the temple of Jupiter Olympus, and set up his image in it. He also "cast down the truth to the ground," trampled upon the book of the law, that word of truth, tore it and burnt it, and did what he could to have destroyed it quite, that it might have been lost and forgotten for ever. These were the projects of that wicked prince. In these he practised; and—would you think it?—in these he prospered. He carried the matter very far, seemed to have gained his point, and went near to have extirpated that holy religion which God's right hand had planted.

But, lest he or any other should triumph, as if herein he had prevailed against God himself, and been too hard for him, the matter is here explained, and set in a true light. First. He could not have done this if God had not permitted him to do it; could have had no power against Israel unless it had been given him from above. God put this power into his hand, and gave him "an host against the daily sacrifice." God's providence put that sword into his hand by which he was enabled thus to bear down all before him. Note, We ought to eye and own the hand of God in all the enterprises and all the successes of the church's enemies against the church. They are but the rod in God's hand. Secondly. God would not have permitted it if his people had not provoked him to do so. It is by reason of transgression, the transgression of Israel, to correct them for that, that Antiochus is employed to give them all this trouble. Note, When the pleasant land, and all its pleasant things, are laid waste, it must be acknowledged that sin is the procuring cause of all the desolation. "Who gave Jacob to the spoil? Did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned?" Isa. xlii. 24. The great transgression of the Jews, after the captivity, (when they were cured of idolatry,) was a contempt and profanation of the holy things; snuffing at the service of God, "bringing the torn and the lame for sacrifice," as if the table of the Lord were a contemptible thing: so we find, Mal. i. 7, 8, &c., and that the priests were guilty of this, Mal. ii. 1, 8; and therefore God sent Antiochus to "take away the daily sacrifice, and cast down the place of his sanctuary." Note, It is just with God to deprive those of the privileges of his house that despise and profane them, and make them know the worth of ordinances by the want of them that would not know it by the enjoyment of them.

7. We heard the time of this calamity limited and determined. Not the time "when it should come," that is not here fixed, (because God would have his people always prepared for it,) but how long it should last, that, when they had no more any prophets to "tell them how long," (Ps. lxxiv. 9, which psalm seems to have been calculated for this dark and doleful day,) they might have this prophecy to give them a prospect of deliverance in due time. Now concerning this, we have here,

1st. The question asked concerning it, ver. 13. Observe, First. By whom the question was put. "I heard one saint speaking" to this purpose, and then another saint seconded him, O that we knew how long this trouble will last! The angels here are called saints, for they are holy ones, ch. iv. 13; the holy myriads, Jude 14. The angels concern themselves in the affairs of the church, and inquire concerning them; if, as here, concerning its temporal salvation, much more do they desire to look into the great salvation, 1 Pet. i. 12. One saint spoke of the thing, and another inquired concerning it. Thus John, that lay in Christ's bosom, was beckoned to by Peter to ask Christ a question, Jno. xiii. 23, 24. Secondly. To whom the question was put. He said, 'unto Palmoni that spake.' Some make this certain saint to be a superior angel that understood more than the rest, to whom, therefore, they came with their inquiries. Others make it to be the eternal Word, the Son of God. He is the unknown one. Palmoni seems to be compounded of Peloni Almoni, which is used, Ru. iv. 1, for 'Ho such a one;' and, 2 Kin. vi. 8, for 'such a place.' Christ was yet the nameless one; "Wherefore askest thou after my name, seeing it is secret?" Jud. xiii. 18. He is the 'numberer of secrets,' as some translate it, for from him there is nothing hid. 'The wonderful numberer,' so others. His name is called "Wonderful." Note, If we would know the mind of God, we must apply ourselves to Jesus Christ, who lay in the bosom of the Father, and "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," not hid from us, but hid for us. Thirdly. The question itself that was asked, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?" that is, how long shall the prohibition of it continue? How long shall the pleasant land be made unpleasant by that severe interdict? How long shall the "transgression of desolation," that is, the image of Jupiter, that great transgression which makes all our sacred things desolate, how long shall that stand in the temple? How long shall "the sanctuary and the host," the holy place, and the holy persons that minister in it, be trodden under foot by the oppression? Note, Angels are concerned for the prosperity of the church on earth, and desirous to see an end of its desolations. The angel asked for the satisfaction of Daniel, not doubting but he was desirous to know how long these calamities should last. The question takes it for granted that they should not last always. "The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous," though it may come upon their lot. Christ comforted himself in his sufferings with this, "The things concerning me have an end," Lu. xxii. 37, and so may the church in hers. But it is desirable to know how long they shall last, that we may provide accordingly.

2nd. The answer given to this question, ver. 14. Christ gives instruction to the holy angels, for they are our fellow-servants; but here the answer was given to Daniel, because for his sake the question was asked: "He said unto me." God sometimes gives in great favours to his people, in answer to the inquiries and requests of their friends for them. Now Christ assures him, First. That the trouble shall end; it shall continue "two thousand and three hundred days," and no longer. So many 'evenings and mornings,' so the word is, so many νυχθήμεραι, so many natural days, reckoned, as in the beginning of Genesis, by the evenings and mornings; because it was the evening and the morning sacrifice that they most lamented the loss of, and thought the time passed very slowly while they wanted them. Some make the morning and the evening in this number to stand for two, and then two thousand three hundred evenings, and as many mornings, will make but one thousand one hundred and fifty days; and about so many days it was that the daily sacrifice was interrupted. And this comes nearer to the computation, ch. vii. 26, of a "time, times, and the dividing of a time." But it is less forced to understand them of so many natural days. Two thousand three hundred days make six years and three months, and about eighteen days; and just so long they reckon from the defection of the people, procured by Menelaus the high priest, in the one hundred and forty-second year of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, the sixth month of that year, and the sixth day of the month, (so Josephus dates it,) to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the re-establishment of religion among them, which was in the one hundred and forty-eighth year, the ninth month, and the twenty-fifth day of the month, 1 Mac. iv. 52. God reckons the time of his people's affliction by days, for in all their afflictions he is afflicted; Rev. ii. 10, "Thou shalt have tribulation ten days." Secondly. He assures him that they should see better days after; "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Note, The cleansing of the sanctuary is a happy token for good to any people; when they begin to be reformed they will soon be relieved. Though the righteous God may, for the correction of his people, suffer his sanctuary to be profaned for awhile, yet the jealous God will for his own glory see to the cleansing of it in due time. Christ died to cleanse his church, and he will so cleanse it as at length to present it blameless to himself.

15 And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. 16 And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. 17 So he came near where I stood: and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision. 18 Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground: but he touched me, and set me upright. 19 And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be. 20 The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia.

21 And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. 22 Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. 23 And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. 24 And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. 25 And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand. 26 And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days. 27 And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.

Here is, First. Daniel's earnest desire to have this vision explained to him; ver. 15, "I sought the meaning." Note, Those that rightly know the things of God cannot but desire to know more and more of them, and to be led farther into the mystery of them. And those that would find the meaning of what they have seen or heard from God must seek it, and seek it diligently; "Seek and ye shall find." Daniel considered the thing, compared it with former discoveries, to try if he could understand it; but especially he sought by prayer, as he had done, ch. ii. 18, and he did not seek in vain.

Secondly. Orders given to the angel Gabriel to inform him concerning this vision. One in "the appearance of a man," who some think was Christ himself, for who but he could command angels? He orders Gabriel to make Daniel "understand this vision." Sometimes God is pleased to make use of the ministration of angels, not only to protect his children, but to instruct them; to serve the kind intentions not only of his providence, but of his grace.

Thirdly. The consternation that Daniel was in upon the approach of his instructor; ver. 17, "When he came near I was afraid." Though Daniel was a man of great prudence and courage, and had been conversant with the visions of the Almighty, yet the approach of an extraordinary messenger from heaven put him into this fright. He fell upon his face, not to worship the angel, but because he could no longer bear the dazzling lustre of his glory. Nay, being prostrate upon the ground, he fell into a deep sleep, ver. 18, which came not from any neglect of the vision, or indifferency towards it, but was the effect of his faintness, and the oppression of spirit he was under, through the abundance of revelations. The disciples in the garden slept for sorrow. And as there so here, the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak. Daniel would have kept awake, but could not.

Fourthly. The relief which the angel gave to Daniel, with great encouragement to him to expect a satisfactory discovery of the meaning of this vision. 1. He touched him, and set him upon his feet, ver. 18. Thus, when John, in a like case, was in a like consternation, Christ laid his right hand upon him, Rev. i. 17. It was a gentle touch that the angel here gave to Daniel, to shew that he came not to hurt him, not to "plead against him with his great power," or with a hand heavy upon him, but to help him, to "put strength into him," Job xxiii. 6, which God can do with a touch. When we are slumbering and grovelling on this earth we are very unfit to hear from God and to converse with him. But if God design instruction for us he will by his grace awaken us out of our slumber, raise us from things below, and set us upright. 2. He promiseth to inform him. "Understand, O son of man," ver. 17; that is, thou shalt understand if thou wilt but apply thy mind to understand. He calls him, Son of man, to intimate that he would consider his frame, and would deal tenderly with him, accommodating himself to his capacity as a man. Or, thus he preaches humility to him; though he be admitted to converse with angels he must not be puffed up with it, but must remember that he is a son of man. Or, perhaps this title puts an honour upon him; the Messiah was lately called the Son of man, ch. vii. 13, and Daniel is akin to him, is a figure of him as a prophet and one greatly beloved. He assures him that he shall be made to know "what shall be in the last end of the indignation," ver. 19. Let it be laid up for a comfort to those who shall live to see these calamitous times, that there shall be an end of them; "the indignation shall cease," Isa. x. 25; "it shall be overpast," Isa. xxvi. 20. It may intermit and return again, but the last end shall be glorious; good will follow it, nay, and good will be brought out of it. He tells him, ver. 17, "At the time of the end shall be the vision;" that is, when that last end of the indignation comes, when the course of this providence is completed, then the vision shall be made plain and intelligible by the event, as the event shall be made plain and intelligible by the vision. Or, "at the time of the end" of the Jewish church, in the latter days of it, shall this vision be accomplished, three or four hundred years hence; understand it therefore, that thou mayest leave it on record for the generations to come. But if he ask more particularly, When is the time of the end? and, How long to it? let this answer suffice, ver. 19, "At the time appointed the end shall be;" it is fixed in the Divine counsels, which cannot be altered, and which must not be pried into.

Fifthly. The exposition which he gave him of the vision.

1. Concerning the two monarchies of Persia and Greece, ver. 20—22. The ram signified the succession of the kings of Media and Persia. The rough goat signified the kings of Greece. The great horn was Alexander; the four horns that rose in his room were the four kingdoms into which his conquests were cantoned, of which before, ver. 8. They are said to "stand up out of the nations, but not in his power." None of them ever made the figure that Alexander did. Josephus relates, that when Alexander had taken Tyre, and subdued Palestine, and was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus, who was then high priest, (who is named in Neh. xii. 11,) fearing his rage, had recourse to God by prayer and sacrifice for the common safety, and was by him warned in a dream that upon Alexander's approach he should throw open the gates of the city, and that he and the rest of the priests should go forth to meet him in their habits, and all the people in white. Alexander, seeing this company at a distance, went himself alone to the high priest, and having prostrated himself before that God whose name was engraven in the golden plate of his mitre, he first saluted him; and being asked by one of his own captains why he did so, he said, that while he was yet in Macedon, musing on the conquest of Asia, there appeared to him a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of success in the conquest of it. The priests led him to the temple, where he offered sacrifice to the God of Israel, as they directed him; and there they shewed him this book of the prophet Daniel, that it was there foretold that a Grecian should come and destroy the Persians, which animated him very much in the expedition he was now meditating against Darius. Hereupon he took the Jews and their religion under his protection, promised to be kind to those of their religion in Babylon and Media, whither he was now marching, and in honour of him all the priests that had sons born that year called them Alexander: Joseph. lib. 11.

2. Concerning Antiochus, and his oppression of the Jews. This is said to be in the latter time of the kingdom of the Greeks, "when the transgressors are come to the full," ver. 23; that is, when the degenerate Jews have filled up the measure of their iniquity, and are ripe for this destruction, so that God cannot in honour bear with them any longer, then shall stand up this king, to be flagellum Dei,—'the rod in God's hand' for the chastising of the Jews. Now observe here,

1st. His character. He shall be a "king of fierce countenance," insolent and furious, neither fearing God nor regarding man, "understanding dark sentences," or rather, versed in dark practices, the hidden things of dishonesty. He was master of all the arts of dissimulation and deceit, and knew the depths of Satan as well as any man. He was wise to do evil.

3rd. His success. He shall make dreadful havoc of the nations about him; "His power shall be mighty," bear down all before it; but "not by his own power," ver. 24, but partly by the assistance of his allies, Eumenes and Attalus, partly by the baseness and treachery of many of the Jews, even of the priests that came into his interests, and especially by the Divine permission. It was not by his own power, but by a power given him from above, that he destroyed wonderfully, and thought he made himself a great man by being a great destroyer. He destroys wonderfully, indeed, for he destroys, First. The mighty people, and they cannot resist him by their power. The princes of Egypt cannot stand before him with all their forces, but he practiseth against them and prospereth. Note, The mighty ones of the earth commonly meet with those, at length, that are too hard for them, that are more mighty than they. Let not the strong man, then, glory in his strength, be it never so great, unless he could be sure there were none stronger than he. Secondly. He destroys the "holy people," or, the people of the holy ones, and their sacred character doth neither deter him from destroying them nor defend them from being destroyed. All things come alike to all, and there is one event to the mighty and to the holy in this world.

3rd. The methods by which he will gain this success. Not by true courage, wisdom, or justice, but by his policy and craft, ver. 25; by fraud and deceit, and serpentine subtlety; he shall "cause craft to prosper;" so cunningly shall he carry on his projects, that he shall gain his point by the art of wheedling. "By peace he shall destroy many," as others do by war; under the pretence of treaties, leagues, and alliances with them, he shall encroach on their rights, and trick them into a subjection to him. Thus, sometimes, what a nation truly brave has gained in a righteous war a nation truly base has regained in a treacherous peace, and craft has been caused to prosper.

4th. The mischief that he shall do to religion. "He shall magnify himself in his heart," and think himself fit to prescribe and give law to every body, so that he shall "stand up against the Prince of princes;" that is, against God himself. He will profane his temple and altar, prohibit his worship, and persecute his worshippers. See what a height of impudence some men's impiety brings them to; they openly bid defiance to God himself, though he is the King of kings.

5th. The ruin that he shall be brought to at last. "He shall be broken without hand;" that is, without the hand of man. He shall not be slain in war, nor shall he be assassinated, as tyrants commonly were; but he shall fall into the hands of the living God, and die by an immediate stroke of his vengeance. He, hearing that the Jews had cast the image of Jupiter Olympus out of the temple, where he had placed it, was so enraged at the Jews, that he vowed he would make Jerusalem a common burying-place, and determined to march thither immediately. But no sooner had he spoken these proud words but he was struck with an incurable plague in his bowels, worms bred so fast in his body that whole flakes of flesh sometimes dropped from him; his torments were violent, and the stench of his disease such that none could endure to come near him. He continued in this misery very long. At first he persisted in his menaces against the Jews; but at length, despairing of his recovery, he called his friends together, and acknowledged all those miseries to have fallen upon him for the injuries he had done to the Jews, and his profaning the temple at Jerusalem; then he wrote courteous letters to the Jews, and vowed that if he recovered he would let them have the free exercise of their religion. But, finding his disease grow upon him, when he could no longer endure his own smell, he said, 'It is meet to submit to God, and for man, which is mortal, not to set himself in competition with God;' and so died miserably in a strange land, on the mountains of Pacata, near Babylon, (so Usher's Annals,) A.M. 3840, about one hundred and sixty years before the birth of Christ.

3. As to the time fixed for the continuance of the cessation of the daily sacrifice, it is not explained here, but only confirmed, ver. 26. That "vision of the evening and morning is true," in the proper sense of the words, and needs no explication. How unlikely soever it might be that God should suffer his own sanctuary to be thus profaned, yet it is true, it is too true, so it shall be.

Sixthly. Here is the conclusion of this vision; and here,

1. The charge given to Daniel to keep it private for the present. "Shut thou up the vision;" let it not be publicly known among the Chaldeans, lest the Persians, who were now shortly to possess the kingdom, should be incensed against the Jews by it, because the downfall of their kingdom was foretold by it, which would be unseasonable now the edict for their release was expected from the king of Persia. Shut it up, for "it shall be for many days;" it was about three hundred years from the time of this vision to the time of the accomplishment of it, therefore he must shut it up for the present, even from the people of the Jews, lest it should amaze and perplex them; but let it be kept safe for the generations to come, that should live about the time of the accomplishment of it, for to them it would be both most intelligible and most serviceable. Note, What we know of the things of God should be carefully laid up, that hereafter, when there is occasion, it may be faithfully laid out; and what we have not now any use for yet we may have another time. Divine truths should be sealed up among our treasures, that we may find them again after many days.

2. The care he took to keep it private, having received such a charge, ver. 27. He "fainted, and was sick," with the multitude of his thoughts within him, occasioned by this vision, which oppressed and overwhelmed him the more because he was forbidden to publish what he had seen, so that "his belly was as wine which has no vent;" he was "ready to burst like new bottles," Job xxxii. 19. However, he kept it to himself, stifled and smothered the concern he was in, so that those he conversed with could not perceive it; but he "did the king's business" according to the duty of his place, whatever it was. Note, As long as we live in this world we must have something to do in it; and those whom God has most dignified with his favours yet must not think themselves above their business; nor must the pleasure of communion with God take us off from the duties of our particular callings, but still we must in them abide with God. Those especially that are intrusted with public business must see to it that they conscientiously discharge their trust.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's prayer for the restoration of the Jews who were now in captivity, in which he confesseth sin, acknowledgeth the justice of God in their calamities, but pleads God's promises of mercy which he had yet in store for them, ver. 1—19. II. An immediate answer sent him by an angel to his prayer, in which, 1. He is assured of the discharge of the Jews out of their captivity presently, ver. 20—23; and, 2. Is informed concerning the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ, of which that was a type, what should be the nature of it, and when it should be accomplished, ver. 24—27; and it is the clearest, brightest prophecy of the Messiah in all the Old Testament.

IN the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans; 2 In the first year of his reign I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. 3 And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes:

We left Daniel, in the close of the foregoing chapter, employed in the king's business, but here we have him employed in better business than any the king had for him, speaking to God and hearing from him, not for himself only, but for the church, whose mouth he was to God, and for whose use the oracles of God were committed to him, relating to the days of the Messiah. Observe,

First. When it was that Daniel had this communion with God; ver. 1, "In the first year of Darius" the Mede, who was newly made king of the Chaldeans, Babylon being conquered by him and his nephew, or grandson, Cyrus. In this year the seventy years of the Jewish captivity ended, but the decree for their release was not yet issued out, so that this address of Daniel's to God seems to have been ready in that year, and probably before he was cast into the lions' den. And one powerful inducement, perhaps, it was to him then to stick so close to the duty of prayer, though it cost him his life, that he had so lately experienced the benefit and comfort of it.

Secondly. What occasioned his address to God by prayer, ver. 2. He "understood by books" that seventy years was the time fixed for the continuance of "the desolations of Jerusalem," ver. 2. The book by which he understood this was the book of the prophecies of Jeremiah, in which he found it expressly foretold, Jer. xxix. 10, "After seventy years be accomplished in Babylon," (and therefore they must be reckoned from the first captivity, in the third year of Jehoiakim, which Daniel had reason to remember by a good token, for it was in that captivity that he was carried away himself, ch. i. 1,) "I will visit you, and perform my good works towards you." It was likewise said, Jer. xxv. 11, "This whole land shall be seventy years a desolation," chorbath, the same word that Daniel here useth for the desolations of Jerusalem, which shews he had that prophecy before him when he wrote this. Though Daniel was himself a great prophet, and one that was well acquainted with the visions of God, yet he was a diligent student in the Scripture, and thought it no disparagement to him to consult Jeremiah's prophecies. He was a great politician and prime minister of state to one of the greatest monarchs upon earth, and yet could find both heart and time to converse with the word of God. The greatest and best men in the world must not think themselves above their Bibles.

Thirdly. How serious and solemn his address to God was, when he understood that the seventy years were just upon expiring, (for it appears by Ezekiel's dating of his prophecies that they exactly computed the years of their captivity,) then he set his face to seek God by prayer. Note, God's promises are intended not to supersede but to excite and encourage our prayers; and when we see the day of the performance of them approaching, we should the more earnestly plead them with God and put them in suit. So Daniel did here; he prayed three times a day, and no doubt in every prayer made mention of the desolations of Jerusalem; yet he did not think that enough, but even in the midst of his business set time apart for an extraordinary application to heaven on Jerusalem's behalf. God had said to Ezekiel, that though Daniel, among others, stood before him, his intercession should not prevail to prevent the judgment, Eze. xiv. 14, yet he hopes, now "the warfare is accomplished," Isa. xl. 2, his prayer may be heard for the removing of the judgment. When the day of deliverance dawns it is time for God's praying people to bestir themselves; something extraordinary is then expected and required from them besides their daily sacrifice. Now Daniel sought, "by prayer and supplications," for fear lest the sins of the people should provoke him to defer their deliverance longer than was intended; or, rather, that the people might be prepared, by the grace of God, for the deliverance, now the providence of God was about to work it out for them. Now observe, 1. The intenseness of his mind in this prayer; "I set my face unto the Lord God to seek him," which notes the fixedness of his thoughts, the firmness of his faith, and the fervour of his devout affections in the duty. We must in prayer set God before us, and set ourselves as in his presence; to him we must direct our prayer, and must look up. Probably, in token of his setting his face towards God, he did, as usual, set his face towards Jerusalem, to affect his own heart the more with the desolations of it. 2. The mortification of his body in this prayer. In token of his deep humiliation before God, for his own sins and the sins of his people, and the sense he had of his unworthiness, when he prayed he fasted, put on sackcloth, and lay in ashes, the more to affect himself with the desolations of Jerusalem, which he was praying for the repair of, and to make himself sensible that he was now about an extraordinary work.

4 And I prayed unto the LORD my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments; 5 We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments: 6 Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land. 7 O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee. 8 O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. 9 To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him; 10 Neither have we obeyed the voice of the LORD our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets. 11 Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him. 12 And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for under the whole heaven hath not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem. 13 As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us: yet made we not our prayer before the LORD our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth. 14 Therefore hath the LORD watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us: for the LORD our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth: for we obeyed not his voice. 15 And now, O Lord our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. 16 O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain: because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become a reproach to all that are about us. 17

Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. 18 O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold our desolations, and the city which is called by thy name: for we do not present our supplications before thee for our righteousnesses, but for thy great mercies. 19 O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name.

We have here Daniel's prayer to God, as his God, and the confession which he joined with that prayer, "I prayed and made my confession." Note, In every prayer we must make confession not only of the sins we have been guilty of, which we commonly call confession, but of our faith in God and dependence upon him, our sorrow for sin, and our resolutions against it. It must be our confession, must be the language of our own convictions, and that which we ourselves do heartily subscribe to.

Let us go over the several parts of this prayer, which we have reason to think he offered up much larger than is here recorded, and that these are only the heads of it.

First. Here is his humble, serious, reverent address to God, in which he gives glory to God, 1. As a God to be feared, and whom it is our duty always to stand in awe of; "O Lord, the great and dreadful God," that art able to deal with the greatest and most terrible of the church's enemies! 2. As a God to be trusted, and whom it is our duty to depend upon and put a confidence in; "keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him," and, as a proof of their love to him, "keep his commandments." If we do our part of the bargain he will not fail to do his. He will be to his people as good as his word, for he keeps covenant with them, and not one iota of his promise shall fall to the ground; nay, he will be better than his word, for he keeps mercy to them something more than was in the covenant. It was proper for Daniel to have his eye upon God's mercy, now he was to lay before him the miseries of his people; and upon God's covenant, now he was to sue for the performance of a promise. Note, We should, in prayer, look both at God's greatness and his goodness, his majesty and mercy in conjunction.

Secondly. Here is a penitent confession of sin, the procuring cause of all the calamities which his people had for so many years been groaning under, ver. 5, 6. When we seek to God for national mercies we ought to humble ourselves before him for national sins. These are the sins Daniel here laments; and it is observable what variety of words he makes use of to set forth the greatness of their provocations, for it becomes penitents to lay loads upon themselves; "We have sinned" in many particular instances, nay, we "have committed iniquity," we have driven a trade of sin, we "have done wickedly" with a hard heart and a stiff neck, and herein we have rebelled, have taken up arms against the King of kings, his crown and dignity. Two things aggravated their sins:

1. That they had violated the express laws God had given them by Moses. We have "departed from thy precepts and from thy judgments," and have not conformed to them; and, ver. 10, We have not "obeyed the voice of the Lord our God." That which speaks the nature of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, doth sufficiently speak the malignity of it. If sin be made to appear sin, it cannot be made to appear worse; its sinfulness is its greatest hatefulness, Rom. vii. 13. God has set his laws before us plainly and fully, as the copy we should write after, yet we have not walked in them, but turned aside, or turned back.

2. That they had slighted the fair warnings God had given them by the prophets, which in every age he had sent to them, "rising up betimes and sending them," ver. 6. "We have not hearkened to thy servants the prophets," who have put us in mind of thy laws and of thy sanctions of them; though they "spake in thy name," we have not regarded them; though they delivered their message faithfully, with a universal respect to all orders and degrees of men, to our kings and princes, whom they had the courage and confidence to speak to, to our fathers, and to all the people of the land whom they had the condescension and compassion to speak to, yet we have not hearkened to them, not heard them, or not heeded them, or not complied with them. Mocking God's messengers, and despising his words, were Jerusalem's measure-filling sins, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16. This confession of sin is repeated here, and much insisted on; penitents should again and again accuse and reproach themselves, till they find their hearts thoroughly broken. "All Israel have transgressed thy law," ver. 11. It is Israel, God's professing people, that have known better, and from whom better is expected—Israel, God's peculiar people, whom he has surrounded with his favours; not here and there one, but it is all Israel, the generality of them, the body of the people, that has transgressed by departing, and getting out of the way, that they might not hear, and so might not obey thy voice. This disobedience is that which all true penitents do most sensibly charge upon themselves; ver. 14, "We obeyed not his voice;" and, ver. 15, "We have sinned, we have done wickedly." Those that would find mercy must thus confess their sins.

Thirdly. Here is a self-abasing acknowledgment of the righteousness of God in all the judgments that were brought upon them. And it is evermore the way of true penitents thus to justify God, that he may be clear when he judgeth, and the sinner may bear all the blame.

1. He acknowledgeth that it was sin that plunged them in all these troubles. Israel is dispersed through all the countries about, and so weakened, impoverished, and exposed. God's hand has driven him hither and thither, some near where they are known, and therefore the more ashamed, others afar off, where they are not known, and therefore the more abandoned; and it is "because of their trespass that they have trespassed," ver. 7. They mingled themselves with the nations, that they might be debauched by them; and now God mingles them with the nations, that they may be stripped by them.

2. He owns the righteousness of God in it, that he had done them no wrong in all he had brought upon them, but had dealt with them as they deserved; ver. 7, "O Lord, righteousness belongeth to thee." We have no fault to find with thy providence, no exceptions to make against thy judgments; for, ver. 14, "The Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doth," even in these sore calamities we are now under, for we obeyed not the words of his mouth, and therefore justly feel the weight of his hand. This seems to be borrowed from Lam. i. 18.

3. He takes notice of the fulfilling of the Scripture in what was brought upon them. In very faithfulness he afflicted them, for it was according to the word which he had spoken; "The curse is poured upon us, and the oath;" that is, the curse that was ratified by an oath in the law of Moses, ver. 11. This farther justifies God in his troubles, that he did but inflict the penalty of the law, and which he had given them fair notice of. It was necessary for the preserving of the honour of God's veracity, and saving his government from contempt, that the threatenings of his word should be accomplished, otherwise they look but as bugbears; nay, they seem not at all frightful. Therefore "he hath confirmed his words which he spake against us," because we broke his laws, "and against our judges that judged" us, because they did not, according to the duty of their place, punish the breach of God's laws. He told them many a time that if they did not execute justice, as terrors to evil-workers, he must and would take the work into his own hands. And now he has confirmed what he said, "by bringing upon us a great evil," in which the princes and judges themselves deeply shared. Note, It contributes very much to our profiting by the judgments of God's hand to observe how exactly they agree with the judgments of his mouth.

4. He aggravates the calamities they were in, lest they should seem, having been long used to them, to make light of them, and so to lose the benefit of the chastening of the Lord by despising it. It is not some of the common troubles of life that we are complaining of, but that which has in it some special marks of Divine displeasure; "for under the whole heaven has not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem," ver. 12. It is Jeremiah's lamentation, in the name of the church, "Was ever sorrow like unto my sorrow?" which must suppose another like question, Was ever sin like unto my sin?

5. He puts shame upon the whole nation, from the highest to the lowest, and if they will say Amen to his prayer, as it was fit they should, if they would come in for a share in the benefit of it, they must all put their hand upon their mouth, and their mouth in the dust; to us belong "confusion of face, as at this day," ver. 7. We lie under the shame of the punishment at this day, and we ought to accommodate ourselves to it, and to accept of the punishment of our iniquity, for shame is our due. If Israel had retained their character, and had continued a holy people, they had been "high above all nations in praise, and name, and honour," Deu. xxvi. 19. But now they have "sinned and done wickedly," confusion and disgrace belong to them, to "the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," the inhabitants both of the country and the city, for they have been all alike guilty before God; it belongs to all Israel, both to the two tribes that are near by the rivers of Babylon, and to the ten tribes that are afar off in the land of Assyria. Confusion belongs not only to the common people of our land, but to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, ver. 8, who should set a better example, and have used their authority and influence for the checking of the threatening torrent of vice and profaneness.

6. He imputes the continuance of the judgment to their incorrigibleness under it; ver. 13, 14, "All this evil is come upon us," and has lain long upon us, "yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God," not in a right manner, as we should have made it, "with an humble, lowly, penitent, and obedient heart." We have been smitten, but have not returned to him that smote us; 'we have not intreated the face of the Lord our God,' so the word is; we have taken no care to make our peace with God, and reconcile ourselves to him. Daniel set his brethren a good example of praying continually, but he was sorry to see how few there were that followed his example. In their affliction it was expected they would seek God early, but they sought him not, that they might "turn from their iniquities, and understand his truth." The errand upon which afflictions are sent is, to bring men to turn from their iniquities, and to understand God's truth; so Elihu had explained them, Job xxxvi. 10. God, by them, "opens men's ears to discipline, and commandeth that they turn from iniquity." And if men were brought rightly to understand God's truth, and to submit to the power and authority of it, they would turn from the error of their ways. Now the first step towards this is, to "make our prayer before the Lord our God," that the affliction may be sanctified before it is removed, and that the grace of God may go along with the providence of God, to make it answer the end. Those that in their affliction make not their prayer to God, that cry not when he bindeth them, are not likely to turn from iniquity, or to understand his truth. Therefore, because we have not improved the affliction, "the Lord hath watched upon the evil," as the judge takes care that execution be done according to the sentence; because we have not been melted, he hath kept us still in the furnace, and watched over it, to make the heat yet more intense; for when God judgeth he will overcome, and will be justified in all his proceedings.

Fourthly. Here is a believing appeal to the mercy of God, and to the ancient tokens of his favour to Israel, and the concern of his own glory in their interests.

1. It is some comfort to them, (and not a little,) that God has been always ready to pardon sin; ver. 9, "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses." This refers to that proclamation of his name, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7, "The Lord God, gracious and merciful, forgiving iniquity." Note, It is very encouraging to poor sinners that mercies belong to God, as it is convincing and humbling to them that righteousness belongs to him; and they who give him the glory of his righteousness may take to themselves the comfort of his mercies, Ps. lxii. 12. There are abundant mercies in God, and not only forgiveness but forgivenesses; he is a God of pardon, Neh. ix. 17; he multiplies to pardon, Isa. lv. 7, "Though we have rebelled against him," yet with him there is mercy, pardoning mercy, even for the rebellious.

2. It is likewise a support to them to think that God had formerly glorified himself by delivering them out of Egypt; so far he looks back for the encouragement of his faith; ver. 15, "Thou hast" formerly "brought thy people out of Egypt with a mighty hand," and wilt thou not now with the same mighty hand bring them out of Babylon? Were they then formed into a people? and shall they not now be reformed, and newly formed? Are they now sinful and unworthy? and were they not so then? Are their oppressors now mighty and haughty? and were they not so then? And hath not God said, that their deliverance out of Babylon shall outshine even that out of Egypt? Jer. xvi. 14, 15. The force of this plea lies in that, "Thou hast gotten thee renown," hast "made thee a name," so the word is, "as at this day," that is, even to this day, by bringing us out of Egypt; and wilt thou lose the credit of that, by letting us perish in Babylon? Didst thou get a renown by that deliverance we have so often commemorated, and wilt thou not now get thee a renown by this which we have so often prayed for, and so long waited for?

Fifthly. Here is a pathetical complaint of the reproach that God's people lay under, and the ruins that God's sanctuary lay in, both which redounded very much to the dishonour of God, and the diminution of that name and renown which God had gained by bringing them out of Egypt.

1. God's holy people were despised. By their "sins and the iniquities of their fathers" they had profaned their crown, and made themselves despicable; and then, though they are in name and profession God's people, and upon that account truly great and honourable, yet they are become a "reproach to all that are round about them." Their neighbours laugh them to scorn, and triumph in their disgrace. Note, Sin is a reproach to any people, but especially to God's people, that have more eyes upon them, and have more honour to lose, than other people.

2. God's holy place was desolate. Jerusalem the holy city was a reproach, ver. 16; when it lay in ruins it was an astonishment and a hissing to all that passed by. The sanctuary, the holy house, was desolate, ver. 17; the altars demolished, and all the buildings laid in ashes. Note, The desolations of the sanctuary are the grief of all the saints, who reckon all their comforts in this world buried in the ruins of the sanctuary.

Sixthly. Here is an importunate request to God for the restoring of the poor captive Jews to their former enjoyments again. The petition is very pressing, for God gives us leave in prayer to wrestle with him; "O Lord, I beseech thee," ver. 16. If ever thou wilt do any thing for me, do this; it is my heart's desire and prayer. "Now, therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplication," ver. 17, and grant an answer of peace to it. Now what are his petitions? what are his requests?

1. That God would turn away his wrath from them,—that is it which all the saints dread and deprecate more than any thing; O let "thine anger be turned away from thy Jerusalem, thy holy mountain," ver. 16. He doth not pray for the turning again of their captivity,—let the Lord do with them as seemeth good in his eyes; but they pray first for the turning away of God's wrath. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

2. That he would lift up the light of his countenance upon them; ver. 17, "Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate," that is, return in mercy to us and shew that thou art reconciled to us, and then all shall be well. Note, The shining of God's face upon the desolations of the sanctuary is all in all towards the repair of it, and upon that foundation it must be rebuilt. If, therefore, its friends would begin their work at the right end, they must first be earnest with God in prayer for his favour, and recommend his desolate sanctuary to his smiles. "Cause thy face to shine, and then we shall be saved," Ps. lxxx. 3.

3. That he would forgive their sins, and then hasten their deliverance; ver. 19, "O Lord hear, O Lord forgive." That the mercy prayed for may be granted in mercy, let the sin that threatens to come between us and it be removed; "O Lord, hearken and do." Not hearken and speak only, but hearken and do; do that for us which none else can, and that speedily; "defer not, O my God." Now he saw the appointed day approaching he could in faith pray that God would make haste to them, and not defer. David often prays, "Make haste, O God, to help me."

Seventhly. Here are several pleas and arguments to enforce the petitions. God gives us leave not only to pray, but to plead with him; which is not to move him,—he himself knows what he will do,—but to move ourselves, to excite our fervency and encourage our faith.

1. They disdain a dependence upon any righteousness of their own, they pretend not to merit any thing at God's hand but wrath and the curse; ver. 18, "We do not present our supplications before thee," with hope to speed for our righteousness, as if we were worthy to receive thy favour for any good in us, or done by us, or could demand any thing as a debt; we cannot insist upon our own justification, no, though we were more righteous than we are; nay, though we knew nothing amiss by ourselves, yet are we not thereby justified, nor would we answer, but we would make supplication to our Judge. Moses had told Israel long before, that, whatever God did for them, it was not for their righteousness, Deu. ix. 4, 5. And Ezekiel had of late told them that their return out of Babylon would be "not for their sakes," Eze. xxxvi. 22, 32. Note, Whenever we come to God for mercy we must lay aside all conceit of, and confidence in, our own righteousness.

2. They take their encouragement in prayer from God only, as knowing that his reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself; and, therefore, from him we must borrow all our pleas for mercy, and so give honour to him when we are suing for grace and mercy from him. 1st. Do it "for thine own sake," ver. 19; for the accomplishment of thine own counsel, the performance of thine own promise, and the manifestation of thine own glory. Note, God will do his own work, not only in his own way and time, but for his own sake; and so we must take it. 2nd. Do it "for the Lord's sake;" that is, for the Lord Christ's sake, for the sake of the Messiah promised, who is the Lord: so the most and best of our Christian interpreters understand it. For the sake of Adonai, so David called the Messiah, Ps. cx. 1. And mercy is prayed for, for the church, for the sake of the Son of man, Ps. lxxx. 17, and "for thy word's sake," 2 Sam. vii. 21. Note, Christ is the Lord, he is Lord of all; it is for his sake that God causeth his face to shine upon sinners, when they repent and turn to him, because of the satisfaction he has made. In all our prayers, that therefore must be our plea, we must "make mention of his righteousness, even of his only," Ps. lxxi. 16; "Look upon the face of thy anointed." He has himself directed us to ask in his name. 3rd. Do it "according to all thy righteousness," ver. 16; that is, plead for us against our persecutors and oppressors according to thy righteousness. Though we are ourselves unrighteous before God, yet with reference to them we have a righteous cause, which we leave it with the righteous God to appear in the defence of. Or rather, by the righteousness of God here is meant his faithfulness to his promise. God had according to his righteousness executed the threatening, ver. 11. Now, Lord, wilt thou not do according to all thy righteousness? Wilt thou not be as true to thy promises as thou hast been to thy threatenings, and accomplish them also? 4th. Do it "for thy great mercies," ver. 18; to make it to appear that thou art a merciful God. The good things we ask of God we call mercies, because we expect them purely from God's mercy. And because misery is the proper object of mercy, the prophet here spreads the deplorable condition of the church before God, as it were to move his compassion; "Open thine eyes, and behold our desolations," especially the desolations of the sanctuary. O look with pity upon a piteous case! Note, The desolations of the church must in prayer be laid before God, and then left with him. 5th. Do it for the sake of the relation we stand in to them. The sanctuary that is desolate is thy sanctuary, ver. 17; dedicated to thine honour, employed in thy service, and the place of thy residence. Jerusalem is thy city, and thy holy mountain, ver. 16; it is "the city that is called by thy name," ver. 18; it was the city which God had "chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there." The people that are become a reproach are thy people, and thy name suffers in the reproach cast upon them, ver. 16; they are "called by thy name," ver. 19. Lord, thou hast a property in them, and therefore are interested in their interests; wilt thou not provide for thine own, for those of thine own house? They are thine, save them, Ps. cxix. 94.

20 And whiles I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the LORD my God for the holy mountain of my God; 21 Yea, whiles I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. 22 And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. 23 At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to shew thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision. 24 Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy. 25 Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. 26 And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. 27 And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.

We have here the answer that was immediately sent to Daniel's prayer; and it is a very memorable one, as it contains the most illustrious prediction of Christ and gospel grace that is extant in all the Old Testament. If John Baptist was the morning star, this was the day-break to the Sun of righteousness; "the dayspring from on high." Here is,

First. The time when this answer was given.

1. It was while Daniel was at prayer. This he observed, and laid a mighty emphasis upon: "While I was speaking," ver. 20; yea, "whiles I was speaking in prayer," ver. 21; before he rose from his knees, and while there was yet more which he intended to say. He mentions the two heads he chiefly insisted upon in prayer, and which perhaps he designed yet farther to enlarge upon. 1st. He was confessing sin, and lamenting that, both "my sin," and "the sin of my people Israel." Daniel was a very great and good man, and yet he finds sin of his own to confess before God, and is ready to confess it; for there is not a just man upon earth that doth good, and sins not, nor that sins, and repents not. St. John puts himself into the number of those who deceive themselves, if they say they have no sin, and who therefore confess their sins, 1 Jno. i. 8. Good men find it an ease to their consciences to pour out their complaints before the Lord against themselves, and that is confessing sin. He also confessed the sin of his people, and bewailed that. Those who are heartily concerned for the glory of God, and the welfare of the church, and the souls of men, will mourn for others' sins as well as for their own. 2nd. He was "making supplications before the Lord his God," and presenting it to him as an intercessor for Israel; and in this prayer his concern was for "the holy mountain of his God," mount Zion. The desolations of the sanctuary lay nearer his heart than those of the city and the land; and the repair of that, and the setting up the public worship of the God of Israel again, was what he had in view in the deliverance he was preparing for, more than the re-establishment of their civil interests. Now while Daniel was thus employed, First. He had a grant made him of the mercy he prayed for. Note, God is very ready to hear prayer, and to give an answer of peace. Now was fulfilled what God had spoken, Isa. lxv. 24, "While they are yet speaking, I will hear." Daniel grew very fervent in prayer, and his affections were very strong, ver. 18, 19. And "while he was speaking" with such fervour and ardency, the angel came to him with a gracious answer. God is well pleased with lively devotions. We cannot now expect that God should send us answers to our prayer by angels; but if we pray with fervency for that which God hath promised we may by faith take the promise as an immediate answer to the prayer; for "he is faithful that has promised." Secondly. He had a discovery made him of a far greater and more glorious redemption which God would work out for his church in the latter days. Note, Those that would be brought acquainted with Christ and his grace must be much in prayer.

2. It was "about the time of the evening oblation," ver. 21. The altar was in ruins, and there was no oblation offered upon it; but it should seem the pious Jews in their captivity were daily thoughtful of the time when it should have been offered, and at that hour were ready to weep at the remembrance of it, and desired and hoped that their prayer should be "set forth before God as incense," and the "lifting up of their hands," and their hearts with their hands, should be acceptable in his sight as the evening sacrifice, Ps. cxli. 2. The evening oblation was a type of the great sacrifice which Christ was to offer in the evening of the world; and it was in the virtue of that sacrifice that Daniel's prayer was accepted, when he prayed "for the Lord's sake," and for the sake of that this glorious discovery of redeeming love was made to him; the Lamb opened the seals in the virtue of his own blood.

Secondly. The messenger by whom this answer was sent. It was not given him in a dream, or by a voice from heaven; but, for the greater certainty and solemnity of it, an angel was sent on purpose, appearing in human shape, to give this answer to Daniel. Observe,

1. Who this angel or messenger was. It was the man Gabriel: if Michael the archangel be, as many suppose, no other than Jesus Christ, this Gabriel is the only created angel that is named in Scripture; Gabriel signifies, 'the mighty one of God;' for the angels are "great in power and might," 2 Pet. ii. 11. It was he "whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning." Daniel heard him called by his name, and thence learned it, ch. viii. 18; and, though then he trembled at his approach, yet he observed him so carefully that now he knew him again, knew him to be the same that he had seen at the beginning; and, being somewhat better acquainted with him, was not now so terrified at the sight of him as he had been at first. When this angel said to Zacharias, "I am Gabriel," Lu. i. 19, he intended thereby to put him in mind of this notice which he had given to Daniel of the Messiah's coming, when it was at a distance, for the confirming of his faith, in the notice he was then about to give of it, as at the door.

2. The instructions which this messenger received from the Father of lights to whom David prayed; ver. 23, "At the beginning of thy supplications" the word, "the commandment, came forth" from God. Notice was given to the angels in heaven of this counsel of God, which they were desirous to look into, and orders given to Gabriel to go immediately and bring the notice of it to Daniel. By this it appears it was not any thing Daniel said that moved God, for the answer was given as he began to pray; but God was well pleased with his serious, solemn address to the duty, and in token of that sent him this gracious message. Or, perhaps it was "at the beginning of Daniel's supplications," that Cyrus's word or commandment went forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, that going forth spoken of, ver. 25. The thing is done this very day; the proclamation of liberty to the Jews is signed this morning, just then when thou wast praying for it; and now at the close of this fast day Daniel has notice of it, as at the close of the day of atonement the jubilee trumpet sounded to proclaim liberty.

3. The haste he made to deliver his message. He was "caused to fly swiftly," ver. 21. Angels are winged messengers, quick in their motions, and delay not to execute the orders they receive; they run and "return like a flash of lightning," Eze. i. 14. But it should seem sometimes they are more expeditious than at other times, and make a quicker dispatch, as here the angel was "caused to fly swiftly," that is, he was ordered and he was enabled to fly swiftly. Angels do their work in obedience to Divine command, and in dependence upon Divine strength. Though they excel in wisdom, they fly swifter or slower, as God directs; and though they excel in power, they fly but as God causeth them to fly. Angels themselves are to us what he makes them to be; they are his ministers, and do his pleasure, Ps. ciii. 21.

4. The prefaces or introductions to his message. 1st. He "touched him," ver. 22; as before, ch. viii. 18; not to awaken him out of sleep, as then, but to give him a hint to break off his prayer, and to attend to that which he has to say in answer to it. Note, In order to the keeping up of our communion with God, we must not only be forward to speak to God, but as forward to hear what he has to say to us; when we have prayed, we must look up, must look after our prayers, must set ourselves upon our watch tower. 2nd. He "talked with him," ver. 22; talked familiarly with him, as one friend talks with another, that his terror might not make him afraid. He informed him on what errand he came, that he was sent from heaven on purpose with a kind message to him; "I am come to shew thee," ver. 23; to tell thee that which thou didst not know before. He had shewed him the troubles of the church under Antiochus, and the period of those troubles, ch. viii. 19, but now he has greater things to shew him; for he that is faithful in a little shall be intrusted with more. Nay, "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding," ver. 22; not only to shew thee these things, but to make thee understand them. 3rd. He assures him he was a favourite of heaven, else he had not had this intelligence sent him, and he must take it as a favour; "I am come to shew thee, for thou art greatly beloved;" thou art "a man of desires," acceptable to God, and whom he has a favour for. Note, Though God loves all his children, yet there are some that are more than the rest greatly beloved. Christ had one disciple that lay in his bosom, and that beloved disciple was he that was intrusted with the prophetical visions of the New Testament, as Daniel was with those of the Old. For what greater token can there be of God's favour to any man than for the secrets of the Lord to be with him? Abraham is the friend of God, and therefore "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Gen. xviii. 17. Note, Those may reckon themselves greatly beloved of God to whom, and in whom, he reveals his Son. Some observe that the title which this angel Gabriel gives to the Virgin Mary was much the same with this he here gives to Daniel, as if he designed to put her in mind of it, "Thou that art highly favoured;" as Daniel, "greatly beloved." 4th. He demands his serious attention to the discovery he was now about to make to him; "Therefore understand the matter and consider the vision," ver. 23. This intimates that it was a thing well worthy of his regard, above any of the visions he had been before favoured with. Note, Those who would understand the things of God must consider them; must apply their minds to them, ponder upon them, and compare spiritual things with spiritual. The reason why we are so much in the dark concerning the revealed will of God, and mistake concerning it, is for want of consideration. This vision both requires and deserves consideration.

Thirdly. The message itself, delivered with great solemnity, received no doubt with great attention, and recorded with great exactness; but in it, as is usual in prophecies, there are things dark and hard to be understood. Daniel, that understood by the book of the prophet Jeremiah the expiration of the seventy years of the captivity, is now honourably employed to make known to the church another more glorious release, which that was but a shadow of, at the end of another seventy, not years, but weeks of years. He prayed over that prophecy, and received this in answer to that prayer. He had prayed for his people, and the holy city, that they might be released, that it might be rebuilt; but God answers him above what he was able to ask or think. God not only grants but outdoes the desires of them that fear him, Ps. xxi. 4.

1. The times here determined are somewhat hard to be understood. In general it is seventy weeks; that is, seventy times seven years, which makes just four hundred and ninety years; that is, the great affairs that are yet to come concerning the people of Israel and the city of Jerusalem will lie within the compass of these years.

1st. These years are thus described by weeks. First. In conformity to the prophetical style, which is for the most part abstruse, and out of the common road of speaking, that the things foretold might not lie too obvious. Secondly. To put an honour upon the division of time into weeks, which was made purely by the sabbath day, and to signify that that should be perpetual. Thirdly. With reference to the seventy years of the captivity. As they had been so long kept out of the possession of their own land, so being now restored to it they should seven times as long be kept in the possession of it. So much more doth God delight in shewing mercy than in punishing. The land had enjoyed its sabbaths in a melancholy sense seventy years, Lev. xxvi. 34; but now the people of the Lord shall, in a comfortable sense, enjoy their sabbath seven times seventy years, and in them seventy sabbatical years, which makes ten jubilees. Such proportions are there in the disposals of Providence, that we might see and admire the wisdom of him who hath "determined the times before appointed."

2nd. The difficulties that arise about these seventy weeks are, First. Concerning the time when they commence, and whence they are to be reckoned. They are here dated "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," ver. 25. I should most incline to understand this of the edict of Cyrus, mentioned Ezr. i. 1, for by it the people were restored; and though express mention be not made there of the building of Jerusalem, yet that is supposed in the building of the temple, and was foretold to be done by Cyrus, Isa. xliv. 28. He shall "say to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built." That was, both in prophecy and history, the most famous decree for the building of Jerusalem. Nay, it should seem this going forth of the commandment (which may as well be meant of God's command concerning it as of Cyrus's) is the same with that going forth of the commandment mentioned, ver. 23, which was at the beginning of Daniel's supplications. And it looks very graceful that the seventy weeks should begin immediately upon the expiration of the seventy years. And there is nothing to be objected against this, but that by this reckoning the Persian monarchy, from the taking of Babylon by Cyrus to Alexander's conquest of Darius, lasted but one hundred and thirty years; whereas, by the particular account given of the reigns of the Persian emperors, it is computed that it continued two hundred and thirty years: so Thucydides, Xenophon, and others reckon. Those who fix it to that first edict set aside these computations of the heathen historians as uncertain and not to be relied upon. But others, willing to reconcile them, begin at the four hundred and ninety years, not at the edict of Cyrus, Ezr. i. 1, but at the second edict for the building of Jerusalem, issued out by Darius Nothus, above one hundred years after, mentioned, Ezr. vi.; others, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, who sent Ezra with a commission, Ezr. vii. 8—12. The learned Mr. Pool, in his Latin Synopsis, has a vast and most elaborate collection of what has been said, pro and con, concerning the different beginnings of these weeks, with which the learned may entertain themselves. Secondly. Concerning the period of them. And here likewise interpreters are not agreed. Some make them to end at the death of Christ; and think the express words of this famous prophecy will warrant us to conclude, that from this very hour, when Gabriel spoke to Daniel, at the time of the evening oblation, to the hour when Christ died, which was towards evening too, was exactly four hundred and ninety years; and I am willing enough to be of that opinion. But others think because it is said, that "in the midst of the week," that is, the last of the seventy weeks, he "shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," they end three years and a half after the death of Christ, when, the Jews having rejected the Gospel, the apostles turned to the Gentiles. But they who make them to end precisely at the death of Christ read it thus: He shall "make strong the testament to the many; the last seven," or the last week, yea, half that seven, or half that week, (namely, the latter half, the three years and a half which Christ spent in his public ministry,) shall bring to an end sacrifice and oblation. Others make these four hundred and ninety years to end with the destruction of Jerusalem, about thirty-seven years after the death of Christ, because these seventy weeks are said to be determined upon the people of the Jews and the holy city; and much is said here concerning the destruction of the city and the sanctuary. Thirdly. Concerning the division of them into seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks, and one week; and the reason of this is as hard to account for as any thing else. In the first seven weeks, or forty-nine years, the temple and city were built; and in the last single week Christ preached his Gospel, by which the Jewish economy was taken down, and the foundations laid of the gospel city and temple, which were to be built upon the ruins of the former.

3rd. But whatever uncertainty we may labour under concerning the exact fixing of these times, there is enough clear and certain to answer the two great ends of determining them. First. It did serve then to raise and support the expectations of believers. There were general promises of the coming of the Messiah made to the patriarchs; the preceding prophets had often spoken of him as one that should come, but never was the time fixed for his coming till now. And though there might be so much doubt concerning the date of this reckoning, that they could not ascertain the time just to a year, yet, by the light of this prophecy, they were directed about what time to expect him. And we find accordingly that when Christ came he was generally looked for, as the consolation of Israel, and redemption in Jerusalem by him, Lu. ii. 25, 38. There were those that for this reason thought the "kingdom of God should immediately appear," Lu. xix. 11; and some think this was it that brought a more than ordinary concourse of people to Jerusalem, Acts ii. 5. Secondly. It doth serve still to refute and silence the expectations of unbelievers, who will not own that Jesus is he who should come, but still look for another. This prediction silenced them, and will condemn them; for, reckon these seventy weeks from which of the commandments to build Jerusalem we please, it is certain they are expired above one thousand five hundred years ago; so that the Jews are for ever without excuse who will not own that the Messiah is come, when they are gone so far beyond their utmost reckoning for his coming. But by this we are confirmed in our belief of the Messiah's being come, and that our Jesus is he, that he came just at the time prefixed, a time worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance.

2. The events here foretold are more plain and easy to be understood, at least to us now. Observe what is here foretold,

1st. Concerning the return of the Jews now speedily to their own land, and their settlement again there, which was the thing that Daniel now principally prayed for, and yet it is but briefly touched upon here in the answer to his prayer. Let this be a comfort to the pious Jews, that a commandment shall go forth to "restore and to build Jerusalem," ver. 25. And the commandment shall not be in vain; for, though the times will be very troublous, and this good work will meet with great opposition, yet it shall be carried on and brought to perfection at last. The street shall be built again as spacious and splendid as ever it was, and the walls, even in troublous times. Note, As long as we are here in this world we must expect troublous times, upon some account or other, even then when we have joyous times. Yet we must rejoice with trembling; it is but a gleam, it is but a lucid interval of peace and prosperity; the clouds will return after the rain, when the Jews are restored in triumph to their own land; yet there they must expect troublous times, and prepare for them. But this is our comfort, that God will carry on his own work, will build up his Jerusalem, will beautify it, will fortify it, even in troublous times. Nay, the troublousness of the times may, by the grace of God, contribute to the advancement of the church. The more it is afflicted the more it multiplies.

2nd. Concerning the Messiah and his undertaking. The carnal Jews looked for a Messiah that should deliver them from the Roman yoke, and give them temporal power and wealth; whereas they were here told that the Messiah should come upon another errand, purely spiritual, and upon the account of which he should be the more welcome. First. Christ came to take away sin, and to abolish that. Sin had made a quarrel between God and man, had alienated man from God, and provoked God against man; that was it that put dishonour upon God, and brought misery upon mankind; that was the great mischief-maker. He that would do God a real service, and man a real kindness, must be the destruction of that. Christ undertakes to be so, and for this purpose he is manifested, "to destroy the works of the devil." He doth not say, To finish your transgressions and your sins, but transgression and sin in general; for he is the propitiation not only for our sins, that are Jews, but "for the sins of the whole world." He came, 1*st.* To finish transgression; to restrain it, so some; to break the power of it, to bruise the head of that serpent that had done so much mischief; to take away the usurped dominion of that tyrant, and to set up a kingdom of holiness and love in the hearts of men upon the ruins of Satan's kingdom there, that where sin and death had reigned, righteousnes and life, through grace, might reign. When he died, he said, "It is finished;" sin has now had its death-wound given to it; like Samson's, "Let me die with the Philistines." Animamque in vulnere ponit,—'He inflicts the wound and dies." 2*nd.* To make an end of sin, to abolish it, that it may not rise up in judgment against us; to obtain the pardon of it, that it may not be our ruin. To 'seal up sins,' so the margin reads it, that they may not appear or break out against us, to accuse and condemn us; as, when Christ cast the devil into the bottomless pit, he set a seal upon him, Rev. xx. 3. When sin is pardoned it is sought for and not found, as that which is sealed up. 3*rd.* "To make reconciliation for iniquity," as by a sacrifice, to satisfy the justice of God, and so to make peace, and bring God and man together; not only as an arbitrator, or referee, who only brings the contending parties to a good understanding one of another, but as a surety or undertaker for us. He is not only the peacemaker, but the peace; he is the atonement. Secondly. He came to "bring in an everlasting righteousness." God might justly have made an end of the sin by making an end of the sinner; but Christ found out another way, and so made an end of sin as to save the sinner from it by providing a righteousness for him. We are all guilty before God, and shall be condemned as guilty, if we had not a righteousness wherein to appear before him. Had we stood, our innocency would have been our righteousness, but, being fallen, we must have something else to plead. And Christ has provided us a plea; the merit of his sacrifice is our righteousness, with this we answer all the demands of the law; "Christ has died, yea, rather, has risen again." Thus Christ is "the Lord our righteousness," for he is "made of God to us righteousness," that we might be "made the righteousness of God in him." By faith we apply this to ourselves, and plead it with God, and our faith is imputed to us for righteousness. Rom. iv. 3, 5. This is an everlasting righteousness, for Christ who is our righteousness, and the Prince of our peace, is the everlasting Father. It was from everlasting in the counsels of it, and will be to everlasting in the consequences of it. The application of it was from the beginning, for Christ was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and will be the end, for he is "able to save to the uttermost." It is of everlasting virtue, Heb. x. 12; it is the rock that follows us to Canaan. Thirdly. He came to "seal up the vision and prophecy," that is, all the prophetical visions of the Old Testament which had reference to the Messiah. He sealed them up, that is, he accomplished them, answered them to a tittle; all things that were written in the law, the prophets, and the psalms, concerning the Messiah, were fulfilled in him; thus he confirmed the truth of them, as well as his own mission. He "sealed them up;" that is, he put an end to that method of God's discovering his mind and will, and took another course, by completing the Scripture canon in the New Testament, which is the more sure word of prophecy than that by vision, 2 Pet. i. 19; Heb. i. 1. Fourthly. He came to "anoint the Most Holy," that is, himself, the Holy One who was anointed, that is, appointed to his work, and qualified for it by the Holy Ghost, that oil of gladness which he received without measure above his fellows. Or, to anoint the gospel church, his spiritual temple or holy place, to sanctify and cleanse it, and appropriate it to himself, Eph. v. 6. Or, to consecrate for us "a new and living way into the holiest," by his own blood, Heb. x. 20, as the sanctuary was anointed, Ex. xxx. 25, &c. He is called Messiah, ver. 25, 26, which signifies Christ, Anointed, Jno. i. 41, because he received the unction, both for himself and for all that are his. Fifthly. In order to all this the Messiah must be cut off, must die a violent death, and so be cut off from the land of the living, as was foretold, Isa. liii. 8. Hence, when Paul preacheth the death of Christ, he saith he preached nothing but "what the prophets said should come," Acts xxvi. 22, 23; and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. He must be cut off, but not for himself, not for any sin of his own, but, as Caiaphas prophesied, he must "die for the people," in our stead, and for our good. Not for any advantage of his own; the glory he purchased for himself was no more but the glory he had before, Jno. xvii. 4, 5. No; it was to atone for our sins, and purchase life for us, that he was cut off. Sixthly. He must "confirm the covenant with many." He shall introduce a new covenant between God and man, a covenant of grace, since it was become impossible for us to be saved by a covenant of innocency. This covenant he shall confirm by his doctrine and miracles, by his death and resurrection, by the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper, which are the seals of the New Testament, assuring us that God is willing to accept of us upon gospel terms. His death made his testament of force, and enabled us to claim what is bequeathed by it. He confirmed it to the many, that is, to the common people; the poor were evangelized when the rulers and "Pharisees believed not on him." Or, he confirmed it with many, that is, with the Gentile world; the New Testament was not (like the Old) confined to the Jewish church, but was committed to all nations; Christ gave his life a ransom for many. Seventhly. He must "cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease." By offering himself a sacrifice once for all he shall put an end to all the Levitical sacrifice, shall supersede them, and set them aside. When the substance is come the shadows shall be done away. He causeth all the peace offerings to cease, when he has made peace by the blood of his cross, and by it confirmed the covenant of peace and reconciliation. By the preaching of his Gospel to the world, which the apostles were intrusted to do, he took men off from expecting remission by the blood of bulls and goats, and so "caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease." The apostle, to the Hebrews, shews what a better priesthood, altar, and sacrifice we have now than they had under the law, as a reason why we should hold fast our profession.

3rd. Concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation. And this follows immediately upon the cutting off of the Messiah; not only because it was the just punishment of those that put him to death, which was the sin that filled up the measure of their iniquity, and brought ruin upon them, but because, as things were, it was necessary to the perfecting of one of the great intentions of his death. He died to take away the ceremonial law, quite to abolish "that law of commandment," and to vacate the obligation of it. But the Jews would not be persuaded to quit it, still they kept it up with more zeal than ever; they would hear no talk of parting with it; they stoned Stephen, the first Christian martyr, for saying that Jesus should "change the customs which Moses delivered them," Acts vi. 14; so that there was no way to abolish the Mosaic economy but by destroying the temple, and the holy city, and the Levitical priesthood, and that whole nation, which so incurably doted on them. This was effectually done in less than forty years after the death of Christ, and it was a desolation that could never be repaired to this day. And this is it which is here largely foretold, that the Jews who returned out of captivity might not be overmuch lifted up with the rebuilding of their city and temple, because, in process of time, they would be finally destroyed, and not as now, for seventy years only, but might rather rejoice in hope of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his spiritual kingdom in the world, which should never be destroyed. Now, First. It is here foretold that "the people of the prince" that shall come shall be the instruments of this destruction, that is, the Roman armies, belonging to the monarchy yet to come. Christ is the prince that shall come, and they are employed by him in this service; they are his armies, Mat. xxii. 7. Or, the Gentiles, who, though now strangers, shall become the people of the Messiah, shall destroy the Jews. Secondly. That the destruction should be by war, and the end of that war should be this desolation determined. The wars of the Jews with the Romans were, by their own obstinacy, made very long and very bloody, and they issued at length in the utter extirpation of that people. Thirdly. That the city and sanctuary should in a particular manner be destroyed and laid quite waste. Titus, the Roman general, would fain have saved the temple, but his soldiers were so enraged against the Jews that he could not restrain them from burning it to the ground, that this prophecy might be fulfilled. Fourthly. That all the resistance that should be made to this destruction should be in vain. The "end of it should be with a flood." It shall be a deluge of destruction, like that which swept away the old world, and which there will be no making head against. Fifthly. That hereby the sacrifice and oblation should be made to cease. And it must needs cease, when the family of the priests was so extirpated, and the genealogies of it so confounded, that, they say, there is no man in the world that can prove himself of the seed of Aaron. Sixthly. That there should be "an overspreading of abominations," a general corruption of the Jewish nation, and an abounding of iniquity among them, for which it should be made desolate, 1 Thes. ii. 17. Or, it is rather to be understood of the armies of the Romans, which were abominable to the Jews, they could not endure them, which overspread the nations, and by which it was made desolate. For these are the words which Christ refers to, Mat. xxiv. 15, "When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judæa flee;" which is explained, Lu. xxi. 20, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then flee." Seventhly. That the desolation should be total and final. "He shall make it desolate, even till the consummation;" that is, he shall make it completely desolate. It is a desolation determined, and it will be accomplished to the utmost. And when it is made desolate, it should seem there is something more determined, that is to be "poured upon the desolate," ver. 27; and what should that be but the spirit of slumber, Rom. xi. 8, 25, that blindness which is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in? and then all Israel shall be saved.

CHAPTER X.

This chapter, and the two next, which conclude this book, make up one entire vision and prophecy, which was communicated to Daniel for the use of the church, not by signs and figures, as before, ch. vii. and viii., but by express words; and this was about two years after the vision in the foregoing chapter. Daniel prayed daily, but had a vision only now and then. In this chapter we have some things introductory to the prophecy; in ch. xi. the particular predictions, and ch. xii. the conclusion of it. This chapter shews us, I. Daniel's solemn fasting and humiliation before he had this vision, ver. 1—3. II. A glorious appearance of the Son of God to him, and the deep impression it made upon him, ver. 4—9. III. The encouragement that was given him to expect such a discovery of future events as should be satisfactory and useful both to others and to himself; and that he should be enabled both to understand the meaning of this discovery, though difficult, and to bear up under the lustre of it, though dazzling and dreadful, ver. 10—21.

IN the third year of Cyrus king of Persia a thing was revealed unto Daniel, whose name was called Belteshazzar; and the thing was true, but the time appointed was long: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision. 2 In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks. 3 I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till three whole weeks were fulfilled. 4 And in the four and twentieth day of the first month, as I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel; 5 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz: 6 His body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude. 7 And I Daniel alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves. 8 Therefore I was left alone, and saw this great vision, and there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength. 9 Yet heard I the voice of his words: and when I heard the voice of his words, then was I in a deep sleep on my face, and my face toward the ground.

This vision is dated in the third year of Cyrus, that is, of his reign, after the conquest of Babylon; his third year since Daniel became acquainted with him, and a subject to him. Here is,

First. A general idea of this prophecy; ver. 1, "The thing was true." Every word of God is so. It was true that Daniel had such a vision, and that such and such things were said; this he solemnly attests upon the word of a prophet; et hoc paratus est verificare,—'he was prepared to verify it;' and if it was a word spoken from heaven, no doubt it is stedfast, and may be depended on. But the time appointed was long, as long as to the end of the reign of Antiochus, which was three hundred years; a long time, indeed, when it is looked upon as to come. Nay, and because it is usual with the prophets to glance at things spiritual and eternal, there is that in this prophecy which looks in type as far forward as to the end of the world, and the resurrection of the dead; and then he might well say, "The time appointed was long:" but however it was made as plain to him as if it had been a history rather than a prophecy; he understood the thing; so distinctly was it delivered to him, and did he receive it, that he could say he had "understanding of the vision." It did not so much operate upon his fancy as open his understanding.

Secondly. An account of Daniel's mortification of himself before he had this vision. Not in expectation of it,—nor when he prayed that solemn prayer, ch. ix., doth it appear that he had any expectation of the vision in answer to it; but purely from a principle of devotion, and pious sympathy with the afflicted people of God. He "was mourning full three weeks," ver. 2, for his own sins, and the sins of his people, and their sorrows. Some think the particular occasion of his mourning was the slothfulness and indifferency of many of the Jews, who, though they had liberty to return to their own land, continued still in the land of their captivity, not knowing how to value the privileges offered them; and perhaps it troubled him the more, because they that did so justified themselves by the example of Daniel, though they had not that reason to stay behind which he had. Others think it was because he heard of the obstruction given to the building of the temple by the enemies of the Jews, who "hired counsellors against them" to frustrate their purpose, (Ezr. iv. 4, 5,) "all the days of Cyrus;" and gained their point from his son, Cambyses, or Artaxerxes, who governed while Cyrus was absent in the Scythian war. Note, Good men cannot but mourn to see how slowly the work of God goes on in the world, and what opposition it meets with; how weak its friends are, and how active its enemies. During the days of Daniel's mourning he ate no pleasant bread; he could not live without meat, but ate little, and very sparingly, and mortified himself in the quality as well as quantity of what he ate, which may truly be reckoned fasting, and a token of humiliation and sorrow. He did not eat the pleasant bread he used to eat, but that which was coarse and unpalatable, which he would not be tempted to eat any more of than was just necessary to support nature. As ornaments, so delicates, are very disagreeable to a day of humiliation. Daniel ate no flesh, drank no wine, nor anointed himself, for these three weeks' time, ver. 3. Though he was now a very old man, and might plead that the decay of his nature required what was nourishing,—though he was a very great man, and might plead that, being used to dainty meats, he could not be without them, it would prejudice his health if he were,—yet, when it was both to testify and to assist his devotion, he could thus deny himself. Be it noted to the shame of many young ordinary people, who cannot persuade themselves thus to deny themselves.

Thirdly. A description of that glorious person whom Daniel saw in vision, which it is generally agreed could be no other than Christ himself, the eternal Word. He was by the side of the river Hiddekel, ver. 4, probably walking there, not for diversion, but devotion and contemplation, as Isaac walked in the field to meditate; and, being a person of distinction, he had his servants attending him at some distance. There he looked up, and saw one man, one alone, a certain man, even the man Christ Jesus. It must be he, for he appears in the same resemblance wherein he appeared to St. John in the isle of Patmos, Rev. i. 13—15. His dress was priestly, for he is the high priest of our profession, clothed in linen, as the high priest himself was on the day of atonement, that great day; his loins were girded, (in St. John's vision his paps were girded,) with a golden girdle, of the finest gold, that of Uphaz, for every thing about Christ is the best in its kind. The girding of his loins notes his ready and diligent application to his work, as his Father's servant, in the business of our redemption. His shape was amiable; his body like the beryl, a precious stone of a sky-colour; his countenance was awful, and enough to strike a terror on the beholders, for his face was as the appearance of lightning, which dazzles the eyes, both frightens and threatens; his eyes were bright and sparkling, as lamps of fire; his arms and feet shone like polished brass, ver. 6; his voice was loud and strong, and very piercing, like the voice of a multitude. The vox Dei,—'voice of God,' can overpower the vox populi,—'voice of the people.' Thus glorious did Christ appear, and it should engage us, 1st. To think highly and honourably of him. Now consider how great this man is, and in all things let him have the pre-eminence. 2nd. To admire his condescension for us and our salvation. Over all this splendour he drew a veil when he took upon him the form of a servant, and emptied himself.

Fourthly. The wonderful influence that this appearance had upon Daniel and his attendants, and the terror that it struck upon him and them.

1. His attendants saw not the vision; it was not fit they should be honoured with the sight of it. There is a Divine revelation vouchsafed to all, from converse with which none are excluded that do not exclude themselves; but such a vision must be peculiar to Daniel, that was a favourite. Paul's companions were aware of the light, but saw no man, Acts ix. 7; xxii. 9. Note, It is the honour of those who are beloved of God that what is hid from others is known to them. Christ "manifests himself to them, but not to the world," Jno. xiv. 22. But, though they saw not the vision, they were seized with an unaccountable trembling, either from the voice they heard or from some strange concussion or vibration of the air they felt, so it was that "a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves," probably among the willows that grew by the river side. Note, There are many that have a "spirit of bondage to fear," that never receive "a spirit of adoption," to whom Christ has been, and will be, never otherwise but a terror. Now the fright that Daniel's attendants were in is a confirmation of the truth of the vision; it could not be Daniel's fancy, or the product of a heated imagination of his own, for it had a real, powerful, and strange effect upon those about him.

2. He himself saw it, and saw it alone, but he was not able to bear the sight of it. It not only dazzled his eyes, but overwhelmed his spirit, so that "there remained no strength in him," ver. 8. He said, as Moses himself, "I exceedingly fear and quake." His spirits were all so employed, either in an intense speculation of the glory of this vision or in the fortifying of his heart against the terror of it, that his body was left in a manner lifeless and spiritless; he had no vigour in him, and was but one remove from a dead carcase; he looked as pale as death, his colour was gone, and his comeliness in him was turned into corruption, and he retained no strength. Note, The greatest and best of men cannot bear the immediate discoveries of the Divine glory; no man can see it and live. It is next to death to see a glimpse of it, as Daniel here; but glorified saints see Christ as he is, and can bear the sight. But though Daniel was thus dispirited with the vision of Christ, yet he "heard the voice of his words," and knew what he said. Note, We must take heed, lest our reverence of God's glory by which we should be awakened to hear his voice, both in his word and in his providence, should degenerate into such a dread of him as will disable or indispose us to hear it. It should seem that, when the vision of Christ terrified Daniel, the voice of his words soon pacified and composed him, silenced his fear, and laid him to sleep in a holy security and serenity of mind; "When I heard the voice of his words I fell into a slumber," a sweet slumber, "on my face," and "my face towards the ground." When he saw the vision he threw himself prostrate into a posture of the most humble adoration, and dropped asleep, not as careless of what he heard and saw, but charmed with it. Note, How dreadful soever Christ may appear to those that are under convictions of sin, and in terror by reason of it, there is enough in his word to quiet their spirits, and to make them easy, if they will but attend to it, and apply it.

10 And, behold, an hand touched me, which set me upon my knees and upon the palms of my hands. 11 And he said unto me, O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright: for unto thee am I now sent. And when he had spoken this word unto me, I stood trembling. 12 Then said he unto me, Fear not, Daniel: for from the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words. 13 But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I remained there with the kings of Persia. 14 Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days. 15 And when he had spoken such words unto me, I set my face toward the ground, and I became dumb. 16 And, behold, one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips: then I opened my mouth, and spake, and said unto him that stood before me, O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. 17 For how can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord? for as for me, straightway there remained no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me. 18 Then there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me, 19 And said, O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yea, be strong. And when he had spoken unto me, I was strengthened, and said,

Let my lord speak; for thou hast strengthened me. 20 Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come. 21 But I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth: and there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.

Much ado here is to bring Daniel to be able to hear what Christ has to say to him. Still we have him in a fright, hardly and very slowly recovering himself; but is still answered and supported with good words and comfortable words. Let us see how Daniel is, by degrees, brought to himself, and gather up the several passages that are to the same purpose.

First. Daniel is in a great consternation, and finds it very difficult to get clear of it. The hand that touched him set him at first "upon his knees, and the palms of his hands," ver. 10. Note, Strength and comfort commonly come by degrees to those that have been long cast down and disquieted; they are first helped up a little, and then more. "After two days he will revive us, and then the third day he will raise us up;" and we must not "despise the day of small things," but be thankful for the beginnings of mercy. Afterwards he is helped up, but he stands trembling, ver. 11, for fear lest he fall again. Note, Before God "gives strength and power unto his people" he makes them sensible of their own weakness. "I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble," Hab. iii. 16.

But when afterwards Daniel recovered so much strength in his limbs that he could stand steady, yet he tells us, ver. 15, that he "set his face towards the ground, and became dumb." He was as a man astonished, that knew not what to say, struck dumb with admiration and fear, and is loth to enter into discourse with one so far above him. He kept silence, yea even from good, till he had recollected himself a little. Well, at length he recovered not only the use of his feet, but the use of his tongue; and when he "opened his mouth," ver. 16, that which he had to say was to excuse his having been so long silent, for really he durst not speak, he could not speak. "O my lord," (so, in great humility, this prophet calls the angel, though the angels, in great humility, called themselves "fellow-servants to the prophets," Rev. xxii. 9,) "by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me," they break in upon me with violence, the sense of my sinful, sorrowful state turns upon me, when I see thy purity and brightness. Note, Man that has lost his integrity has reason to blush and be ashamed of himself, when he sees or considers the glory of the blessed angels that keep their integrity. "My sorrows turned upon me, and I have retained no strength" to resist them, or bear up ahead against them; and again, ver. 17, like one half dead with the fright, he complains, As for me "straightway there remained no strength in me" to receive these displays of the Divine glory and these discoveries of the Divine will. Nay, "There is no breath left in me;" such a deliquium did he suffer, that he could not draw one breath after another, but panted and languished, and was in a manner breathless. See how well it is for us that the treasure of Divine revelation is put into earthen vessels, that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, and not by angels. Whatever we may wish in a peevish dislike of the method God takes in dealing with us, it is certain, if we were tried, we should all be of Israel's mind at mount Sinai, when they said to Moses, "Speak thou to us, and we will hear, but let not God speak to us lest we die," Ex. xx. 19. If Daniel could not bear it, how could we? Now this he insists upon as an excuse for his irreverent silence, which otherwise had been blameworthy: "How can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord?" ver. 17. Note, Whenever we enter into communion with God it becomes us to have a due sense of the vast distance and disproportion that there is between us and the holy angels, and of the infinite distance, and proportion at all, between us and the holy God; and to acknowledge that we cannot "order our speech by reason of darkness." How shall we that are dust and ashes speak to the Lord of glory!

Secondly. The blessed angel that was employed by Christ to converse with him gave him all the encouragement and comfort that could be. It should seem it was not he whose glory he saw in vision, ver. 5, 6, that here touched him, and talked with him. That was Christ, but this seems to have been the angel Gabriel, whom Christ had once before ordered to instruct Daniel, ch. viii. 16. The glorious appearance (as that of the God of glory to Abraham, Acts vii. 2,) was to give authority and to gain attention to what the angel should say. Christ himself comforted John, when he, in a like case, "fell at his feet as dead," Rev. i. 17; but here he did it by the angel, whom Daniel saw in a glory much inferior to that of the vision in the verses before; for he was "like the similitude of the sons of men," ver. 16; one like the appearance of a man, ver. 18. When he only appeared, as he had done before, ch. ix. 21, we do not find that Daniel was put into any disorder by it, as he was by this vision; and therefore he is here employed a third time with Daniel.

1. He lent him his hand to help him; touched him, and set him upon his hands and knees, ver. 10, else he had still lain grovelling; touched his lips, ver. 16, else he had been still dumb. Again, he touched him, ver. 18, and put strength into him, else he had still been staggering and trembling. Note, The hand of God's power, going along with the word of his grace, is alone effectual to redress all our grievances, and to rectify whatever is amiss in us. One touch from heaven brings us to our knees, sets us on our feet, opens our lips, and strengthens us; for it is God that works on us, and works in us, both to will and to do that which is good.

2. He assured him of the great favour that God had for him; Thou art "a man greatly beloved," ver. 11; and again, ver. 19, "O man greatly beloved!" Note, Nothing is more likely, nothing more effectual, to revive the drooping spirits of the saints than to be assured of God's love to them. Those are greatly beloved indeed whom God loves, and it is comfort enough to know it.

3. He silenced his fears, and encouraged his hopes, with good words and comfortable words. He said unto him, "Fear not, Daniel," ver. 12; and again, ver. 19, "O man greatly beloved, fear not, peace be unto thee; be strong, yea, be strong." Never did any tender mother quiet her child, when any thing had grieved or frightened it, with more compassion and affection than the angel here quieted Daniel. Those that are beloved of God have no reason to be afraid of any evil,—peace is to them: God himself speaks peace to them, and they ought, upon the warrant of that, to speak peace to themselves. And that peace, that joy of the Lord, will be their strength. Will God "plead against us with his great power," will he take the advantage against us of our being overcome by his terror? "No, but he will put strength into us," Job xxiii. 6. So he did into Daniel here, when, by reason of the lustre of the vision, no strength of his own remained in him. And he acknowledgeth it; ver. 19, "When he had spoken to me I was strengthened." Note, God, by his word, puts life and strength and spirit into his people; for, if he saith, Be strong, power goes along with the word. And now Daniel has experienced the efficacy of God's strengthening word and grace, he is ready for any thing; Now "let my lord speak," and I can hear it, I can bear it, and am ready to do according to it; "for thou hast strengthened me." Note, To those that, like Daniel here, have no might, God increaseth strength, Isa. xl. 29; and we cannot keep up our communion with God but by strength derived from him: but when he is pleased to put strength into us we must make a good use of it, and say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears." Let God enable us to comply with his will, and then, whatever it is, we will stand complete in it. Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis,—'Give what thou commandest, and then command what thou wilt.'

4. He assures him that his fastings and prayers were come up for a memorial before God, as the angel told Cornelius, Acts x. 4; ver. 12, "Fear not, Daniel." It is natural to fallen man to be afraid of an extraordinary messenger from heaven, as dreading to hear evil tidings thence; but Daniel needs not fear, for he has by his three weeks' humiliation and supplication sent extraordinary messengers to heaven, which he may expect to return with an olive branch of peace; "From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand" the word of God, that is, to be the rule of thy prayers, "and to chasten thyself before thy God," that thou mightest put an edge upon thy prayers, "thy words were heard;" as before, "at the beginning of thy supplication," ch. ix. 24. Note, As the entrance of God's word is enlightening to the upright, so the entrance of their prayers is pleasing to him, Ps. cxix. 130. From the first day that we begin to look towards God in a way of duty he is ready to meet us in a way of mercy. Thus ready is God to hear prayer; "I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest."

5. He tells him that he was sent to him on purpose to bring him a prediction of the future state of the church, as a token of God's accepting his prayers for the church; "Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee?" If thou knewest on what errand I come, thou wouldest not be put into such a consternation by it. Note, If we rightly understand the meaning of God's dealings with us, and the methods of his providence and grace concerning us, we would be better reconciled to them. "I am come for thy words," ver. 12, to bring thee a gracious answer to thy prayers. Thus, when God's praying people do call to him, he saith, "Here I am," Isa. lviii. 9; what would you have with me? See the power of prayer, what glorious things it has in its time fetched from heaven, what strange discoveries! On what errand did this angel come to Daniel? He tells him; ver. 14, "I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Daniel was a curious, inquisitive man, that had all his days been searching into secret things; and it would be a mighty gratification to him to be let into the knowledge of things to come. Daniel had always been concerned for the church; its interests lay much upon his heart, and it would be a particular satisfaction to him to know what its state should be, and he would know the better what to pray for as long as he lived. He was now lamenting the difficulties which his people met with in the present day; but, that he might not be offended in those, the angel must tell him what greater difficulties are yet before them. And, if they be wearied, now they only run with the footmen, how will they contend with horses? Note, It would abate our resentment of present troubles to consider that we know not but much greater are before us, which we are concerned to provide for. Daniel must be made to know what shall befall his people in the latter days of the church, after the cessation of prophecy, and when the time drew nigh for the Messiah to appear, "for yet the vision is made for many days." The principal things that this vision was intended to give the church the foresight of would come to pass in the days of Antiochus, near three hundred years after this. Now that which the angel is intrusted to communicate to Daniel, and which Daniel is encouraged to expect from him, is not any curious speculations, moral prognostications, or rational prospects of his own, though he is an angel, but what he has received from the Lord. It was the "revelation of Jesus Christ" that the angel gave to St. John, to be "delivered to the churches," Rev. i. 1; so here, ver. 21, "I will shew thee what is written in the Scriptures of truth," that is, what is fixed in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. The decree of God is a thing written; it is a Scripture, which remains, and cannot be altered: "What I have written, I have written." As there are Scriptures for the revealed will of God, the letters patent, which are published to the world, so there are Scriptures for the secret will of God, the close rolls, which are sealed among his treasures, the book of his decrees. Both are Scriptures of truth; nothing shall be added to or taken from either of them. The secret things belong not to us, only now and then some few paragraphs have been copied out from the book of God's counsels, and delivered to the prophets for the use of the church, as here to Daniel; but they are the things revealed, even the words of this law, which belong to us, and to our children; and we are concerned to study what is written in these Scriptures of truth, for they are things which belong to our everlasting peace.

6. He gives him a general account of the adversaries of the church's cause, from whom it might be expected troubles would arise, and of its patrons, under whose protection it might be assured of safety and victory at last.

1st. The kings of the earth are and will be its adversaries; for they set themselves against the Lord, and against his anointed, Ps. ii. 2. The angel tells Daniel that he was to have come to him with a gracious answer to his prayers; but "the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one and twenty days," just the three weeks that Daniel had been fasting and praying. Cambyses, king of Persia, had been very busy to embarrass the affairs of the Jews, and to do them all the mischief he could, and the angel had been all that time employed to counterwork him, so that he had been constrained to defer his visit to Daniel till now; for angels can be but in one place at a time. Or, as Dr. Lightfoot saith, this new king of Persia by hindering the temple had hindered those good tidings which otherwise he should have brought him. The kings and kingdoms of the world were indeed sometimes helpful to the church, but more often they were injurious to it. When I am gone forth from the kings of Persia,—when their monarchy is brought down for their unkindnesses to the Jews,—then "the prince of Grecia shall come," ver. 20. The Grecian monarchy, though favourable to the Jews at first, as the Persian was, yet will come to be vexatious to them. Such is the state of the church militant,—when it has got clear of one enemy it has another to encounter; and such a hydra's head is that of the old serpent,—when one storm is blown over it is not long before another riseth.

2nd. The God of heaven is and will be its protector; and under him the angels of heaven its patrons and guardians. First. Here is the angel Gabriel busy in the service of the church, making his part good in defence of it twenty-one days, against the prince of Persia, and remaining there with the kings of Persia, as consul, or liege-ambassador, to take care of the affairs of the Jews in that court, and to do them service, ver. 13. And, though much was done against them by the kings of Persia, God permitting it, it is likely much more mischief would have been done them, and they would have been quite ruined, (witness Haman's plot,) if God had not prevented it by the ministration of angels. Gabriel resolves, when he has dispatched this errand to Daniel, that he will return to fight with the prince of Persia,—will continue to oppose him, and will at length humble and bring down that proud monarchy, ver. 20, though he knows another as mischievous, even that of Grecia, will rise instead of it. Secondly. Here is Michael our prince, the great protector of the church, and the patron of its just, but injured cause. "The first of the chief princes," ver. 13; some understand it of a created angel, but an archangel of the highest order, 1 Thes. iv. 16; Jude 9. Others think Michael the archangel is no other than Christ himself, the angel of the covenant, and the Lord of the angels; he whom Daniel saw in vision, ver. 5. He "came to help me," ver. 13; "and there is none but he that holdeth with me in these things," ver. 21. Christ is the church's prince, angels are not, Heb. ii. 5. He presides in the affairs of the church, and effectually provides for its good. He is said to hold with the angels, for it is he that makes them serviceable to the heirs of salvation. And if he were not on the church's side its case were bad. But, saith David, and so said the church, "The Lord taketh my part with them that help me," Ps. cxviii. 7; "The Lord is with them that uphold my soul," Ps. liv. 4.

CHAPTER XI.

The angel Gabriel, in this chapter, performs his promise made to Daniel in the foregoing chapter, that he would shew him "what should befall his people in the latter days," according to that which was written in the Scriptures of faith. Very particularly doth he here foretell the succession of the kings of Persia and Grecia, and the affairs of their kingdoms, especially the mischief which Antiochus Epiphanes did in his time to the church, which was foretold before, ch. viii. 11, 12. Here is one, I. A brief prediction of the setting up of the Grecian monarchy upon the ruins of the Persian monarchy, which was now newly begun, ver. 1—4. II. A prediction of the affairs of the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, with reference to each other, ver. 5—20. III. Of the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his actions and successes, ver. 21—29. IV. Of the great mischief that he should do to the Jewish nation and religion, and his contempt of all religion, ver. 30—39. V. Of his fall and ruin at last, when he is in the heat of his pursuit, ver. 40—45.

ALSO I in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him. 2 And now will I shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. 3 And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. 4 And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others beside those.

Here, First. The angel Gabriel lets Daniel know the good service he had done to the Jewish nation; ver. 1, "In the first year of Darius the Mede," who destroyed Babylon, and released the Jews out of the house of bondage, "I stood a strength and fortress to him;" that is, I was instrumental to protect him, and give him success in his wars, and, after he had conquered Babylon, to confirm him in his resolution to release the Jews, which it is likely met with much opposition. Thus by the angel, and at the request of the watcher, the golden head was broken, and the axe laid to the root of the tree. Note, We must acknowledge the hand of God in the strengthening of those that are friends to the church for the service they are to do it, and confirming them in their good resolutions. And herein he useth the ministry of angels more than we are aware of. And the many instances we have known of God's care of his church formerly encourageth us to depend upon him in farther straits and difficulties.

Secondly. He foretells the reign of four Persian kings; ver. 2, "Now I will shew thee the truth," that is, the true meaning of the visions of the great image, and of the four beasts, and expound in plain terms what was before represented by dark types. 1. There shall stand up three kings in Persia, besides Darius, in whose reign this prophecy is dated, ch. x. 1. Mr. Broughton make these three to be Cyrus, Artaxasta or Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Cambyses, and Ahasuerus, that married Esther, called Darius son of Hystaspes. To these three the Persians gave these attributes: Cyrus was a father, Cambyses a master, and Darius a hoarder up; so Herodotus. 2. There shall be a fourth, "far richer than them all," namely, Xerxes, of whose wealth the Greek authors take notice. By his strength, that is, his vast army, consisting of eight hundred thousand men at least, and his riches, with which he maintained and paid that vast army, he stirred up all against the realm of Greece. Xerxes's expedition against Greece is famous in history, and his shameful defeat that he met with. He that, when he went out, was the terror of Greece, in his return was the scorn of Greece. Daniel needed not be told what disappointment he would meet with, for he was a hinderer of the building of the temple; but soon after, about thirty years after the first return from captivity, Darius, a young king, revived the building of the temple, owning the hand of God against his predecessors for hindering it, Ezr. vi. 7.

Thirdly. He foretells Alexander's conquests, and the partition of his kingdom, ver. 3. He is the mighty king that shall stand up against the kings of Persia, and he shall "rule with great dominion" over many kingdoms, and with a despotic power, for he shall "do according to his will," and undo likewise, which, by the law of the Medes and Persians, their kings could not. When Alexander, after he had conquered Asia, would be worshipped as a god, then this was fulfilled, that he "shall do according to his will." That is God's prerogative, but was his pretension. But, ver. 4, his kingdom shall soon be broken, and divided into four parts, but not to his posterity; nor shall any of his successors reign according to his dominion; none of them shall have such large territories, nor such an absolute power. His kingdom was "plucked for others besides those" of his own family. Arideus, his brother, was made king of Macedonia; Olympias, Alexander's mother, killed him, and poisoned Alexander's two sons, Hercules and Alexander. Thus was his family rooted out by its own hands. See what decaying, perishing things worldly pomp and possessions are, and the powers by which they are got. Never was the vanity of the world and its greatest things shewn more evidently than in the story of Alexander; "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

5 And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. 6 And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm: but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. 7 But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them, and shall prevail: 8 And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold; and he shall continue more years than the king of the north. 9 So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land. 10 But his sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces: and one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress. 11 And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north: and he shall set forth a great multitude; but the multitude shall be given into his hand. 12 And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up; and he shall cast down many ten thousands: but he shall not be strengthened by it. 13 For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain years with a great army and with much riches. 14 And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south: also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision; but they shall fall. 15 So the king of the north shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities: and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand. 16 But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him: and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed. 17 He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him; thus shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her: but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him. 18 After this shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many: but a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him. 19 Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found. 20 Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom: but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle.

Here is foretold,

First. The rise and power of two great kingdoms, out of the remains of Alexander's conquests, ver. 5. 1. The kingdom of Egypt, which was made considerable by Ptolemæus Lagus, one of Alexander's captains, whose successors were from him called the Lagidæ. He is called the king of the south, that is, Egypt, named here, ver. 8, 42, 43. The countries that at first belonged to Ptolemy are reckoned to be Egypt, Phœnicia, Arabia, Libya, Ethiopia, &c. Theocr. Idyl. 17. 2. The kingdom of Syria, which was set up by Seleucus Nicanor, or, the Conqueror. He was one of Alexander's princes, and became stronger than the other, and had the greatest dominion of all, was the most powerful of all Alexander's successors; it was said he had no less than seventy-two kingdoms under him. Both these were strong against Judah, the affairs of which are particularly eyed in this prediction. Ptolemy, soon after he gained Egypt, invaded Judæa, and took Jerusalem, on a sabbath, pretending a friendly visit. Seleucus also gave disturbance to Judæa.

Secondly. The fruitless attempt to unite these two kingdoms, as iron and clay in Nebuchadnezzar's image, ver. 6. At "the end of certain years," above seventy after Alexander's death, the Lagidæ and the Seleucidæ shall associate, but not in sincerity. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, shall marry his daughter Berenice to Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who had already a wife called Laodice. Berenice shall come to the king of the north, to make an agreement, but it shall not hold; "She shall not retain the power of the arm." Neither she nor her posterity shall establish themselves in the kingdom of the north; neither shall Ptolemy her father nor Antiochus her husband (betwixt whom there was to be a great alliance) stand, nor their arm; but "she shall be given up, and they that brought her," all that projected that unhappy marriage between her and Antiochus, which occasioned so much mischief, instead of producing a coalition between the northern and southern crowns, as was hoped. Antiochus divorced Berenice, took his former wife Laodice again, who soon after poisoned him, procured Berenice and her son to be murdered, and set up her own son by Antiochus to be king, who was called Seleucus Callinicus.

Thirdly. A war between the two kingdoms, ver. 7, 8. A branch from the same root with Berenice shall "stand up in his estate." Ptolemæus Euergetes, the son and successor of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, shall come with an army against Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, to avenge his sister's quarrel, and shall prevail. And he shall carry away a rich booty both of persons and goods into Egypt, and shall "continue more years than the king of the north." This Ptolemy reigned forty-six years; and Justin saith, if his own affairs had not called him home, he had in this war made himself master of the whole kingdom of Syria. But, ver. 9, he shall be forced to "come into his kingdom, and return into his own land," to keep peace there, so that he can no longer carry on the war abroad. Note, It is very common for a treacherous peace to end in a bloody war.

Fourthly. The long and busy reign of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. Seleucus Callinicus, that king of the north who was overcome, ver. 7, and died miserably, left two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus; these are his sons, that is, the sons of the king of the north that shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces to recover what their father lost, ver. 10. But Seleucus the elder, being weak, and unable to rule his army, was poisoned by his friends, and reigned only two years; and his brother Antiochus succeeded him, who reigned thirty-seven years, and was called the Great. And therefore the angel, though he speaks of sons at first, goes on with the account of one only, who was but fifteen years old when he began to reign, and he shall "certainly come and overflow" and overrun, and shall be restored at length to what his father lost.

1. The king of the south, in this war, shall at first have great success. Ptolemæus Philopater, moved with indignation at the indignities done him by Antiochus the Great, shall (though otherwise a slothful prince) "come forth and fight with him;" and shall bring a vast army into the field of seventy thousand foot, and five thousand horse, and seventy-three elephants. And the other multitude (that is, the army of Antiochus, consisting of sixty-two thousand foot, and six thousand horse, and one hundred and two elephants,) shall be given into his hand. Polybius, who lived with Scipio, has given a particular account of this battle of Raphia. Ptolemæus Philopater, having gained this victory, grew very insolent; his heart was lifted up, then he went into the temple of God at Jerusalem, and, in defiance of the law, entered the most holy place, for which God has a controversy with him, so that, though he shall cast down many myriads, yet he shall not be strengthened by it, so as to secure his interest. For,

2. The king of the north, Antiochus the Great, shall return with a greater army than the former; and at the end of times, that is, years, he shall come often with a mighty army, and great riches, against the king of the south, namely, Ptolemæus Epiphanes, who succeeded Ptolemæus Philopater his father, when he was a child, which gave advantage to Antiochus the Great. In this expedition he had some powerful allies; ver. 14, "Many shall stand up against the king of the south." Philip of Macedon was confederate with Antiochus against the king of Egypt, and Scopas his general, whom he sent into Syria. Antiochus routed him, and destroyed a great part of his army; whereupon the Jews willingly yielded to Antiochus, joined with him, and helped him to besiege Ptolemæus's garrisons: then "the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision," to help forward the accomplishment of this prophecy, "but they shall fall," and shall come to nothing, ver. 14. Hereupon, ver. 15, the king of the north, this same Antiochus Magnus, shall carry on his designs against the king of the south another way. 1st. He shall surprise his strongholds. All that he has got in Syria and Samaria, and the arms of the south, all the power of the king of Egypt, shall not be able to withstand him. See how dubious and variable the turns of the scale of war are; like buying and selling, it is winning and losing; sometimes one side gets the better, and sometimes the other, yet neither by chance. It is not, as they call it, the fortune of war; but according to the will and counsel of God, who brings some low, and raiseth others up. 2nd. He shall make himself master of the land of Judæa, ver. 16. "He that comes against him," that is, the king of the north, shall carry all before him, and do what he pleases, and he shall stand, and get footing in the glorious land, so the land of Israel was, and by his hand it was wasted and consumed, for with the spoil of that good land he victualled his vast army. The land of Judæa lay between these two potent kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, so that in all the struggles between them that was sure to suffer, for to it they both bore ill-will. Yet some read this, 'By his hand it shall be perfected;' as if it intimated that the land of Judæa being taken under the protection of this Antiochus, shall flourish, and be in better condition than it had been. 3rd. He shall still push on his war against the king of Egypt, and "set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom," taking advantage of the infancy of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and the upright ones, that is, many of the pious Israelites, siding with him, ver. 17. And in prosecution of his design, he shall give him his daughter Cleopatra to wife, designing, as Saul, in giving his daughter to David, that she should be a snare to him, and do him a mischief; but she shall not stand on her father's side, nor be for him, but for her husband, and so that plot failed him. 4th. His war with the Romans is here foretold, ver. 18. He shall "turn his face to the isles," ver. 18; the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5, Greece and Italy. He took many of the isles about the Hellespont, Rhodes, Samos, Delos, &c. which, by war or treason, he made himself master of; but a prince, or state, so some, even the Roman senate, or a leader, even the Roman general, shall return his reproach, with which he abused the Romans, upon himself, or, shall make his shame rest on himself, and without his own shame, or any disgrace to himself, shall pay him again. This was fulfilled when the two Scipios were sent with an army against Antiochus. Hannibal was then with him, and advised him to invade Italy, and waste it as he had done; but he did not take his advice, and Scipio joined battle with him and gave him a total defeat, though Antiochus had seventy thousand men and the Romans but thirty thousand. Thus he caused "the reproach offered by him to cease." 5th. His fall. When he was totally routed by the Romans, and was forced to quit all he had in Europe to them, and had a very heavy tribute exacted from him, he turned to his own land, and, not knowing which way to raise money to pay his tribute, he plundered a temple of Jupiter, which so incensed his own subjects against him that they set upon him and killed him, so he was overthrown and fell, and was no more found, ver. 19. 6th. His next successor, ver. 20. There rose up one in his place, "a raiser of taxes," a sender forth of the extortioner, or extorter. This character was remarkably answered in Seleucus Philopater, the elder son of Antiochus the Great, who was a great oppressor of his own subjects, and exacted abundance of money from them; and, when he was told he would thereby lose his friends, he said he knew no better friend he had than money. He likewise attempted to rob the temple at Jerusalem, which this seems especially to refer to. "But within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle," but poisoned by Heliodorus, one of his own servants, when he had reigned but twelve years, and done nothing remarkable.

From all this let us learn, 1. That God in his providence sets up one, and pulls down another, as he pleaseth; advanceth some from low beginnings, and depresseth others that were very high. Some have called great men the football of fortune; or, rather, they are the tools of providence. 2. This world is full of wars and fightings, which come from men's lusts, and make it a theatre of sin and misery. 3. All the changes and revolutions of states and kingdoms, and every event, even the most minute and contingent, were plainly and perfectly foreseen by the God of heaven, and to him nothing is new. 4. No word of God shall fall to the ground; but what he hath designed, what he hath declared, shall infallibly come to pass, and even the sins of men shall be made to serve his purpose, and contribute to the bringing of his counsels to birth in their season; and yet God is not the author of sin. 5. That, for the right understanding of some parts of Scripture, it is necessary that heathen authors be consulted, which give light to the Scripture, and shew the accomplishment of what is there foretold. We have, therefore, reason to bless God for the human learning with which many have done great service to Divine truths.

21 And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. 22 And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken; yea, also the prince of the covenant. 23 And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully: for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. 24 He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches: yea, and he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, even for a time. 25 And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they shall forecast devices against him. 26 Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow: and many shall fall down slain. 27 And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at the time appointed. 28 Then shall he return into his land with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own land. 29 At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south; but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter. 30 For the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant: so shall he do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. 31 And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. 32 And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. 33 And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. 34 Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries. 35 And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed. 36 And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done. 37 Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all. 38 But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces: and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things. 39 Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain. 40 And at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over. 41 He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown: but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon. 42 He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries: and the land of Egypt shall not escape. 43 But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. 44 But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. 45 And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

All this is a prophecy of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, the little horn spoken of before, ch. viii. 9, a sworn enemy to the Jewish religion, and a bitter persecutor of those that adhered to it. What troubles the Jews met with in the reigns of the Persian kings were not so particularly foretold to Daniel as these, because then they had living prophets with them, Haggai and Zachariah, to encourage them; but these troubles in the days of Antiochus were foretold, because before that time prophecy would cease, and they would find it necessary to have recourse to the written word. Some things in this prediction concerning Antiochus are alluded to in the New Testament predictions of the antichrist, especially ver. 36, 37. And as it is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the prosperity of the Jewish church, to make use of such expressions as were applicable to the kingdom of Christ, and insensibly to slide into a prophecy of that, so, when they foretell the troubles of the church, they make use of such expressions as have a farther reference to the kingdom of the antichrist, the rise and ruin of that. Now, concerning Antiochus, the angel foretells here,

First. His character. He shall be a vile person. He called himself Epiphanes, the illustrious; but his character was the reverse of his surname. The heathen writers describe him to be an odd-humoured man, rude and boisterous, base and sordid. He would sometimes steal out of the court into the city, and herd himself with any scoundrel company, incognito. He made himself a companion of the common sort, and the basest strangers that came to town. He had the most unaccountable whims, so that some took him to be silly, others to be mad; hence he was called Epimanes, the madman. He is called a vile person, for he had been a long time a hostage at Rome for the fidelity of his father, when the Romans had subdued him. And it was agreed that, when the other hostages were exchanged, he should continue a prisoner at large.

Secondly. His accession to the crown. By a trick he got his elder brother's son, Demetrius, to be sent a hostage to Rome, in exchange for him, contrary to the cartel; and his elder brother being made away by Heliodorus, ver. 20, he took the kingdom. The states of Syria did not give it him, ver. 21, because they knew it belonged to his elder brother's son, nor did he get it by the sword, but came in peaceably, pretending to reign for his brother's son, Demetrius, then a hostage at Rome. But with the help of Eumenes and Attalus, neighbouring princes, he gained an interest in the people, and by flatteries obtained the kingdom, and established himself in it, and crushed Heliodorus, who made head against him "with the arms of a flood." They that opposed him were overflown and broken before him, even the prince of the covenant, his nephew, the rightful heir, whom he pretended to covenant with, that he would resign to him whenever he should return, ver. 22. But, ver. 23, "after the league made with him, he shall work deceitfully," as one whose avowed maxim it is, that princes ought not to be bound by their word any longer than it is for their interest. And with a small people, that at first cleave to him, he shall become strong, and, ver. 24, "he shall enter peaceably upon the fattest places" of the kingdom of Syria, and, very unlike his predecessors, shall scatter among the people the prey, and the spoil, and riches, to insinuate himself into their affections; but at the same time he shall "forecast his devices against the strongholds," to make himself master of them, so that his generosity shall last but for a time. When he has got the garrisons into his hands he will scatter his spoil no more, but rule by force, as those commonly do that come in by fraud. He that comes in like a fox reigns like a lion. Some understand these verses of his first expedition into Egypt, when he came not as an enemy, but as a friend and guardian to the young king Ptolemæus Philometor, and therefore brought with him but few followers, yet those stout men, and faithful to his interest, whom he placed in divers of the strongholds in Egypt, thereby making himself master of them.

Thirdly. His war with Egypt, which was his second expedition thither. This is described, ver. 25—27, Antiochus shall "stir up his power and courage" against Ptolemæus Philometor, king of Egypt. Ptolemy thereupon "shall be stirred up to battle" against him, shall come against him with "a very great and mighty army;" but Ptolemy, though he has such a vast army, shall not be able to stand before him, for Antiochus's army shall overthrow his, and overpower it, and great multitudes of the Egyptian army shall fall down slain. And no marvel, for the king of Egypt shall be betrayed by his own counsellors. "They that feed of the portion of his meat," that eat of his bread, and live upon him, being bribed by Antiochus, shall "forecast devices against him," and even they "shall destroy him." And what fence is there against such treachery? After the battle a treaty of peace shall be set on foot, and these two kings shall meet at one council board, to adjust the articles of peace between them, but they shall neither of them be sincere in it; for they shall in their pretences and promises of amity and friendship lie to one another, for their hearts shall be at the same time to do one another all the mischief they can. And then no marvel it shall not prosper. The peace shall not last; but the end of it shall be at the time appointed in the Divine providence, and then the war shall break out again, as a sore that is only skinned over.

Fourthly. Another expedition against Egypt. From the former he returned "with great riches," ver. 28; and therefore took the first occasion to invade Egypt again at the time appointed by the Divine providence, two years after, in the eighth year of his reign, ver. 29. He shall come towards the south. But this attempt shall not succeed as the two former did, nor shall he gain his point as he had done before once and again, for, ver. 30, "The ships of Chittim shall come against him;" that is, the navy of the Romans, or only ambassadors from the Romans enate, who came in two ships. Ptolemæus Philometor, king of Egypt, being now in a strict alliance with the Romans, craved their aid against Antiochus, who had besieged him and his mother Cleopatra in the city of Alexandria. The Roman senate thereupon sent an embassy to Antiochus, to command him to raise the siege, which, when he desired some time to consider of, and consult with his friends about, Popilius, one of the ambassadors, with his staff drew a circle about him, and told him, as one having authority, he should give a positive answer before he came out of that circle; whereupon, fearing the Roman power, he was forced immediately to give orders for the raising of the siege, and the retreat of his army out of Egypt. So Livy and others relate the story which this prophecy refers to: he shall be grieved and return; for it was a great vexation to him to be forced to yield thus.

Fifthly. His rage and cruel practices against the Jews. This is that part of his government, or misgovernment rather, which is most enlarged upon in this prediction. In his return from his expedition into Egypt, which he prophesied of, ver. 28, he did exploits against the Jews, in the 6th year of his reign; then he spoiled the city and temple; but the most terrible storm was in his return from Egypt two years after, prophesied of ver. 20. Then he took Judæa in his way home, and, because he could not gain his point in Egypt, by reason of the Romans interposing, he wreaked his revenge upon the poor Jews, who gave him no provocation, but had greatly provoked God to permit him to do it, ch. viii. 23.

1. He had a rooted antipathy to the Jews' religion. His heart was "against the holy covenant," ver. 20; and, ver. 30, he had "indignation against the holy covenant;" that covenant of peculiarity by which the Jews were incorporated a people distinct from all other nations, and dignified above them. He hated the law of Moses, and the worship of the true God, and was vexed at the privileges of the Jewish nation, and the promises made to them. Note, That which is the hope and joy of the people of God is the envy of their neighbours, and that is the holy covenant. Esau hated Jacob because he had got the blessing. And those that are strangers to the covenant are often enemies to it.

2. He carried on his malicious designs against the Jews by the assistance of some perfidious, apostate Jews; he kept up "intelligence with them that forsook the holy covenant," ver. 30; some of the Jews that were false to their religion, and introduced the customs of the heathen, with whom they made a covenant. See the fulfilling of this, 1 Mac. i. 11—15, where it is expressly said concerning those renegado Jews, that they "made themselves uncircumcised, and forsook the holy covenant." And, 2 Mac. iv. 9, we read of Jason, the brother of Onias the high priest, who, by the appointment of Antiochus, set up a school at Jerusalem "for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen." And 2 Mac. iv. 23, &c., of Menelaus, who fell in with the interests of Antiochus, and was the man that helped him into Jerusalem now in his last return from Egypt. We read much in the book of the Maccabees of the mischief done to the Jews by these treacherous men of their own nation, Jason, and Menelaus, and their party. These upon all occasions he made use of. "Such as do wickedly against the covenant," that throw up their religion and comply with the heathen, he shall "corrupt with flatteries," to harden them in their apostasy, and to make use of them as decoys to draw in others, ver. 32. Note, It is not strange if those who do not live up to their religion, but in their conversations "do wickedly against the covenant," are easily corrupted by flatteries to quit their religion. They that make shipwreck of a good conscience will soon make shipwreck of the faith.

3. He profaned the temple. "Arms stand on his part," ver. 31; not only his own army which he now brought from Egypt, but a great party of deserters from the Jewish religion that joined with them, and they polluted the sanctuary of strength, not only the holy city, but the temple. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. i. 21, &c., "They entered proudly into the sanctuary, took away the golden altar, and the candlestick," &c.; and therefore, ver. 25, "There was a great mourning in Israel, the princes and elders mourned," &c. And 2 Mac. v. 15, &c., "Antiochus went into the most holy temple; Menelaus, that traitor to the laws, and to his own country, being his guide." Antiochus, having resolved to bring all about him to be of his religion, took away the daily sacrifice, ver. 31. Some observe that the word tammidh, which signifies no more than "daily," is only here and in the parallel place used for the daily sacrifice, as if there were a designed liberty left to supply it either with sacrifice, which was suppressed by Antiochus, or with gospel worship, which is suppressed by the antichrist. Then he "set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar," 1 Mac. i. 54, even an idol altar, ver. 59, and called the temple the temple of Jupiter Olympus, 2 Mac. vi. 2.

4. He persecuted those who retained their integrity. Though there are many that forsake the covenant, and do wickedly against it, yet there is a people that do know their God, and retain the knowledge of him, and "they shall be strong and do exploits," ver. 32; when others yield to the tyrant's demands, and surrender their consciences to his impositions, they bravely keep their ground, resist the temptation, and make the tyrant himself ashamed of his attempt upon them. Good old Eleazar, one of the principal scribes, when he had swine's flesh thrust into his mouth, bravely spit it out again, though he knew he must be tormented to death for so doing; and was so, 2 Mac. vi. 19. The mother and her seven sons were put to death for adhering to their religion, 2 Mac. vii. This might well be called doing exploits; for to choose suffering rather than sin is a great exploit. And it was by faith, by being strong in faith, that they did those exploits, that they "were tortured, not accepting deliverance," as the apostle speaks, probably with reference to that story, Heb. xi. 35. Or it may refer to the military courage and achievements of Judas Maccabæus and others in opposition to Antiochus. Note, The right knowledge of God is and will be the strength of the soul, and in the strength of that gracious souls do exploits. They that know his name will put their trust in him, and by that trust will do great things. Now, concerning this people that knew their God, we are here told,

1st. That "they shall instruct many," ver. 33. They shall make it their business to shew others what they have learned themselves of the difference between truth and falsehood, good and evil. Note, They that have the knowledge of God themselves should communicate their knowledge to those about them; and this spiritual charity must be extensive,—they must instruct many. Some understand this of a society newly erected for the propagating of Divine knowledge, called Assideans, godly men, pietists, so the name signifies, that were both knowing and zealous in the law; these instructed many. Note, In times of persecution and apostasy, which are trying times, those that have knowledge ought to make use of it for the strengthening and establishing of others. They that understand aright themselves ought to do what they can to bring others to understand; for knowledge is a talent that must be traded with. Or, they shall instruct many by their perseverance in their duty, and their patient suffering for it. Good examples instruct many, and with many are the most powerful instructions.

2nd. They that fall by the cruelty of Antiochus shall be put to the torture, and put to death by his rage. Though they are so excellent and intelligent themselves, and so useful and serviceable to others, yet Antiochus shall shew them no mercy; but 'they shall fall for some days.' So it may be read, Rev. ii. 10, "Thou shalt have tribulation ten days." We read much in the books of the Maccabees of Antiochus's barbarous usage of the pious Jews, how many he slew in wars, and how many he murdered in cold blood. Women were put to death for having their children circumcised, and their "infants hanged about their neck," 1 Mac. i. 60, 61. But why did God suffer this? How can this be reconciled with the justice and goodness of God? I answer, Very well, if we consider what it was that God aimed at in this, ver. 35, "Some of them of understanding shall fall;" but it shall be for the good of the church, and for their own spiritual benefit, "It shall be to try them, and to purge, and to make them white." They needed these afflictions themselves. The best have their spots, which must be washed off, their dross, which must be purged out; and their troubles, particularly their share in the public troubles, help to do this, being sanctified to them by the grace of God. They are means of mortifying their corruptions, weaning them from the world, and awakening them to greater seriousness and diligence in religion; they try them, as silver in the furnace is refined from its dross; they purge them, as wheat in the barn is winnowed from the chaff; and "make them white," as cloth by the fuller is cleared from its spots: see 1 Pet. i. 7. Their sufferings for righteousness' sake would try and purge the nation of the Jews, would convince them of the truth, excellency, and power of that holy religion which these understanding men died for their adherence to. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church; it is precious blood, and not a drop of it should be shed but upon such a valuable consideration.

3rd. The cause of religion, though it be thus run upon, yet it shall not be run down. "When they shall fall" they shall not be utterly cast down, but "they shall be holpen with a little help," ver. 34. Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, and a few with them, shall make head against the tyrant, and assert the injured cause of their religion; they "pulled down the idolatrous altars, circumcised the children that they found uncircumcised, recovered the law out of the hand of the Gentiles, and the work prospered in their hands," 1 Mac. ii. 45. Note, Those that stand by the cause of religion when it is threatened and struck at, though they may not presently be delivered and made victorious, yet they shall have present help. And a little help must not be despised, but when times are very bad we must be thankful for some reviving. It is likewise foretold that "many shall cleave to them with flatteries;" when they see the Maccabees prosper some Jews shall join with them that are no true friends to religion, but only will pretend friendship, either with design to betray them or in hope to rise with them; but the fiery trial (ver. 35) will separate between the precious and the vile, and by it they that are perfect will be made manifest, and they that are not.

4th. Though these troubles may continue long, yet they will have an end. They are for a time appointed, a limited time fixed in the Divine counsels. This warfare shall be accomplished. Hitherto the power of the enemy shall come, and no farther; here shall its "proud waves be stayed."

5. He grew very proud, insolent, and profane; and, being puffed up with his conquests, bade defiance to heaven, and trampled upon every thing that was sacred, ver. 36, &c. And here, some think, begins a prophecy of the antichrist, the papal kingdom; and it is plain, St. Paul, in his prophecy of the rise and reign of the man of sin, alludes to this here, 2 Thes. ii. 4, which shews that Antiochus was a type and figure of that enemy, as Babylon also was; but this, being joined in a continued discourse with the foregoing prophecies concerning Antiochus, to me it seems probable that to him it principally refers, and in him had its primary accomplishment, and has reference to the other only by way of accommodation.

1st. He shall impiously dishonour the God of Israel, the only living and true God, called here the God of gods. He shall, in defiance of him and his authority, "do according to his will," against his people and his holy religion; he shall exalt himself above him, as Sennacherib did, and shall "speak marvellous things" against him, and against his laws and institutions. This was fulfilled when Antiochus forbade sacrifice to be offered in God's temple, and ordered the sabbaths to be profaned, the sanctuary and the holy people to be polluted, &c., to "the end they might forget the law, and change all the ordinances," and this upon pain of death, 1 Mac. i. 45.

2nd. He shall proudly put contempt upon all other gods, shall "magnify himself above every God," even the gods of the nations. Antiochus wrote to his own kingdom, that every one should leave the gods he had worshipped, and worship such as he ordered, contrary to the practice of all the conquerors that went before him; 1 Mac. i. 41, 42, "And all the heathen agreed according to the commandment of the king." As fond as they were of their gods, they did not think them worth suffering for; but, their gods being idols, it was all alike to them what gods they worshipped. Antiochus did not regard any god, but "magnified himself above all," ver. 37. He was so proud that he thought himself above the condition of a mortal man, that he could "command the waves of the sea, and reach to the stars of heaven," as his insolence and haughtiness is expressed, 2 Mac. ix. 8, 10. Thus he carried all before him, till the indignation was accomplished, ver. 36; till he had run his length, and filled up the measure of his iniquity: for that that is determined shall be done, and nothing more, nothing short.

3rd. He shall, contrary to the way of the heathen, disregard the god of his fathers, ver. 37. Though an affection to the religion of their ancestors was among the heathen almost as natural to them as "the desire of women," for, if you search through "the isles of Chittim," you will not find an instance of a nation that has changed their gods, Jer. ii. 10, 11, yet Antiochus shall not regard the god of his fathers; he made laws to abolish the religion of his country, and to bring in the idols of the Greeks. And though his predecessors had honoured the God of Israel, and given great gifts to the temple of Jerusalem, 2 Mac. iii. 2, 3, he offered the greatest indignities to God and his temple. His not regarding the desire of women may speak either his barbarous cruelty,—he shall spare no age or sex, no, not the tender ones,—or his unnatural lusts, or, in general, his contempt of every thing which men of honour have a concern for. Or, it might be accomplished in something we meet not with in history. Its being joined to his not regarding the god of his fathers intimates that the idolatries of his country had in them more of the gratifications of the flesh than those of other countries, (Lucian has written of the Syrian goddesses,) and yet that would not prevail to keep him to them.

4th. He shall set up an unknown god, a new god; ver. 38, "In his estate," in the room of the gods of his fathers, Apollo and Diana, deities of pleasure, he shall "honour the god of forces," a supposed deity of power, "a god whom his fathers knew not," nor worshipped, because he will be thought in wisdom and strength to excel his fathers. He shall honour this god "with gold, and silver, and precious stones," thinking nothing too good for the god he had taken a fancy to. This seems to be Jupiter Olympus, known among the Phœnicians by the name of Baal-semen, the Lord of heaven, but never introduced among the Syrians till Antiochus did it. Thus shall he do "in the most strong holds," in the temple of Jerusalem, which is called "the sanctuary of strength," ver. 31, and here the 'fortresses of munitions;' there he shall set up the image of this strange god. Some read it, 'He shall commit the munitions of strength,' or of the most strong god, that is, the city Jerusalem, to 'a strange god;' he put it under the protection and government of Jupiter Olympus. This god he shall not only acknowledge, but shall "increase with glory," by setting his image even upon God's altar. And he shall cause them that minister to this idol "to rule over many;" shall put them into places of power and trust, and they shall "divide the land for gain," shall be maintained richly out of the profits of the country. Some, by the Mahuzzim, or "god of forces," that Antiochus shall worship, understand money, which is said to answer all things, and which is the great idol of worldly people.

Now here is very much that is applicable to the man of sin: he exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; magnifies himself above all; his flatterers call him 'our Lord God the pope.' By forbidding marriage, and magnifying the single life, he pretends not to regard the desire of women, and honours the god of forces, the god Mahuzzim, or strongholds, that is, saints and angels, whom his followers take for their protectors, as the heathen did of old their demons. These they make presidents of several countries, &c., these they honour with vast treasures dedicated to them; and therein the learned Mr. Mede thinks this prophecy was fulfilled, and that it is referred to 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2.

5th. Here seems to be another expedition into Egypt, or at least a struggle with Egypt. The Romans had tied him up from invading Ptolemy, but now that "king of the south pusheth at him," ver. 40, makes an attempt upon some of his territories; whereupon Antiochus, the "king of the north, comes against him like a whirlwind," with incredible swiftness and fury, "with chariots and horses, and many ships," a great force; he shall come through countries, "and shall overthrow and pass over." In this flying march "many countries shall be overthrown" by him; and he shall enter into the glorious land, the land of Israel; it is the same word that is translated the pleasant land, ch. viii. 9. He shall make dreadful work among the nations thereabout, yet some shall escape his fury, particularly Edom and Moab, and "the chief of the children of Ammon," ver. 41. He did not put these countries under contribution, because they had joined with him against the Jews; but especially the land of Egypt shall not escape, but he will quite beggar that, so bare will he strip it. This some reckon his fourth and last expedition against Egypt, in the tenth or eleventh year of his reign, under pretence of assisting the younger brother of Ptolemæus Philometor against him. We read not of any great slaughter made in this expedition, but great plunder, for it should seem that was what he came for; "He shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all the precious things of Egypt," ver. 43. Polybius, in Athenæus, relates that Antiochus, having got together abundance of wealth by spoiling young Philometor, and breaking league with him, and by the contributions of his friends, bestowed a vast deal upon a triumph, in imitation of Paulus Æmilius, and describes the extravagance of it. Here we are told how he got that money which he spent so profusely. Notice is here taken likewise of the use he made of the Libyans and Ethiopians, who bordered upon Egypt; they were at his steps, that is, he had them at his foot, had them at his beck, and they made inroads upon Egypt to serve him.

6. Here is a prediction of the fall and ruin of Antiochus. As before, ch. viii. 25, when he is in the height of his honour, flushed with victory, and laden with spoils, "tidings out of the east and out of the north," that is, out of the north-east, shall trouble him, ver. 44. Or, he shall have intelligence, both from the eastern and northern parts, that the king of Parthia is invading his kingdom. This obliged him to drop the enterprises he had in hand, and to go against the Persians and Parthians that were revolting from him. And this vexed him; for now he thought utterly to have ruined and extirpated the Jewish nation, when that expedition called him off in which he perished. This is explained by a passage in Tacitus, (though an impious one,) where he commends Antiochus for his attempt to take away the superstition of the Jews, and bring in the manners of the Greeks among them, (ut teterrimam gentem in melius mutaret,—'to meliorate an odious nation,') and laments that he was hindered from accomplishing it by the Parthian war. Now here is,

1st. The last effort of his rage against the Jews. When he finds himself perplexed and embarrassed in his affairs, he shall "go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many," ver. 44. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. iii. 27, &c.; what a rage Antiochus was in when he heard of the successes of Judas Maccabæus, and the orders he gave to Lysias to destroy Jerusalem. Then he planted "the tabernacles of his palace," or tents of his court, "between the seas," between the Great Sea and the Dead Sea. He set up his royal pavilion at Emmaus, near Jerusalem, in token that, though he could not be present himself, yet he gave full power to his captains to prosecute the war against the Jews with the utmost rigour. He placed his tent there, as if he had taken possession of "the glorious holy mountain," and called it his own. Note, When impiety grows very impudent we may see its ruin near.

2nd. His exit. "He shall come to his end, and none shall help him;" that is, God shall cut him off in the midst of his days, and none shall be able to prevent his fall. This is the same with that which was foretold, ch. viii. 25, "He shall be broken without hand," where we took a view of his miserable end. Note, When God's time is come to bring proud oppressors to their end, none shall be able to help them, nor, perhaps, inclined to help them; for those that covet to be feared by all, when they are in their grandeur, when they come to be in distress will find themselves loved by none; none will lend them so much as a hand or a prayer to help them; and, if the Lord do not help, who shall?

Of the kings that came after Antiochus nothing is here prophesied, for that was the most malicious, mischievous enemy to the church; that was a type of the son of perdition, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming, and none shall help him.

CHAPTER XII.

After the prediction of the troubles of the Jews under Antiochus, prefiguring the troubles of the Christian church under the antichristian power, we have here, I. Comforts, and very precious ones, prescribed as cordials for the support of God's people in those times of trouble; and they are such as may indifferently serve both for those former times of trouble under Antiochus and those latter which were prefigured by them, ver. 1—4. II. A conference between Christ and an angel concerning the time of the continuance of these events, designed for Daniel's satisfaction, ver. 5—7. III. Daniel's inquiry for his own satisfaction, ver. 8; and the answer he received to that inquiry, ver. 9—13.

AND at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. 2 And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. 3 And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever. 4 But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

It is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the grievances of the church, to furnish it at the same time with proper antidotes, a remedy for every malady. And no relief is so sovereign, of such general application, so easily accommodated to every case, and of such powerful efficacy, as those that are fetched from Christ and the future state; thence the comforts here are fetched.

First. Jesus Christ shall appear his church's patron and protector. "At that time," when the persecution is at the hottest, "Michael shall stand up," ver. 1. The angel had told Daniel what a fast friend Michael was to the church, ch. x. 21. He all along shewed it in the upper world, the angels knew it; but now "Michael shall stand up" in his providence, and work deliverance for the Jews, "when he sees that their power is gone," Deu. xxxii. 36. Christ is that "great prince," for he is the "Prince of the kings of the earth," Rev. i. 5; and if he stand up for his church who can be against it? But this is not all; at that time, that is, soon after, Michael shall stand up for the working out our eternal salvation, the Son of God shall be incarnate, shall be manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Christ stood for the children of our people when he was made sin and a curse for them, stood in their stead as a sacrifice, bore the curse for them, to bear it from them. He stands for them in the intercession he ever lives to make within the veil; stands up for them, and stands their Friend. And after the destruction of antichrist, of whom Antiochus was a type, Christ shall "stand at the latter day upon the earth," shall appear for the complete redemption of all his.

Secondly. When Christ appears he will recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people. "There shall be a time of trouble;" threatening to all, but ruining to all the implacable enemies of God's kingdom among men; such trouble "as never was since there was a nation." Which is applicable, 1. To the destruction of Jerusalem, which Christ calls (perhaps with an eye to this here) such a "great tribulation as was not since the beginning of the world to this time," Mat. xxiv. 21. This the angel had spoken much of, ch. ix. 26, 27; and it happened about the same time that Christ set up the gospel kingdom in the world, that Michael our prince stands up. Or, 2. To the judgment of the great day, that day that shall burn as an oven, and consume the proud and all that do wickedly; that will be such a day of trouble as never was, to all those whom Michael our prince stands against.

Thirdly. He will work salvation for his people. "At that time thy people shall be delivered," delivered from the mischief and ruin designed them by Antiochus, even all those that were marked for preservation, that were "written among the living," Isa. iv. 3. When Christ comes into the world he will save his spiritual Israel from sin and hell, and will, at his second coming, complete their salvation, even the salvation of as many as were given him, as many as had "their names in the book of life," Rev. xx. 15. They were written there before the world, and will be found written there at the end of the world, when the books shall be opened.

Fourthly. There shall be a distinguishing resurrection of them that "sleep in the dust," ver. 2. 1. When God works deliverance for his people from persecution it is a kind of resurrection. So the Jews' release out of Babylon was represented in vision, Eze. xxxvii., and so the deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus, and other restorations of the church to outward prosperity; they were as life from the dead. Many of them that had long slept in the dust of obscurity and calamity shall then awake, some to that life, and honour, and comfort, that will be lasting, everlasting; but others, that when they return to their prosperity will return to their iniquity, to them it will be a resurrection to shame and contempt, for the prosperity of fools will but expose them and destroy them. 2. When, upon the appearing of Michael our prince, his Gospel is preached, many of them that "sleep in the dust," both Jews and Gentiles, shall be awakened by it, to take upon them a profession of religion, and shall rise out of their heathenism or Judaism; but, since there will be always a mixture of hypocrites with true saints, it is but some of them that are raised to life to whom the Gospel is a "savour of life unto life;" but others will be raised by it "to shame and contempt," to whom the Gospel of Christ will be a "savour of death unto death," and Christ himself set for their fall. The net of the Gospel incloseth both good and bad. But, 3. It must be meant of the general resurrection at the last day. "The multitude of them that sleep in the dust shall awake;" that is, all, which shall be a great many. Or, 'of them that sleep in the dust,' many shall arise to life, and many to shame. The Jews themselves understand this of the resurrection of the dead, at the end of time; and Christ seems to have had an eye to it when he speaks of the "resurrection of life," and the "resurrection of damnation," Jno. v. 29; and upon this the Jews are said by St. Paul to expect a resurrection of the dead both of "the just and of the unjust," Acts xxiv. 15. And nothing could come in more seasonably here; for, under Antiochus's persecution, some basely betrayed their religion, others bravely adhered to it. Now it would be a trouble to them, that when the storm was over they could neither reward the one nor punish the other; this, therefore, would be a satisfaction to them, that they would both be recomrensed according to their works in the resurrection. And the apostle, speaking of the pious Jews that suffered martyrdom under Antiochus, tells us that though they were tortured, yet they "accepted not deliverance," because they "hoped to obtain this better resurrection," Heb. xi. 35.

Fifthly. There shall be a glorious reward conferred on those that, in the day of trouble and distress, being themselves wise, did instruct many. Such were taken particular notice of in the prophecy of the persecution, ch. xi. 33, that they should do eminent service, and yet should "fall by the sword and by flame." Now if there were not another life after this, they would be "of all men most miserable," and therefore we are here assured that they shall be recompensed in "the resurrection of the just," ver. 3. "They that be wise," that be teachers, so some read it,—for teachers have need of wisdom, and they that have wisdom themselves should communicate it to others,—they "shall shine as the brightness of the firmament," shall shine in glory, heavenly glory, the glory of the upper world. And they that by the wisdom they have, and the instructions they give, are instrumental to turn any, especially to "turn many to righteousness," shall shine "as the stars for ever and ever." Note, 1. There is a glory reserved for all the saints in the future state, for all that are wise, wise for their souls and eternity. A man's wisdom now "makes his face to shine," Eccl. viii. 1; but much more in that state where its power shall be perfected and its services rewarded. 2. The more good any do in this world, especially to the souls of men, the greater will be their glory and reward in the other world. They that turn men to righteousness, that "turn sinners from the errors of their ways," and help to "save their souls from death," Jas. v. 6, will share in the glory of those they have helped to heaven, which will be a great addition to their own glory. 3. Ministers of Christ, that have obtained mercy of him to be faithful and successful, and so are made burning and shining lights in this world, shall shine very bright in the other world, shall shine as the stars. Christ is the sun, the Fountain of the lights, both of grace and glory. Ministers, as stars, shine in both, with a light derived from him, and a diminutive light in comparison of him; yet, to those that are earthen vessels, it will be a glory infinitely transcending their deserts. They shall shine as the stars of different magnitudes, some in lesser, others in greater lustre; but, whereas the day is coming when the stars shall fall from heaven as leaves in autumn, these stars shall shine for ever and ever, shall never set, never be eclipsed.

Sixthly. That this prophecy of those times, though sealed up now, would be of great use to them that should live then, ver. 4. Daniel must now "shut up the words, and seal the book," because the time would be long ere these things were accomplished. And that was some comfort, that the Jewish nation, though in the infancy of their return from Babylon, while they were few and weak, they met with obstructions in their work, yet they were not persecuted for their religion till a long time after, when they were grown to some strength and maturity. He must seal the book, because it would not be understood, and therefore would not be regarded, till the things contained in it were accomplished; but he must keep it safe as a treasure of great value laid up for the ages to come, to whom it would be of great service; for "many shall then run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Then this hid treasure shall be opened, and many shall search into it, and dig for the knowledge of it as for silver. They shall "run to and fro" to inquire out copies of it, shall collate them, and see that they be true and authentic; they shall read it over and over, shall meditate upon it and run it over in their minds; discurrent, they shall discourse of it, and talk it over among themselves, and compare notes about it, if by any means they may sift out the meaning of it; and thus "knowledge shall be increased." By consulting this prophecy on this occasion they shall be led to search other Scriptures, which shall contribute much to their advancement in useful knowledge; for "then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord," Hos. vi. 3. Those that would have their knowledge increased must take pains, must not sit still in slothfulness and bare wishes, but run to and fro,—must make use of all the means of knowledge, and improve all opportunities of getting their mistakes rectified, their doubts resolved, and their acquaintance with the things of God improved—to know more, and to know better, what they do know. And let us here see reason to hope that, 1. Those things of God which are now dark and obscure will hereafter be made clear and easy to be understood. Truth is the daughter of time; Scripture prophecies will be expounded by the accomplishment of them, and therefore they are given, and for that explication they are reserved. Therefore they are told us before, that when they do come to pass we may believe. 2. Those things of God which are despised, and neglected, and thrown by as useless, shall be brought into reputation, shall be found to be of great service, and be brought into request; for Divine revelation, however slighted for a time, shall be magnified and made honourable, and above all in the judgment of the great day, when the books shall be opened, and that book among the rest.

5 Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river. 6 And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? 7 And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished. 8 And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things? 9 And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. 10 Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand. 11 And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. 12 Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. 13 But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.

Daniel had been made to foresee the amazing revolutions of states and kingdoms, as far as the Israel of God was concerned in them; in them he foresaw troublous times to the church, suffering, trying times, the prospect of which much affected him, and filled him with concern. Now there were two questions proper to be asked upon this head: When shall the end be? and, What shall the end be? These two questions are asked and answered here in the close of the book; and, though the comforts prescribed in the foregoing verses, one would think, were satisfactory enough, yet for more abundant satisfaction this is added.

First. The question, When the end shall be? is asked by an angel, ver. 5, 6. And, concerning this, we may observe,

1. Who it was that asked the question. Daniel had had a vision of Christ in his glory, the "man clothed in linen," ch. x. 5; but his discourse had been with the angel Gabriel, and now he looks and "behold other two," ver. 5, two angels that he had not seen before; one upon the bank of the river on one side, and the other on the other side, that, the river being between them, they might not whisper to one another, but what they said might be heard. Christ stood "on the waters of the river," ver. 6, "between the banks of Ulai;" it was therefore proper that the angels, his attendants, should stand on either bank, that they might be ready to go, one one way and the other the other way, as he should order them. These angels appeared, 1st. To adorn the vision, and make it the more illustrious, and to add to the glory of the Son of man, Heb. i. 6. Daniel had not seen them before, though it is probable they were there; but now, when they began to speak, he looked up and saw them, Note, The farther we look into the things of God, and the more we converse with them, the more we shall see of those things, and still new discoveries will be made us. They that know much, if they improve it, shall know more. 2nd. To confirm the discovery, that "out of the mouth of two or three witnesses" the word might be established; three angels appeared to Abraham. 3rd. To inform themselves, to hear and ask questions; for the mysteries of God's kingdom are things which the "angels desire to look into," 1 Pet. i. 12; and they are "known to the church," Eph. iii. 10. Now one of these two angels said, When shall the end be? Perhaps they both asked, first one and then the other, but Daniel heard only one.

2. To whom this question was put. To the man clothed in linen, of whom we read before, ch. x. 5. To Christ our great high priest, who "was upon the waters of the river," and whose spokesman or interpreter the angel Gabriel had all this while been. This river was Hiddekel, ch. x. 4, the same with Tigris, the place whereabout many of the events prophesied of would happen; there, therefore, is the scene laid. Hiddekel was mentioned as one of the rivers that watered the garden of Eden, Gen. ii. 14; fitly, therefore, doth Christ stand upon that river, for by him the trees in the paradise of God are watered. Waters signify people, and so his standing upon the waters notes his dominion over all; he "sits upon the flood," Ps. xxix. 10. He "treads upon the waters of the sea," Job ix. 8. And Christ, to shew that this was he in the days of the flesh, walked upon the water," Mat. xiv. 25. He was 'above the waters of the river,' so some read it. He appeared in the air over the river.

3. What the question was. "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Daniel would not ask the question, because he would not pry into what was hidden, nor seem inquisitive concerning the times and the seasons, which the Father has "put in his own power," Acts i. 7; but, that he might have the satisfaction of the answer, the angel put the question in his hearing. Our Lord Jesus sometimes answered the questions which his disciples were afraid or ashamed to ask, Jno. xvi. 19. The angel asked, as one concerned, "How long shall it be?" What is the time prefixed, in the Divine counsels, for the end of these wonders? that is, these suffering, trying times, that are to pass over the people of God. Note, 1st. The troubles of the church are the wonder of angels. They admire that God will suffer his church to be thus afflicted, and yet what good he will do his church by his afflictions. 2nd. Good angels know no more of things to come than God is pleased to discover to them, much less do evil angels. 3rd. The holy angels in heaven are concerned for the church on earth, and lay to heart its afflictions; how much more, then, should we, who are more immediately related to it, and have so much of our peace in its peace! 4th. What answer was returned to it, by him who is indeed the numberer of secrets, and knows things to come.

First. Here is a more general account given of the continuance of these troubles to the angel that made the inquiry, ver. 7, that they shall continue "for a time, times and a half," that is, a year, two years, and half a year, as was before intimated, ch. vii. 25, but the one half of a prophetical week. Some understand it indefinitely, a certain time for an uncertain; it shall be for a time, that is, a considerable time, for times, a longer time yet, double to what it was thought at first it would be, and yet, indeed, it shall be but half a time, or a part of a time; when it is over it shall not seem half so much as was feared. But it is rather to be taken for a certain time; we meet with it in the Revelation, under the title, sometimes, of three days and a half, put for three years and a half; sometimes forty-two months, sometimes one thousand two hundred and sixty days. Now this determination of the time is here, 1*st.* Confirmed by an oath. The man clothed in linen lifted up both his hands to heaven, "and sware by him that lives for ever" and ever, that it shall be so. Thus the mighty angel whom St. John saw is brought in, with a plain reference to this vision here, standing with his "right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the earth," and with his hand lifted up to heaven, swearing "that there shall be no longer delay," Rev. x. 5, 6. This mighty one that Daniel saw stood with both feet on the water, and sware with both hands lifted up. Note, An oath is of use for confirmation. God only is to be sworn by, for he is the proper judge to whom we are to appeal; and lifting up the hand is a very proper and significant sign to be used in a solemn oath. 2*nd.* It is illustrated with a reason. God will suffer him to prevail, "till he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people;" God will suffer him to do his worst, and run his utmost length, and then "all these things shall be finished." Note, God's time to succour and relieve his people is when their affairs are brought to the last extremity; "in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen" that Isaac is saved, just then when he lies ready to be sacrificed. Now the event answered the prediction; Josephus saith expressly, in his book of the wars of the Jews, that Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, surprised Jerusalem by force, and held it three years and six months, and was then cast out of the country by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. Christ's public ministry continued three years and a half, during which time he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, and lived in poverty and disgrace; and then, when his power seemed to be quite scattered at his death, and his enemies triumphed over him, he obtained the most glorious victory, and said, "It is finished."

Secondly. Here is something added more particularly concerning the time of the continuance of these troubles, in what is said to Daniel, ver. 11, 12; where we have, 1*st*. The event fixed from which the time of the trouble is to be dated. From the taking away of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus, and the setting up of the image of Jupiter upon the altar, which was the abomination of desolation. Then they must reckon their troubles to begin indeed, when they were deprived of the benefit of public ordinances; that was to them the beginning of sorrows, that was what they laid most to heart. 2*nd*. The continuance of their trouble. It shall last one "thousand two hundred and ninety days," three years and seven months, or, as some reckon, three years, six months, and fifteen days; and then, it is probable, the daily sacrifice was restored, and the abomination of desolation taken away, in remembrance of which the feast of dedication was observed even to our Saviour's time, Jno. x. 22. Though it do not appear by the history that it was exactly so long to a day, yet it appears that the beginning of the trouble was in the one hundred and forty-fifth year of the Seleucidæ, and the end of it in the one hundred and forty-eighth year; and either the restoring of the sacrifice and the taking away of the image was just so many days after, or some other previous event that was remarkable, which is not recorded. There are many particular times fixed in the Scripture prophecies, which it doth not appear by any history, sacred or profane, that the event answered, and yet no doubt it did punctually, as Isa. xvi. 14. 3*rd*. The completing of their deliverance, or at least a farther advance towards it, which is here set forty-five days after the former, and some think points at the death of Antiochus, one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days after his profaning the temple. "Blessed is he that waits," and comes to that time. It is said, 1 Mac. vi. 16, that Antiochus died in the one hundred and forty-ninth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and, 2 Mac. ix. 28, x. 1, that the Maccabees, under a Divine conduct, recovered the temple and the city. Many good interpreters make these to be prophetical days, that is, so many years, and date them from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; but what events they then fall upon they are not agreed. Others date them from the corruption of the gospel worship by the antichrist, whose reign is confined in the apocalypse to one thousand two hundred and sixty days, that is, years, at the end of which he shall begin to fall; but thirty years after he shall be quite fallen, at the end of one thousand two hundred and ninety days; and whoever lives forty years longer, to one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days, will see glorious times indeed. Whether it looks so far forwards or no, I cannot tell; but this, however, we may learn, (1.) That there is a time fixed for the period of the church's troubles, and the bringing about of her deliverance, and this time will be punctually observed to a day. (2.) That this time must be waited for with faith and patience. (3.) That when it comes it will abundantly recompense us for our long expectation of it. Blessed is he that, having waited long, comes to it at last, for he will then have reason to say, "Lo, this is our God, and we have waited for him."

Secondly. The question, What shall the end be? is asked by Daniel, and an answer given to it. Observe,

1. Why Daniel asked this question. It was because, though he heard what was said to the angel, yet he did not understand it, ver. 8. Daniel was a very intelligent man, and had been conversant in visions and prophecies, and yet here he was puzzled; he did not understand the meaning of the time, times and the part of a time, at least not so clearly, and with so much certainty, as he wished. Note, The best men are often much at a loss in their inquiries concerning Divine things, and meet with that which they do not understand. But the better they are the more sensible they are of their own weakness and ignorance, and the more ready to acknowledge it.

2. What the question was, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" He directs his inquiry, not to the angel that talked with him, but immediately to Christ, for to whom else should we go with our inquiries? What shall be the final issue of these events? what do they tend to? what will they end in? Note, When we take a view of the affairs of this world, and of the church of God in it, we cannot but think what will be the end of these things. We see things move as if they would end in the utter ruin of God's kingdom among men; when we observe the prevalence of vice and impiety, the decay of religion, the sufferings of the righteous, and the triumphs of the ungodly over them, we may well ask, "O my Lord, what will be the end of these things?" But this may satisfy us in general, that all will end well at last. Great is the truth, and will prevail at long run. All opposing rule, principality, and power will be put down, and holiness and love will triumph, and be in honour to eternity. The end, this end, will come.

3. What answer is returned to this question. Besides what refers to the time, ver. 11, 12, of which before, here are some general instructions given to Daniel, with which he is dismissed from farther attendance.

1st. He must content himself with the discoveries that had been made to him, and not inquire any farther. "Go thy way, Daniel;" let it suffice thee that thou hast been admitted thus far to the foresight of things to come, but stop here. "Go thy way" about the king's business again, ch. viii. 27; "Go thy way" and record what thou hast seen and heard for the benefit of posterity, and covet not to see and hear more at present. Note, Communion with God is not our continual feast in this world; we sometimes are taken to be witnesses of Christ's glory, and we say, "It is good to be here;" but we must go down from the mount, and have there no continuing city. Those that know much know but in part, and still see there is a great deal that they are kept in the dark about, and are likely to be so till the veil is rent. Hitherto their knowledge shall go, but no farther; "Go thy way, Daniel," satisfied with what thou hast.

2nd. He must not expect that what had been said to him would be fully understood till it was accomplished. "The words are closed up and sealed," are involved in perplexities, and are likely to be so "till the time of the end," till the end of these things; nay, till the end of all things. Daniel was ordered to "seal the book to the time of the end," ver. 4. The Jews used to say, When Elias cometh he will tell us all things. They are "closed up and sealed," that is, the discovery designed to be made by them is now fully settled and completed. Nothing is to be added to it or taken from it, for it is "closed up and sealed;" ask not, therefore, after more. Nescire velle quæ magister maximus docere non vult erudita inscitia est,—'He has learned much who is willing to be ignorant of those things which the great Teacher does not choose to impart.'

3rd. He must count upon no other, but that as long as the world stands there will still be such a mixture as now we see there is of good and bad in it, ver. 10. We long to see all wheat and no tares in God's field, all corn and no chaff in God's floor; but it will not be till the time of the ingathering, till the winnowing day comes; both must grow together until the harvest. As it has been, so it is and will be; "the wicked shall do wickedly, but the wise shall understand." In this, as in other things, St. John's revelation closeth as Daniel did; Rev. xxii, "He which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he which is holy, let him be holy still." First. There is no remedy but that wicked people will do wickedly; and such people there are and will be in the world to the end of time. "So saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked," 1 Sam. xxiv. 13; and the observation of the moderns saith the same. Ill men will do ill things, and a corrupt tree will never bring forth good fruit; "Do men gather grapes of thorns?" or bring forth good things from an evil treasure in the heart? No, wicked practices are the natural products of wicked principles and dispositions. "Marvel not at the matter" then, Eccl. v. 8. We are told before that "the wicked will do wickedly," we can expect no better from them; but, which is worse, "none of the wicked shall understand." This is either, 1*st*. A part of their sin. They will not understand; they shut their eyes against light, and none so blind as they that will not see; therefore they are wicked because they will not understand. If they did but rightly know the truths of God, they would readily obey the laws of God, Ps. lxxxii. 5. Wilful sin is the effect of willing ignorance; therefore, they will not understand because they are wicked; therefore, they hate the light, and come not to the light, "because their deeds are evil," Jno. iii. 19. Or, 2*nd*. It is a part of their punishment. They will do wickedly, and therefore God hath given them up to blindness of mind, and has said concerning them, "They shall not understand," nor be converted and healed, Mat. xiii. 14, 15. God will not "give them eyes to see," because they will do wickedly, Deu. xxix. 4. Secondly. Yet, as bad as the world is, God will secure to himself a remnant of good people in it. Still there shall be some, there shall be many, to whom the providences and ordinances of God shall be "a savour of life unto life," while to others they are "a savour of death unto death." 1*st*. The providences of God shall do them good. "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried" by their troubles, (compare ch. xi. 35) by the same troubles; which will but stir up the corruptions of the wicked, and make them do more wickedly. Note, The afflictions of good people are designed for their trial; but by these trials they are "purified and made white," their corruptions are purged out, their graces are brightened and made both more vigorous and more conspicuous, and are "found to praise, and honour, and glory," 1 Pet. i. 7. Those that are themselves sanctified and good, to them every event is sanctified, and works for good, and helps to make them better. 2*nd*. The word of God shall do them good. When the wicked understand not, but stumble at the word, the wise shall understand. Those that are wise in practice shall understand doctrine; those that are influenced and governed by the Divine law and love, shall be illuminated with a Divine light; for if any man will do his will he shall know the truth, Jno. vii. 17. "Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser."

4th. He must comfort himself with the pleasing prospect of his own happiness, in death, in judgment, and to eternity, ver. 13. Daniel was now very old, and had been long engaged both in an intimate acquaintance with heaven and a great deal of public business on this earth; and now he must think of bidding farewell to this present state; "Go thou thy way till the end be." First. It is good for us all to think much of going away from this world; we are still going, and must be gone shortly, gone the way of all the earth. That must be our way; but this is our comfort, we shall not go till God calls for us to another world, and till he has done with us in this world, till he saith, "Go thou thy way," thou hast finished thy testimony, done thy work, and accomplished as a hireling thy day. Therefore, now, "Go thou thy way," and leave it to others to take thy room. Secondly. When a good man goes his way from this world he enters into rest. Thou shalt rest from all thy present toils and tosses, and shalt not see the evils that are coming on the next generation. Never can a child of God say more pertinently than in his dying moments, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." Thirdly. Time and days will have an end. Not only our time and days will end very shortly, but all times and days will have an end at length; yet a little while, and time shall be no more, but all its revolutions will be numbered and finished. Fourthly. Our rest in the grave will be but till the end of the days, and then the peaceful rest will be happily disturbed by a joyful resurrection. Job foresaw this when he said of the dead, that "till the heavens be no more" they "shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep," implying that then they shall, Job xiv. 12. Fifthly. We must every one of us "stand in our lot at the end of the days." In the judgment of the great day we must have our allotment according to what we were and what we did in the body, either, Come, ye blessed, or, Go, ye cursed; and we must stand for ever in that lot. It was a comfort to Daniel, it is a comfort to all the saints, that, whatever their lot is in the days of time, they shall have a happy lot in the end of the days, shall have their lot among the chosen. And it ought to be the great care and concern of every one of us to secure a happy lot at last in the end of the days, and then we may well be content with our present lot, welcome the will of God. Sixthly. A believing hope and prospect of a blessed lot in the heavenly Canaan, at the end of the days, will be an effectual support to us when we are going our way out of this world, and will furnish us with living comforts in dying moments.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES
TO THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

WHAT, asks Bishop Newton, is there wanting of external or internal evidence to prove the genuineness and authenticity of the book of Daniel? There is all the external evidence that can well be had or desired in a case of this nature; not only the testimony of the whole Jewish church and nation, who have constantly received this book as canonical, but of Josephus particularly, who recommends him as the greatest of the prophets; of the Jewish Targums and Talmuds, which frequently cite and appeal to his authority; of St. Paul and St. John, who have copied many of the prophecies; of our Saviour himself, who citeth his words, and styleth him Daniel the prophet; of ancient historians, who relate many of the same transactions; of the mother of the seven sons and of the father of the Maccabees, who both recommend the example of Daniel to their sons; of old Eleazar in Egypt, who, praying for the Jews then suffering under the persecution of Ptolemy Philopater, 3 Mac. vii. 6, 7, mentions the deliverance of Daniel out of the den of lions, together with the deliverance of the three men out of the fiery furnace; of the Jewish high priest, who shewed Daniel's prophecies to Alexander the Great, while he was at Jerusalem; and still higher, of Ezekiel, a contemporary writer, who greatly extols his piety and wisdom. Nor is the internal less powerful and convincing than the external evidence; for the language, the style, the manner of writing, and all other internal marks and characters, are perfectly agreeable to that age; and he appears plainly and undeniably to have been a prophet by the exact accomplishment of his prophecies. Indeed, it will entirely overthrow the notion of their being written in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, or of the Maccabees, and will establish the credit of Daniel as a prophet beyond all contradiction, if it can be proved that there are several prophecies of his which have been fulfilled since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabees, as well as before; nay, that there are prophecies of his which are fulfilling in the world at this very time.—And yet, says Scott, in his Commentary, the prophecies of Daniel have, in all succeeding generations, received as undeniable accomplishment as those did which relate to more ancient events. They all take their beginning from about the prophet's days; they all give a concise prophetical history of the church, and of the world as far as immediately connected with it, nearly to the end of time; for even the prophecy of the seventy weeks, though the first coming of the Messiah is the most prominent subject, shews the state of the Jewish nation to this day, and intimates events which have not yet taken place. They all either expressly or by consequence predict four great monarchies, the fourth of which shall last "to the time of the end," "the end of the indignation." They all foretell long continued calamities to the Jewish nation, and to the people of God, at length terminating in the restoration of Israel, and the final and universal triumph of true religion, the kingdom of Christ and of his saints, which must endure to the general resurrection They are not insulated predictions, they all exhibit the same grand outlines of the plan of Providence, to the period of the church's calamities, varied in such a manner as to reflect reciprocal light on each other; and for above two thousand years the most prominent parts of history form the best interpretation of these astonishing prophecies. For farther proofs of the authenticity and genuineness of this book, see Hengstenberg's "Treatise on the Authenticity of Daniel." There is an abridgment of his refutation of neological objections to that book in Horne's Introduction, and a brief account of the direct evidence, by Havernick, in the article Daniel, in Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature.

CHAP. II.—5. The dream, with the interpretation thereof. The king's requisition to the wise men of Babylon, to tell him his dream, in the first instance, before they attempted to interpret it, though, as they alleged in excuse for not doing so, unusual and impossible for mere mortals, was yet founded on profound policy. He justly considered their telling the dream itself as a sure test of the truth of the interpretation afterwards, and which it was not unreasonable to require of them even upon their own principles; because the same Divine power which could communicate to them the interpretation, as they professed, could also communicate to them the dream itself. He did not forget the dream, as generally imagined, from the expression "The thing is gone from me," and which may rather be rendered, with the Septuagint and Arabic, 'The decree is gone forth from me,' and shall not be reversed; or with the Syriac version, 'The decree which I have pronounced is certain,' or unalterable, namely, for putting them all to death, if they could not tell the dream. And this surely was a more consistent reason why the wise men wished to gain time, or suspend the execution of it (ver. 8), and why Daniel, who was involved in their danger, complained, "Why is the decree so hasty from the king?"—Hale's Analysis, ii. 456. 34. A stone was cut without hands. To Henry's comment on these words we add the following:—This the fathers generally apply to Christ himself, who was miraculously born of a virgin without the concurrence of a man; but it should rather be understood of the kingdom of Christ, which was formed out of the Roman empire, not by number of hands, or strength of armies, but without human means and the virtue of second causes. This kingdom was set up by the God of heaven, and from hence the phrase of the kingdom of heaven came to signify the kingdom of the Messiah; and so it was used and understood by the Jews, and so it is applied by our Saviour in the New Testament. Other kingdoms were raised by human ambition and worldly power; but this was the work not of man, but of God; this was truly as it is called the kingdom of heaven, and (Jno. xviii. 36) a kingdom not of this world; its laws, its powers, were all Divine.—Bishop Newton on the Prophecies. "The stone" was entirely distinct from the image, nay directly opposite to it and all its interests; it must therefore mean a kingdom set up by the power of God, without the concurrence of human policy or force, and in opposition to all the authority and combined efforts of the princes of this world.—Scott, in loc. "Cut without hands;" particularly alluding, says A. Clarke, to the spiritual nature of our Lord's kingdom and government, in which no worldly policy, human maxims, or military force, were employed; for it was not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. 44. It shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms. From small beginnings the kingdom of Christ has already made an immense progress; it has subverted, and will continue to subvert, pagan and antichristian kingdoms, and to entirely destroy and disperse them; and at length it will triumph over all opposition, and "become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth." This part of the prophecy yet remains to be accomplished; so that we have in this dream a most extraordinary prophetical abstract of the most signal events which would take place through all succeeding ages, nearly to the consummation of all things. As far as the accomplishment has proceeded it has been most exact and undeniable; and future ages will be filled with astonishment and awe by witnessing this "stone cut out without hands" destroying the remaining toes of this image, and becoming universally triumphant.—Scott. The same excellent commentator observes, 'The kings and conquerors of the earth have in every age kept the nations in a perpetual tumult by their ambitious projects and the revolutions which they have occasioned. Some have been more eminent for wealth, some for power, some for hardy courage and ruinous success; their delight has been in destroying, subduing, breaking in pieces and crushing mankind; one form of tyranny has commonly been superseded by another, still more base and barbarous; and men in general have been groaning under the effects of their contests and vices, yet willingly concurring to support and encourage them! But all human power and prowess tend to decay; many mighty empires have gradually been weakened, till they have been gradually subverted by open enemies or by intestine convulsions.' In the midst of all these events "the God of heaven is setting up his kingdom," not by human might or power, but by his word and Spirit.—In the present times, May, 1848, how remarkable and suggestive are these observations!

CHAP. IV.—30. Is not this great Babylon. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xiii. 1.

CHAP. V.—27. Thou art weighed in the balance. The idea involved in this is sufficiently obvious in itself. But it is by no means impossible that the allusion received more force and meaning than we give to it from a reference to some opinion or custom common among the Babylonians. What that was we cannot say precisely; but probabilities may be suggested by analogies derived from other sources. Thus the Egyptians entertained the belief that the actions of the dead were solemnly weighed in balances before Osiris, and that the condition of the departed was determined according to the preponderance of good or evil. Such judgment scenes are very frequently represented in the paintings and papyri of ancient Egypt.—Pictorial Bible. See wood engraving.

CHAP. VI.—16. Cast into the den of lions. This is a new kind of punishment, observes the editor of the last quoted valuable work, not previously mentioned in Scripture; and that it first occurs here at Babylon is a remarkable fact, shewing the accuracy of the sacred writers in their references to the manners and usages of different nations. We are not aware that any ancient writer mentions that the inhabitants of Babylon were in the habit of throwing offenders to be devoured by lions kept in dens for the purpose. But we have the still more conclusive evidence of monuments brought to light by modern travellers, on the sites not only of Babylon but of Susa also, representing lions destroying and preying upon human beings. Our wood engraving is from a block of white marble found near the tomb of Daniel at Susa, and is thus described: 'It does not exceed ten inches in width and depth, measures twenty in length, and is hollow within, as if to receive some deposit. Three of its sides are cut in bas-relief, two of them with similar representations of a man apparently naked, except a sash round his waist and a sort of cap on his head. His hands are bound behind him. The corner of the stone forms the neck of the figure, so that its head forms one of its ends. Two lions in sitting postures appear on either side at the top, each having a paw on the head of the man.' These are certainly satisfactory illustrations of the custom in question, as existing at Babylon and Susa, and others might be adduced from Babylonian coins.

CHAP. VII.—7. A fourth beast, dreadful and terrible—and it had ten horns. This was doubtless, says Scott, an emblem of the Roman state—the invincible fortitude, hardiness and force of which perhaps were never equalled. By wars and conquests the Romans bore down all opposition, and reduced almost every kingdom or state in the known world into some kind or degree of dependence, drew all the spoil and wealth of many conquered nations to enrich their proud capital, and tyrannized over all that did not quietly yield 'obedience to their authority.' That which the Romans could not quietly enjoy in other countries they would give to other kings and rulers, that at all times when they would they might take it again, which liberality is here called "the stamping of the rest under their feet." This fourth empire was governed in another manner, and by other measures, than any of the preceding, and in process of time it was divided into ten kingdoms. These are indeed reckoned up in several ways by different writers, according to the date assigned to the enumeration; but in general it is clear that the principal kingdoms in Europe at this day sprung from them, and comprise them, excepting some of the more northern regions, and those possessed by the Turks. Mr. Faber's remarks on this point are well worthy the accurate student's attention, and his conclusion from it seems well founded. The historian Machiavel, little thinking what he was doing, reckons up the ten primary kingdoms as follows (we add Bishop Lloyd's dates): 1. The Ostrogoths in Mœsia (377); 2. The Visigoths in Pannonia (378); 3. The Suevi and Alani in Gascoigne and Spain (407); 4. The Vandals in Africa (407); 5. The Franks in France (407); 6. The Burgundians in Burgundy (407); 7. The Heruli and Thuringi in Italy (476); 8. The Saxons and Angles in Britain (476); 9. The Huns in Hungary (526); and 10. The Lombards, first upon the Danube and afterwards in Italy, (483—526.) Here then, upon the testimony of an historian and chronologer, are the ten kingdoms into which the Roman empire was originally divided, and consequently they are the first "ten horns" of which we are in quest.—Faber, vol. i. pp. 170-1. Not that there were constantly ten kingdoms; they were sometimes more, and sometimes fewer; but as Sir Isaac Newton says, (Observations on Daniel,) 'Whatever was their number afterwards, they are still called the ten kingdoms from their first number.' 8. Another little horn. We have seen already that the Roman empire was divided into ten horns or kingdoms, and among them possibly we may find another little horn or kingdom answering in all respects to the character here given. Machiavel himself (a popish historian) will lead us by the hand; for having shewn how the Roman empire was broken and divided by the incursions of the northern nations, he says, 'About this time the bishops of Rome began to take upon them, and to exercise greater authority than they had formerly done. At first, the successors of St. Peter were venerable and eminent for their miracles, and the holiness of their lives; and their examples added daily such numbers to the Christian church, that, to obviate or remove the confusions which were then in the world, many princes turned Christians, and the emperor of Rome being converted among the rest, and quitting Rome, to hold his residence at Constantinople, the Roman empire, as we have said before, began to decline, but the church of Rome augmented as fast.' And so he proceeds to give an account how the Roman empire declined, and the power of the church of Rome increased, first under the Goths, then under the Lombards, and afterwards by the calling in of the Franks. Here then is a little horn springing up among the other ten horns. The bishop of Rome was respectable as a bishop long before, but he did not become a horn properly (which is an emblem of strength and power,) till he became a temporal prince. He was to rise after the others, that is behind them, as the Greek translates it, οπισω αυτων, and as Mr. Mede explains it, so that the ten kings were not aware of the growing up of the little horn till it overtopped them, the word in the original signifying as well behind in place as after in time; as also post in Latin is used indifferently either of place or time. Three of the first horns, that is three of the first kings or kingdoms, were to be plucked up by the roots, and to fall before him. If ever three kingdoms were "plucked up" before a little kingdom, which arose imperceptibly above the ten primary kingdoms, they must be three the names of which occur in the preceding list of Machiavel and Bishop Lloyd; accordingly we find that the kingdom of the Heruli, the kingdom of the Ostrogoths, and the kingdom of the Lombards, were successively eradicated before the little papal horn, which at length became a temporal no less than a spiritual power, at the expense of these three depressed primary states.—Faber. The pope hath in a manner pointed himself out for the person by wearing the triple crown. In other respects, too, the pope fully answers the character of the little horn; so that, if exquisite fitness of application may assure us of the true sense of the prophecy, we can no longer doubt concerning the person. He is a little horn; and the power of the popes was originally very small, and their temporal dominions were little and inconsiderable in comparison with others of the ten horns; and the power of the pope differs greatly from that of all other princes, being an ecclesiastical and spiritual as well as a civil and temporal authority. "And behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man," ver. 8. To denote his cunning and foresight, his looking out and watching all opportunities to promote his own interest; and the policy of the Roman hierarchy hath almost passed into a proverb. The pope is properly an 'overlooker,' or 'overseer,' ἐπισκοπος, or bishop, in the literal sense of the word. (episcopus episcoporum,—'the overseer of overseers.') "He had a mouth speaking very great things," ver. 8, 20. And who hath been more noisy and blustering than the pope, especially in former ages, boasting of his supremacy, thundering out his bulls and anathemas, excommunicating princes, and absolving subjects from their allegiance? "His look was more stout than his fellows," ver. 20. And the pope assumes a superiority not only over his fellow bishops, but even over crowned heads. "And he shall speak great words against the Most High," ver. 25; or, as Symmachus interprets it, 'he shall speak great words as the Most High,' setting up himself above all laws, Divine and human, arrogating to himself godlike attributes and titles of holiness and infallibility, exacting obedience to his ordinances and decrees in preference to, and open violation of, reason and Scripture, insulting men, and blaspheming God. In Gratian's decretals the pope hath the title of 'God' given to him. "And he shall wear out the saints of the Most High," by wars, and massacres, and inquisitions, persecuting and destroying the faithful servants of Jesus and the true worshippers of God, who protest against his innovations, and refuse to comply with the idolatry practised in the church of Rome. "And he shall think to change times and laws;" appointing fasts and feasts, canonizing saints, granting pardons and indulgences for sins, instituting new modes of worship, imposing new articles of faith, enjoining new rules of practice, and reversing at pleasure the laws both of God and men. "And they shall be given into his hand, until a time, and times, and the dividing of time." A time, all agree, signifies a year; and a time and times and the dividing of time, or half a time, are three years and a half. So long, and no longer, as the Romanists conceive, the power of Antichrist will continue; but it is impossible for all the things which are predicted of Antichrist to be fulfilled in so short a space of time; and neither is Antichrist or the little horn a single man, but a kingdom. Single men are not the subjects of his prophecy, but kingdoms. The four kings (ver. 17) are not four single kings, but kingdoms; and so the ten horns or kings (ver. 24) are not ten single kings, but kingdoms; and so likewise the little horn is not a single king, but a kingdom; not a single man, but a succession of men, exercising such powers, and performing such actions, as are here described. We must therefore compute the time according to the nature and genius of the prophetic language. A time, then, and times, and half a time, are three years and a half; and the ancient Jewish year consisting of twelve months, and each month of thirty days, a time and times and half a time, or three years and a half, are reckoned in the Revelation, (xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14,) as equivalent to forty and two months, or a thousand two hundred and threescore days; and a day in the style of the prophets is a year; "I have appointed thee each day for a year," saith God to Ezekiel (iv. 6); and it is confessed, that the seventy weeks in the ninth chapter of Daniel are weeks of years, and consequently twelve hundred and sixty days are twelve hundred and sixty years: (see Supplementary Note on ch. viii. 14.) So long Antichrist or the little horn will continue; but from what point of time the commencement of these twelve hundred and sixty years is to be dated is not so easy to determine.—Bishop Newton. Now, carefully comparing what different expositors have stated concerning this little horn, and the time at which the predicted period of one thousand two hundred and sixty years began, with the prophecies themselves, I am led to conclude, says Scott, that the little horn was in existence for a considerable time before he was possessed either of ecclesiastical or temporal dominion; that he sprang up soon after the empire was divided into ten kingdoms; that though the bishop of Rome even then, nay before, made arrogant claims, yet the little horn was comparatively harmless till, by the decree of Phocas, he was constituted UNIVERSAL BISHOP AND SUPREME HEAD OF THE CHURCH; that by this decree, 'the saints, and the times, and laws, were given into his hand' (ver. 25); he had the power of persecuting and domination, whether he immediately exercised it or not; and that the one thousand two hundred and sixty years are to be dated from his being thus invested with ecclesiastical dominion, and not from his becoming a temporal potentate, which did not occur till a later period. This indeed is the abstract of Mr. Faber's copious argument on this subject.—In a remarkable work, (The Rise and Fall of the Papacy, by Robert Fleming: London, 1701.) the author argues that the periods of one thousand two hundred and sixty days, of forty-two months, and of a time, times and a half, are synchronical, that is, refer exactly to the same period of time, and describe the duration of the antichristian kingdom, and that they are to be understood prophetically, a day being put for a year. Bishop Newton, as has been seen, arrived at the same conclusion with the Presbyterian divine. Mr. Fleming, in stating his opinion respecting the commencement of the one thousand two hundred and sixty prophetical days from which the period of the fall of the papacy may be calculated, presents us with the following scheme:—

	The Prophetical Year.	The Julian Year.
One	360	365
Two	720	730
Half	180	183
Three years and a half	1260	1278

Now, if, according to this computation, we subtract 1260 apocalyptical years from 1278 Julian or Gregorian ones, (I call them so ore rotunda, overlooking the smaller measures of time,) there remain eighteen years to be cut off. We may justly reckon that the papal head took its first rise from that remarkable year six hundred and six, when Phocas did in a manner devolve the government of the west upon him, by giving him the title of universal bishop. Or, if a bare title of this sort be not thought sufficient to constitute the pope head of the beast, we may reckon this two years later, namely, from the year six hundred and eight, when Boniface the Fourth did first publicly authorise idolatry, by dedicating the Pantheon to the worship of the Virgin Mary and all the saints. To apply this, therefore, to our design, (continues Mr. F.,) if we may suppose that Antichrist began his reign in the year 606, the additional one thousand two hundred and sixty years of his duration, were they Julian or ordinary years, would lead us down to the year 1866, as the last period of the seven-headed monster. But, seeing they are prophetical years only, we must cast away eighteen years, in order to bring them to the exact measure of time that the Spirit of God designs in this book. And thus the final period of papal usurpations (supposing that he did indeed rise in the year 606) must conclude with the year 1848.—From the obscurity, however, of prophecy, says Mr. Scott, previous to its fulfilment, we are cautioned not confidently to assign the date of future events; but probably at the end of one thousand two hundred and sixty years from A.D. 606, the glorious events predicted will begin to receive a remarkable accomplishment. Bishop Newton, who dates the commencement of the one thousand two hundred and sixty years from the establishment of the power of the pope as a temporal prince in the eighth century, says, One thousand two hundred and sixty years from that time will lead us down to about the year of Christ 2000, or about the six thousandth year of the world; and there is an (Barnabæ Epist., cap. xv., cum notis cotelerii; Burnet's Theory, b. 3. ch. v.) old tradition, both among Jews and Christians, that at the end of six thousand years the Messiah shall come, and the world shall be renewed, the reign of the wicked one shall cease, and the reign of the saints upon earth shall begin. But, as Irenæus saith in a like case, it is surer and safer to wait for the completion of the prophecy, than to conjecture and to divine (too minutely and confidently) about it. When the end shall come then we shall know better whence to date the beginning. 13, 14. I saw—and behold one like the Son of man—and there was given him dominion. This passage not only shews that the setting up of the everlasting kingdom was to happen in the times of the fourth or Roman monarchy, but also that it would happen when the Son of man would ascend from earth to heaven. The prophet does not represent him as coming in the clouds from heaven to earth, (as at the general judgment,) but as coming with the clouds of heaven from his former residence towards the throne of God, which, according to the Scripture style, is heaven. And this is confirmed by the words immediately following, that "they brought him near before him;" namely, before the Ancient of days.—Maclaurin, quoted by Scott, who adds, When Christ was about to ascend into heaven he said, All power is given to me, in heaven and earth. Then his kingdom began to be set up, and the power of the fourth kingdom to decline,; but it is plain, from the eleventh verse, that the grand event predicted in this passage is his glorious coming to destroy the kingdom of every antichristian power, and to render his own kingdom universal upon earth. "I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame," ver. 11. The beast will be destroyed "because of the great words which the horn spake," and the destruction of the beast will also be the destruction of the horn; and consequently the horn is a part of the fourth beast, or of the Roman empire. "As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away, yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time," ver. 12. When the dominion was taken away from the other beasts, their bodies were not destroyed, they were suffered to continue still in being; but when the dominion shall be taken away from this beast, his body shall totally be destroyed; because other kingdoms succeeded to those, but none other earthly kingdom shall succeed to this.—Bishop Newton.

CHAP. VIII.—2. Shushan in the palace. The chief town of Susiana, and capital of Persia, in which the kings of Persia had their winter residence, Neh. i. 1; Est. i. 25. It was situated on the Eulœus, or Choaspes, probably on the spot now occupied by the village Shus, where are extensive ruins, stretching perhaps twelve miles from one extremity to the other, and consisting, like the other ruins of this region, of hillocks of earth and rubbish, covered with broken pieces of bricks and coloured tile. At the foot of these mounds is the so called tomb of Daniel, a small building erected on the spot where the remains of that prophet are locally believed to rest; but nothing but the belief that this was the site of the prophet's sepulchre could have led to its being built in the place where it stands, (Malcolm's Hist. of Persia, i. 255, 256;) and it may be added that such identifications are of far more value in these parts, where occasion for them is rare, than among the crowded 'holy places' of Palestine. The city of Shus is now a gloomy wilderness, is filled by lions, hyænas, and other beasts of prey. Elam. Probably the same land which was designated Elymus by the Greeks and Romans, and formed a part of the ancient Susiana, the modern Khuristan; but the sacred writers, under the term Elam, comprehended the country of the Persians in general. Ulai. A river which flowed by Susa (Shusan) into the united stream of the Tigris and Euphrates, called by Pliny, Eulœus; by Greek writers Choaspes, and now known by the name of Kerah; called by the Turks, Karasu.—Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature. 5. The goat had a notable horn. This is universally admitted to describe Alexander. It is rather a curious coincidence that, when this conqueror claimed to be the son of Jupiter Ammon, (who was worshipped under the figure of a ram, and who, when represented in the human figure, had ram's horns on his head,) he assumed, as far as he could, the symbols which denoted his assumed parentage, causing his head to be sometimes represented as horned. It is also remarkable that the oriental Mohammedans still recognise the horn of Alexander, without being aware of the origin of the symbol. In their writings he is frequently mentioned by the title of 'The horned,' without any addition.—Pictorial Bible. 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn. M. Henry would have this, as well as the little horn introduced ch. vii. 8, to denote Antiochus Epiphanes. All agree, he says, in this place, that this was Antiochus Epiphanes; but Bishop Newton has shewn that many insuperable objections lie against this interpretation. He and other expositors therefore suppose this little horn to mean the empire of the Romans from the time when they had got footing in Greece and Macedonia, (which formed one horn of the goat.) They then entered on that stage on which these events were to take place throughout the successive ages of the Roman history, including therein Rome's spiritual as well as temporal empire, and the persecutions carried on against the church of Christ throughout all that period, as well as by its rulers of "fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences." With this interpretation of Sir Isaac Newton and Bishop Newton, Mr. Scott the commentator had acquiesced, though not with full satisfaction, till convinced by Mr. Faber's Dissertation on the Prophecies, that the Mohammedan delusion, and not Roman, either pagan or popish, was here pointed out. It appears to me, he says, unaccountable, on mature reflection, that there should be in these concise, yet most comprehensive, prophecies of Daniel so many repeated and particular predictions of the papal delusion in the West, and not a hint of the Mohammedan delusion in the East, the progress and effects of which have been most extensively mischievous, and are specially and separately noted as such by St. John, (Rev. ix.) The Holy Spirit now purposing to describe the exploit of another great enemy to Christianity, recalls, in the vision of the ram and the he-goat, the attention of Daniel to the second and third empires, whose prophetic history had been already detailed, for the purpose of introducing another little horn, which was to come up out of one of the principal horns of the Macedonian beast, as the former little horn sprang up among the ten horns of the Roman beast. The principal reasons for this view may be given as stated in the Commentary of the Religious Tract Society: As the ten-horned beast denoted the western Roman empire, and its little horn the papacy, so the he-goat symbolizes the Eastern or Grecian empire, and its little horn Mohammedanism, both of them being spiritual dominations, and co-existent. The host of heaven, or the church, is given up to its power on account of an apostacy, and we do not find this characteristic applying to any part of the Jewish history, while it is directly applicable to the apostacy which had taken place in the Christian church at the commencement of the seventh century, when the worship of saints and images had become prevalent. At this very period, about A.D. 608, Mohammed began to preach and to collect proselytes, few at first, but soon waxed great. This power corresponds with the characteristics of the little horn, as to place, personal character, and time.—Insomuch, says Faber, that Dr. Prideaux, struck with this wonderful chronological coincidence, could not refrain from exclaiming, that Antichrist seemed at that time to have set both his feet on Christendom together, the one in the East, the other in the West, (i. 256-7.) With regard to the more minute points relative to this little horn, Mohammedanism sprang up in Arabia, behind the Grecian empire; or, as Foster states, the part of Arabia in which it commenced was a province both of the empire of Alexander and of the kingdom of the Ptolemies. It came forth at the period when the apostacy was completed. Small at first, slow indeed, was the progress of Mohammed for many years; it became great towards the south, the east, and Palestine; precisely the directions in which Mohammedanism rapidly spread when it began to increase. This ecclesiastical domination may be fierce of countenance, for its avowed engine of conversion was the sword, and the ferocity of the followers of the false prophet is sufficiently known. It teaches "dark sentences," as is evident to all who look into the Koran. The casting down some of the stars of heaven may import a compulsory apostatizing of some spiritual pastors. The taking away the daily sacrifice is the interruption of the daily spiritual worship of God. Thus, the church having declined from the soundness of gospel truth to superstition and will-worship, a considerable portion should be given up to a remarkable power, rising out of the eastern empire. History shews how this part of the prediction has been fulfilled, as the punishment of a great decline in the Christian church. This false prophet magnified himself against the Prince of the host, teaching that he was himself a greater prophet than Jesus. Mohammedanism became mighty, but not by its own power, relying not on reason, argument, or internal evidence, but upon the extraneous power of the sword. It was 'to cause craft to prosper.' Fraud and perfidy are expressly stated to have been the leading means used by Mohammedanism. 'By peace,' or in a state of security, it was to destroy many. The eastern empire was thus wrapped in peaceful carelessness when invaded by the followers of the false prophet. One peculiarity alone remains to be accomplished. The spiritual domination of this eastern little horn is to be broken without hand. It denotes the destruction of this power; not by earthly force or the sword of violence, but by a Divine power, and that to take place at the great period which all these prophecies indicate—the times of the end, when all antichristian powers are to be destroyed, and the time of universal peace and happiness will commence. 14. Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. So many 'mornings and evenings,' so the word is, so many natural days, says M. Henry, who accordingly gives a literal interpretation of so many days, and applies the prophecy to Antiochus. Whilst this application is otherwise objectionable, we refer the reader to Supplementary Note, ch. viii. 8, for the reasons which justify the computation by years instead of days. We may just add that Moses spoke of the forty years of Israel's wandering in the wilderness, as answering to the forty days employed in searching out the land, (Num. xiv. 24); that Isaiah (xx. 3) appears to have walked three days naked, as a sign of an event to take place three years afterwards; and that in the passage from Eze. (iv. 6), quoted in the above Supplementary Note, the prophet was directed to lie in different postures for certain days as prophetic of events to occur in so many years; and that these, with the reasons previously given, afford sufficient authority for so understanding the terms elsewhere, especially when circumstances appear to require a greater extent of time than the terms literally taken will allow, and when the result harmonises with that of other prophecies. As to the commencement and conclusion of this lengthened period of two thousand three hundred years, we observe, in the words of Mr. Whitaker, as quoted by Mr. Faber, (i. 225), that Daniel states the rise of Mohammed as to take place when the transgressors are come to the fall. St. Paul says that the delusion of the man of sin shall be sent as a punishment, because men "believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness," where surely the same period (that in which the sins of the people call for judgment) is characterised for the rise of the two powers. Now St. John assigns to each of them the same duration, and speaks of the time of their end as the same; and consequently they must begin at the same time, in exact correspondence with each of the separate declarations of the two former writers. If, says Mr. Scott, the one thousand two hundred and sixty years, so often spoken of, began A.D. 606, they must end A.D. 1966; and two thousand three hundred, reckoned backward from that period, will bring us to the year A.C. 334; between which period and the year A.C. 936, Faber considers that the date of the vision is to be fixed. And though we must not place too much confidence on the exactness of such calculations, yet the main points in this argument seem unquestionable. It may perhaps be worthy of notice, continues Scott, that it is now about two thousand three hundred and seventy-three years since Daniel had this vision; and no doubt the end of the two thousand three hundred days or years is not very distant. —After all, the best course appears to be not to rely upon any mere chronological calculation of this period; but, considering the vision to point out the Mohammedan apostacy, to leave the more clear development to events.

CHAP. IX.—24. Anoint the most Holy. To anoint signifies, in general, to consecrate or appoint to some special office. Here it means the consecration or appointment of our blessed Lord, the Holy One of Israel, to be Prophet, Priest, and King; his inauguration especially as King, who, having finished the transgression, sat down on his throne. 25. Know, therefore, and understand. It is certain that the Jews expected the Messiah about the time when Jesus Christ came upon the earth; they must, therefore, have interpreted the prophecy as if the time was then come. And if, as it is probable, the Targum or Jewish commentary on Daniel interpreted it so, this will account for the loss of that Targum, although the Targums on all the other prophets have been preserved. Their expectation is of itself a strong argument that it was founded on a careful calculation of the time, and of their persuasion that it was come.—P. Roberts. The Jews are so sensible of the force of the reasoning from this passage, that they denounce a most terrible curse on all who dare to compute the times.—Religious Tract Society's Commentary. 27. In the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease. "In the midst" means any time between the commencement and completion. It is a remarkable fact that, according to Josephus, the sacrifice and oblation, meaning every offering made by fire, did cease before the city was taken. Indeed, the temple was destroyed twenty-seven days before the latter event.——Notwithstanding some obscurity inseparable from prophecy as distinguished from history, it is undeniable that Daniel foretold that the Messiah would come in rather less than five hundred years from a decree granted for rebuilding Jerusalem. He shewed that he would be put to death by a legal sentence, (for so the word implies,) and he expressly predicted that, in consequence, Jerusalem and the temple would be desolated, and the nation of the Jews exposed to tremendous punishment, of which no termination is mentioned. Within that time Jesus of Nazareth appeared—he answered in every respect to the description given of him by all the prophets—he was put to death as a deceiver—yet vast multitudes became his disciples, and Christianity gained a permanent establishment. After a time Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed, and the state of the Jews to this day is a striking comment on this prediction. How can it then be denied that Daniel spoke by Divine inspiration, or that Jesus is the promised Messiah? Both these important points might be fully demonstrated by this one single prophecy; how much more, when it is only one star, so to speak, in a resplendent constellation, or one among a great number of predictions, all of which combine with united evidence to demonstrate the same good truths.—Scott.

CHAP. XI.—5, 6. Kings of the south—kings of the north. From the recently published Life and Correspondence of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, (a man, on many accounts, to be envied,) it would appear that he entertained difficulties as to the authority of the latter chapters of Daniel, which, he says, (ii. 188,) 'if genuine, would be a clear exception to my canon of interpretation, as there can be no reasonable spiritual meaning made out of the kings of the north and south'—a very objectionable, though not unusual, mode of reasoning on such subjects. Because the Scripture cannot be made to bend to my canon of interpretation, therefore —! Respecting the events referred to in the latter part of this chapter, there has been much diversity of opinion, which, as it is properly an unfulfilled prophecy, is only what we may look for. As to those related in the commencement of the chapter, (and well expounded, on the whole, by M. Henry,) Bishop Newton says, it may be proper to stop here, and reflect a little how particular and circumstantial this prophecy is concerning the kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, from the death of Alexander to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. There is not so complete and regular a series of their kings, there is not so concise and comprehensive an account of their affairs, to be found in any author of those times. The prophecy is really more perfect than any history. No one historian hath related so many circumstances, and in such exact order of time, as the prophet hath foretold them: so that it was necessary to have recourse to several authors, Greek and Roman, Jewish and Christian; and to collect here something from one, and to collect there something from another, for the better explaining and illustrating the great variety of particulars contained in this prophecy. No one could thus declare the times and the seasons but (Acts i. 7) he who hath them in his power. 31—40. And arms shall stand, &c. Thus far the prophecy is clear, and the interpretation satisfactory, but the subsequent part is very difficult, and commentators have differed exceedingly about it. Some have explained the whole of Antiochus Epiphanes, some have made him a type of antichrist, others extend a part of it to the subsequent kings of Syria, while others argue strongly that, as the commencement of the vision certainly is in the East, so the termination must be there also, and that the former, denoted as the wilful king, is Mohammedanism. But to so great a length has the exposition of Matthew Henry on this subject proceeded, that we can afford no space for entering into details, and shall only observe, that our author is not followed by recent commentators in his exposition of it, from the 31st verse onwards. Whatever may be their different views, he is considered in this, as in other parts of his interpretation of the book of Daniel, to have made too much of Antiochus Epiphanes. We refer the inquirer to the writers on prophecy for farther information on these subjects. 40—45. At the time of the end. This part of the prophecy seems to relate to the same times and events with Ezekiel's prophecy concerning Gog of the land of Magog: compare Eze. xxxviii. 2, 15, 4, 5, 16, 8; xxxix. 2, 4. The situation, extraction, army, time of their exploits, particular actions, and the Divine judgments, all correspond: see also Rev. xx. 8, 9. Among the plain characters given of antichrist in this chapter is, that instead of the true God he should worship the god the host, or the guardianship, so the word (Mahuzzim) translated forces and strongholds in ver. 38, 39, signifies; and seems to allude to the worship of the host, angels, images, &c.

CHAP. XII.—4. And knowledge shall be increased. The angel, by way of conclusion, intimated to Daniel that this prophecy would remain obscure, and as "a sealed book," of which little would be understood, "till the time of the end," that is, till the things predicted drew to a conclusion. The fact hath evidenced this to be the case. Immense difficulties have always been acknowledged in many of Daniel's prophecies, and they have been as words shut up even from believers in general. But "at the time of the end many should run to and fro, and knowledge would be increased." In these latter ages many have bestowed great pains in searching into history to illustrate those parts of these prophecies which are already accomplished, and, in comparing them with other Scriptures, to form some judgment of what yet remains to be fulfilled, and thus much light has been thrown on them. As they shall gradually be more and more accomplished, they will be better understood, and future generations will be more surprised and instructed by them than we are. The latter expression of "running to and fro," may refer to the future spread of the Gospel, by the active labours of faithful ministers, by the exertions of Missionary and Bible Societies, and of Christian men through the press, which will make way for the fulfilment of the remaining prophecies, by increasing in the world the knowledge of Divine truth.—T. Scott. The proper conclusion to the great revolutions which the prophet had been predicting is the general resurrection, which the beginning of this chapter explicitly declares. And the whole concludes with a notation of the time when these great events which he had principally in view were to have their final consummation; when the Jews were to be restored, Antichrist destroyed, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, and the millennium or reign of saints to begin. But the precise time, till Providence opens more of the seals, cannot be fully ascertained. We see, however, that the same term (one thousand two hundred and sixty years) is fixed for the oppression of the eastern church by Mohammed, (ver. 6, 7,) and for the tyranny of the western church by the little horn, ch. vii. 25. And it is very remarkable that the doctrine of Mohammed was first forged at Mecca, and the supremacy of the pope established by a grant from the tyrant Phocas, in the very same year of Christ, 606; though neither arrived at their full height of power till a considerable time thereafter: see Supplementary Note on ch. vii. 20. But the precise time of the beginning or ending of the periods here mentioned the event only can tell with certainty. On such subjects modesty and prudence direct us to be silent. On the whole, however, we may observe what an amazing prophecy that is, comprehending such various and great events, and extending through so many ages; from the first establishment of the Persian empire, about five hundred and thirty years before Christ, to the general resurrection! What a proof of a Divine providence, and of a Divine revelation! for who could thus declare the things that shall be, with their times and seasons, but he only who hath them in his power; whose dominion is over all, and whose kingdom endureth from generation to generation.—Dr. J. Smith.

OF THE

PROPHECY OF HOSEA,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We have now before us, I. The twelve minor prophets; which some of the ancients, in reckoning up the books of the Old Testament, put all together, and reckon but as one book. They are called the lesser prophets, not because their writings are of any less authority or usefulness than those of the greater prophets, or as if these prophets were less in God's account, or might be so in ours, than the other; but only because they are shorter, and less in bulk than the other. We have reason to think that these prophets preached as much as the other, but they did not write so much, nor is so much of their preaching kept upon record. Many excellent prophets wrote nothing, and others but little, who yet were very useful in their day. And so in the Christian church there have been many burning and shining lights, who are not known to posterity by their writings, and yet were no way inferior in gifts and graces, and serviceableness, to their own generation, than those that are; and some that have left but little behind them, and make no great figure among authors, yet were as valuable men as the more voluminous writers. These twelve small prophets, Josephus saith, were put into one volume by the men of the great synagogue in Ezra's time, of which learned and pious body of men the last three of these twelve prophets are supposed to have been themselves members; these are what remained of the scattered pieces of inspired writings. Antiquaries value the fragmenta veterum,—'the fragments of antiquity;' these are the fragments of prophecy, which are carefully gathered up by the Divine providence, and the care of the church, that nothing might be lost; as St. Paul's short epistles after his long ones. The son of Sirach speaks of these twelve prophets with honour, as men that strengthened Jacob, Eccl. xlix. 10. Nine of these prophets prophesied before the captivity, and the last three after the return of the Jews to their own land. Some difference there is in the order of these books. We place them as the ancient Hebrew did, and all agree to put Hosea first; but the ancient Septuagint place the first six in this order, Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, and Jonah. The thing is not material; and if we covet to place them according to their seniority, as to some of them we shall find no certainty. II. We have before us the prophecy of Hosea, who was the first of all the writing prophets, somewhat before Isaiah; the ancients say he was of Beth-shemesh, and of the tribe of Issachar. He continued very long a prophet; the Jews reckon he prophesied near fourscore and ten years; so that, as Jerome observes, he prophesied of the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes when it was at a great distance, and lived himself to see and lament it, and to improve it when it was over, for warning to its sister kingdom. The scope of his prophecy is to discover sin, and to denounce the judgments of God against a people that would not be reformed; the style is very concise and sententious, above any of the prophets; and in some places it seems to be like the book of Proverbs, without connexion, and rather to be called Hosea's sayings than Hosea's sermons,—and a weighty adage may sometimes do more service than a laboured discourse. Huetius observes, that many passages in the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel seem to refer to, and to be borrowed from, the prophet Hosea, who wrote a good while before them; as Jer. vii. 34, xvi. 9, xxv. 10, and Eze. xxvi. 13, speak the same with Ho. ii. 11, so Eze. xvi. 16, &c., is taken from Ho. ii. 8; and that promise of "serving the Lord their God, and David their king," Jer. xxx. 8, 9, Eze. xxxiv. 23, Hosea had before, ch. iii. 5; and Eze. xix. 12, is taken from Ho. xiii. 15. Thus one prophet confirms and corroborates another; and all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit.

A.D. 3219. B.C. 785.

CHAPTER I.

The mind of God is revealed to his prophet, and by him to the people, in the first three chapters, by signs and types; but afterwards only by discourse. In this chapter we have, I. The general title of the whole book, ver. 1. II. Some particular instructions he was ordered to give to the people of God. 1. He must convince them of their sin in going a whoring from God, by marrying a wife of whoredoms, ver. 2, 3. 2. He must foretell the ruin coming upon them for their sin, in the names of his sons, which signified God's disowning and abandoning them, ver. 5—9. 3. He must speak comfortably to the kingdom of Judah, which still retained the pure worship of God, and assure them of the salvation of the Lord, ver. 7. 4. He must give an intimation of the great mercy God had in store both for Israel and Judah in the latter days, ver. 10, 11; for in this prophecy many precious promises of mercy are mixed with the threatenings of wrath.

THE word of the LORD that came unto Hosea, the son of Beeri, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.

Here is, First. The prophet's name and surname, which he himself, as the other prophets, prefixeth to his prophecy for the satisfaction of all, that he is ready to attest what he writes to be of God; he sets his hand to it, as that which he will stand by. His name Hosea, or Hoshea, for it is the very same with Joshua's original name, signifies a saviour; for prophets were instruments of salvation to the people of God. So are faithful ministers; they help to save many a soul from death, by saving it from sin. His surname was Ben-beeri, or the son of Beeri. As with us now, so with them then, some had their surname from their place, as Micah the Morashite, Nahum the Elkoshite; others from their parents, as Joel the son of Bethuel, and here Hosea the son of Beeri. And perhaps they made use of that distinction when the eminency of their parents was such as would bring honour upon them; but it is a groundless conceit of the Jews that where a prophet's father is named he also was a prophet. Beeri signifies a well, which may put us in mind of the fountain of life and living waters from which prophets are drawn, and must be continually drawing.

Secondly. Here is his authority and commission; "The word of the Lord came to him." It was to him, it came with power and efficacy to him; it was revealed to him as a real thing, and not a fancy or imagination of his own; in some such way as God then discovered himself to his servants the prophets. What he said and wrote was by Divine inspiration; it was "by the word of the Lord," as St. Paul speaks concerning that which he had purely by revelation, 1 Thes. iv. 15. Therefore this book was always received among the canonical books of the Old Testament, which is confirmed by what is quoted out of it in the New Testament, Mat. ii. 15; ix. 13; xii. 7; Rom. ix. 25, 26; 1 Pet. ii. 10. For the word of the Lord endures for ever.

Thirdly. Here is a particular account of the times in which he prophesied. "In the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel." We have only this general date of his prophecy, and not the date of any particular part of it, as before in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and afterwards in Haggai and Zechariah. Here is only one king of Israel named, though there were many more within this time, because, having mentioned the kings of Judah, there was no necessity for naming the others; and they being all wicked, he took no pleasure in naming them, nor would do them the honour. Now by this account here given of the several reigns in which Hosea prophesied, (and it should seem the word of the Lord still came to him more or less at times, throughout all these reigns,) it appears,

1. That he prophesied a long time; that he began when he was very young, which gave him the advantage of strength and sprightliness; and that he continued at his work till he was very old, which gave him the advantage of experience and authority. It was a great honour to him to be thus long employed in such good work, and a great mercy to the people to have a minister so long among them that so well knew their state and naturally cared for it; one they had been long used to, and therefore was the more likely to be useful to them. And yet, for aught appears, he did little good among them; the longer they enjoyed him the less they regarded him. They despised his youth first, and afterwards his age.

2. That he passed through a variety of conditions. Some of these kings were very good, and, it is likely, countenanced and encouraged him; others very bad, who, we may suppose, frowned upon him and discouraged him; and yet he was still the same. God's ministers must expect to pass through honour and dishonour, evil report and good report, and must resolve in both to hold fast their integrity, and keep close to their work.

3. That he began to prophesy at a time when the judgments of God were abroad, when God was himself contending in a more immediate way with that sinful people, who fell into the hands of the Lord, before they were turned over into the hands of man. For in the days of Uzziah, and of Jeroboam, his contemporary, the dreadful earthquake was, mentioned Zec. xiv. 5; Am. i. 1. And then was the plague of locusts, Joel i. 2—4; Am. vii. 1; Hos. iv. 3. The rod of God is sent to enforce the word, and the word of God is sent to explain the rod; yet neither prevail till God by his Spirit opens the ear to instruction and discipline.

4. That he began to prophesy in Israel at a time when their kingdom was in a flourishing, prosperous condition, for so it was in the reign of Jeroboam the Second, as we find 2 Kin. xiv. 25, "He restored the coast of Israel." And God saved them by his hand; yet then Hosea boldly tells them of their sins, and foretells their destruction. Men are not to be flattered in their sinful ways, because they prosper in the world, but even then must be faithfully reproved, and plainly told that their prosperity will not be their security, nor will it last long, if they go on still in their trespasses.

2 The beginning of the word of the LORD by Hosea. And the LORD said to Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms: for the land hath committed great whoredom, departing from the LORD. 3 So he went and took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son. 4 And the LORD said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel. 5 And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. 6 And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call her name Lo-ruhamah: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away. 7 But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the LORD their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen.

These words, "The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea," may refer either, 1. To that glorious set of prophets which was raised up about this time. At this time there lived and prophesied, Joel, Amos, Micah, Jonah, Obadiah, and Isaiah; but Hosea was the first of them that foretold the destruction of Israel: the "beginning of this word of the Lord" was by him. We read in the history of this Jeroboam here named, (2 Kin. xiv. 27,) that the Lord had not yet said he would blot out the name of Israel; but soon after he said he would, and Hosea was the man that began to say it, which made it so much the harder task to him, to be the first that should carry an unpleasing message, and some time before any were raised up to second him. Or, rather, 2. To Hosea's own prophecies. This was the first message God sent him upon to this people, to tell them that they were "an evil and an adulterous generation." He might have desired to be excused from dealing so roughly with them till he had gained authority and reputation, and some interest in their affections. No, he must begin with this, that they might know what to expect from a prophet of the Lord. Nay, he must not only preach this to them, but he must write it, and publish it, and leave it upon record, as a witness against them. Now here,

First. The prophet must, as it were in a looking-glass, shew them their sin; and shew it them to be exceedingly sinful, exceedingly hateful. The prophet is ordered to take unto him "a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms," ver. 2; and he did so, ver. 3. He married a woman of ill fame, "Gomer the daughter of Diblaim;" not one that had been married and had committed adultery, for then she must have been put to death, but one that had lived scandalously in the single state. To marry such a one was not malum in se,—'evil in itself,' but only malum per accidens,—'incidentally an evil,' not prudent, decent or expedient, and therefore forbidden to the priests; and which, if it were really done, would be an affliction to the prophet, (it is threatened as a curse on Amaziah that his wife should be a harlot, Am. vii. 17,) but not a sin, when God commanded it for a holy end; nay, if commanded, it was his duty, and he must trust God with his reputation. But most think it was done in vision, or that it is no more than a parable, and that was a way of teaching commonly used among the ancients, particularly the prophets; what they meant of others they "transferred to themselves in a figure," as St. Paul speaks, 1 Cor. iv. 6. He must take a wife of whoredoms, and have such children by her as every one would suspect, though born in wedlock, to be children of whoredoms begotten in adultery; because it is too common for those that have lived lewdly in the single state to live no better in the married state. Now, (saith God,) Hosea, this people is to thee such a dishonour, and such a grief and vexation, as a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms, would be to thee; "for the land has committed great whoredom." In all instances of wickedness they had departed from the Lord, but their idolatry especially is the whoredom they are here charged with. Giving that glory to any creature which is due to God alone is such an injury and affront to God as for a wife to embrace the bosom of a stranger is to her husband. It is especially so in those that have made a profession of religion, and have been taken into covenant with God; it is breaking the marriage bond, it is a heinous, odious sin, and as much as any other besots the mind and takes away the heart. Idolatry is great whoredom, worse than any other; it is departing from the Lord, to whom we lie under greater obligations than any wife doth or can do to a husband. The land has committed whoredom; it is not here and there a particular person that is guilty of idolatry, but the whole land is polluted with it; the sin is become national, the disease epidemical. What an odious thing would it be for the prophet, a holy man, to have a whorish wife, and children whorish like her? What an exercise would it be of his patience; and, if she persisted in it, what other could be expected but that he should give her a bill of divorce? And is it not then much more offensive to the holy God, to have such a people as this to be called by his name, and have a place in his house? How great is his patience with them, and how justly may he cast them off! It was as if he should have married Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, who probably was at that time a noted harlot. The land of Israel was like Gomer the daughter of Diblaim. Gomer signifies, 'corruption;' Diblaim signifies, 'two cakes or lumps of figs.' This notes that Israel was near to ruin, and that their luxury and sensuality was the cause of it; they were as "the evil figs that could not be eaten, they were so evil." It speaks sin the daughter of plenty, and destruction the daughter of the abuse of plenty. Some give this sense of the command here given to the prophet, Go, take thee a wife of whoredoms, for if thou shouldst go to seek for an honest, modest woman, thou wouldst not find any such, for the whole land and all the people of it is given to whoredom, the usual concomitant of idolatry.

Secondly. The prophet must, as it were through a perspective glass, shew them their ruin; and this he doth in the names given to the children born of this adulteress; for, as lust when it has conceived bringeth forth sin, so sin when it is finished bringeth forth death.

1. He foretells the fall of the royal family, in the name he is appointed to give to his first child, which was a son; "Call his name Jezreel," ver. 4. We find that the prophet Isaiah gave prophetical names to his children, Isa. vii. 3, viii. 3, so this prophet here. Jezreel signifies the seed of God, so they should have been; but it signifies also the scattered of God: they shall be as sheep on the mountains, that have no shepherd. Call them not Israel, which signifies dominion, they have lost all the honour of that name; but call them Jezreel, which signifies dispersion, for they that have departed from the Lord will wander endlessly. Hitherto they have been scattered as seed; let them now be scattered as chaff. Jezreel was the name of one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel. It was a beautiful city, seated in a pleasant valley, and it is with allusion to that city that this child is called Jezreel; for "yet a little while and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu." Observe here,

1st. Who it is that God has a controversy with. It is the house of Jehu, from whom the present king, Jeroboam, was lineally descended. The house of Jehu smarted for the sins of Jehu; for God often lays up men's iniquity for their children, and visits it upon them. It is "the kingdom of the house of Israel," which may be meant either of the present royal family, that of Jehu, which God did presently cause to cease, (for the son of this Jeroboam, Zechariah, reigned but six months, and he was the last of Jehu's race,) or of the whole kingdom in general, which continued corrupt and wicked, and which was made to cease in the reign of Hoshea, about seventy years after, and with God that is but a little while. Note, Neither the pomp of kings nor the power of kingdoms can secure them from God's destroying judgments, if they continue to rebel against him.

2nd. What is the ground of this controversy. "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu;" that is, the blood which Jehu shed at Jezreel when, by commission from God, and in obedience to his command, he utterly destroyed the house of Ahab, and all that were in alliance with it, with all the worshippers of Baal. God approved of what he did; 2 Kin. x. 30, "Thou hast done well, in executing that which is right in mine eyes;" and yet here God will avenge that blood upon the house of Jehu, when the time is expired during which it was promised his family should reign, even to the fourth generation. But how comes the same action to be both rewarded and punished? Very justly. The matter of it was good; it was the execution of a righteous sentence passed upon the house of Ahab, and as such it was rewarded. But Jehu did it not in a right manner: he aimed at his own advancement, not at the glory of God, and mingled his own resentments with the execution of God's justice; he did it with a malice against the sinners, but not with any antipathy to the sin, for he kept up the worship of the golden calves, and "took no heed to walk in the law of God," 2 Kin. x. 31; and therefore, when the measure of the iniquity of his house was full, and God came to reckon with them, the first article in the account is (and being first it is put for all the rest) for the blood of the house of Ahab, here called the blood of Jezreel. Thus, when the house of Baasha was rooted out, it was because he did "like the house of Jeroboam, and because he killed him," 1 Kin. xvi. 7. Note, Those that are intrusted with the administration of justice are concerned to see to it that they do it from a right principle, and with a right intention, and that they do not themselves live in those sins which they punish in others, lest even their just executions should be reckoned for another day as little less than murders.

3rd. How far the controversy shall proceed. It shall be, not a correction, but a destruction. Some make those words, 'I will visit or appoint the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu,' to signify, not as we read it, the revenging of that bloodshed, but the repeating of that bloodshed; I will punish the house of Jehu as I punished the house of Ahab, because Jehu did not take warning by the punishment of his predecessors, but trod in the steps of their idolatry. And after the house of Jehu is destroyed, "I will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel;" that is, I will begin to bring it down, though now it flourish. After the death of Zechariah, the last of the house of Jehu, the kingdoms of the ten tribes went to decay and dwindled insensibly. And, in order to the ruin of it, it is threatened, ver. 5, "I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel;" 'the strength of the warriors of Israel,' so the Chaldee. God will disable them, either to defend themselves, or to resist their enemies. As the bow abiding in strength, and being renewed in the hand, speaks a growing power, so the breaking of the bow speaks a sinking, ruined power. The bow shall be broken in the valley of Jezreel, where probably the armoury was; or, it may be, in that valley some battle was fought, wherein the kingdom of Israel was very much weakened. Note, There is no fence against God's controversy. When he comes forth against a people, their strong bows are soon broken, and their strongholds broken down. In the valley of Jezreel they shed that blood which the righteous God would in that very place avenge upon them; as some notorious malefactors are hanged in chains where the villany they suffer for was perpetrated, that the punishment may answer the sin.

2. He foretells God's abandoning the whole nation, in the name he gives to the second child. This was a daughter, as the former was a son, to intimate that both sons and daughters had corrupted their way. Some make it to signify that Israel grew effeminate, and was thereby enfeebled and made weak. Call the name of this daughter Lo-ruhamah, that is, "not beloved," so it is translated, Rom. ix. 25; or, "not having obtained mercy," so it is translated, 1 Pet. ii. 10; it comes all to one. This reads the doom of the house of Israel; "I will no more have mercy" upon them. This intimates that God had shewed them great mercy, but they had abused his favours, and forfeited them, and now he would shew them favour no more. Note, Those that forsake their own mercies for lying vanities have reason to expect that their own mercies should forsake them, and that they should be left to their lying vanities, Jonah ii. 8. Sin turns away the mercy of God, even from the house of Israel, his own professing people, whose case is sad indeed when God saith he will no more have mercy upon them. And then it follows, "I will utterly take them away;" will utterly remove them, so some; will utterly pluck them up, so others. Note, When the streams of mercy are stopped we can expect no other but that the vials of wrath should be opened. Those whom God will no more have mercy upon shall be utterly taken away, as dross and dung. The word for taking away sometimes signifies to forgive sin, and some take it in that sense here. 'I will no more have mercy upon them, though in pardoning I have pardoned them heretofore.' Though God has borne long, he will not bear always with a people that hate to be reformed. Or, 'I will no more have mercy upon them, that I should in any wise pardon them;' or, (as our margin reads it,) 'that I should altogether pardon them.' If pardoning mercy is denied, no other mercy can be expected, for that opens the door to all the rest. Some make this to speak comfort, 'I will no more have mercy upon them, till in pardoning I shall pardon them;' that is, till the Redeemer comes to Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob. The Chaldee reads it, 'But if they repent, in pardoning I will pardon them.' Even the greatest sinners, if in time they bethink themselves and return, will find that there is forgiveness with God.

Thirdly. He must shew them what mercy God had in store for the house of Judah, at the same time that he was thus contending with the house of Israel; ver. 7, "But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah." Note, Though some are justly cast off for their disobedience, yet God will always secure to himself a remnant that shall be the vessels and monuments of mercy. When Divine justice is glorified in some, yet there are others in whom free grace is glorified. And though some, through unbelief, are broken off, yet God will have a church in this world till the end of time. It aggravates the rejection of Israel, that God will have mercy on Judah, and not on them; and magnifies God's mercy to Judah that, though they also had done wickedly, yet God did not reject them as he rejected Israel. "I will have mercy upon them, and will save them." Note, Our salvation is owing purely to God's mercy, and not to any merit of our own. Now,

1. This, without doubt, refers to the temporal salvations which God wrought for Judah in a distinguishing way, the favours shewed to them, and not to Israel. When the Assyrian armies had destroyed Samaria, and carried the ten tribes away into captivity, they proceeded to besiege Jerusalem; but God had mercy on the house of Judah, and saved them, by the vast slaughter which an angel made in one night in the camp of the Assyrians. Then they were saved by the Lord their God immediately, and not by sword or bow, when the ten tribes were continued in their captivity, and their land was possessed by others; when, being utterly taken away, God had mercy on the house of Judah, and saved them, and after seventy years brought them back, "not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts," Zec. iv. 6. "I will save them by the Lord their God," that is, by myself. God will be exalted in his own strength, will take the work into his hands. That salvation is sure which he undertakes to be the author of, for, if he will work, none shall hinder; and that salvation is most acceptable which he doth by himself. So the Lord alone did lead him. The less there is of man in any salvation, and the more of God, the brighter it shines, and the sweeter it tastes. 'I will save them in the word of the Lord,' so the Chaldee, for the sake of Christ, the eternal Word, and by his power. "I will save them, not by bow, nor by sword;" that is, 1st. They shall be saved, when they are reduced to so low an ebb that they have neither bow nor sword to defend themselves with, Jud. v. 8; 1 Sam. xiii. 22. 2nd. They shall be saved by the Lord, then when they are brought off from trusting to their own strength and their weapons of war, Ps. xliv. 6. 3rd. They shall be saved easily, without the trouble of sword and bow, Isa. ix. 5. I will save them by the Lord their God. In calling him their God, he upbraids the ten tribes who had cast him off from being theirs, for which reason he had cast them off, and intimates what was the true reason why he had mercy, distinguishing mercy, for the house of Judah, and saved them: it was in pursuance of his covenant with them as the Lord their God, and in recompense for their faithful adherence to him, and to his word and worship. But,

2. This may refer also to the salvation of Judah from idolatry, which qualified and prepared them for their other salvations. And this is indeed a salvation "by the Lord their God;" it is wrought only by the power of his grace, and can never be wrought by sword or bow. Just at the time that the kingdom of Israel was utterly taken away under Hosea, the kingdom of Judah was gloriously reformed under Hezekiah, and was therefore preserved. And in Babylon God saved them from their idolatry first, and then from their captivity.

3. Some make this promise to look forward to the great salvation which in the fulness of time was to be wrought out by the Lord our God, Jesus Christ, who came into the world to save his people from their sins.

8 Now when she had weaned Lo-ruhamah, she conceived, and bare a son. 9 Then said God, Call his name Lo-ammi: for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. 10 Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. 11 Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel.

We have here a prediction,

First. Of the rejection of Israel for a time, which is signified by the name of another child that Hosea had by his adulterous spouse, ver. 8, 9. And still we must observe that those children whose names carried these direful omens in them to Israel were all "children of whoredoms," ver. 2, all born of that harlot that Hosea married, to intimate that the ruin of Israel was the natural product of the sin of Israel. If they had not first revolted from God, they had never been rejected by him. God never leaves any till they first leave him. Here is,

1. The birth of this child. "When she had weaned" her daughter, "she conceived and bare a son." Notice is taken of the delay of the birth of this child, which was to carry in its name a certain presage of their utter rejection; to intimate God's patience with them, and his lothness to proceed to extremity. Some think her bearing another son signifies that, by people's persisting in their wickedness, lust still conceived and brought forth sin. They 'added to do evil,' so the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it. They were old in adulteries, and obstinate.

2. The name given him. "Call him Lo-ammi;" that is, "Not my people." When they were told that God would no more have mercy on them, they regarded it not, but buoyed up themselves with this conceit, that they were God's people, whom he could not but have mercy on; and therefore here he plucks that staff from under them, and disowns all relation to them; "Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God." 'I will not be yours,' so the word is; I will be in no relation to you, will have nothing to do with you; I will not be your king, your father, your patron, and protector. We supply it very well with that which includes all; "I will not be your God." I will not be to you what I have been, nor what you vainly expect I should be; nor what I would have been, if you had kept close to me. Observe, "You are not my people;" that is, you do not carry it as becomes my people; you are not observant of me, and obedient to me, as my people should be; you are not my people, but the people of this and the other dunghill deity, and therefore I will not own you for my people, will not protect you, will not put in any claim to you, nor demand you, nor deliver you out of the hands of those that have seized you. Let them take you, you are none of mine; you will not have me to be your God, but pay your homage to the pretenders, and therefore I will not be your God; you shall have no interest in me, shall expect no benefit by me. Note, Our being taken into covenant with God is owing purely to him and to his grace, for then it begins on his side; "I will be to them a God," and then they shall "be to me a people;" "we love him because he first loved us." But our being cast out of covenant is owing purely to ourselves, and our own folly. The breach is on man's side; "You are not my people," and therefore "I will not be your God." If God hates any, it is because they first hated him. This was fulfilled in Israel, when they were utterly taken away into the land of Assyria, and their place knew them no more. They were no longer God's people, for they lost the knowledge and worship of him; no prophets were sent them, no promises made them, as were to the two tribes in their captivity. Nay, they were no longer a people, but, for aught appears, were mingled with the nations into which they were carried, and lost among them.

Secondly. Of the reduction and restoration of Israel in the fulness of time. Here, as before, mercy is remembered in the midst of wrath; the rejection, as it shall not be total, so it shall not be final; ver. 10, 11, "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea." See how the same hand that wounded is stretched forth to heal, and how tenderly he that has torn binds up. Though God cause grief by his threatenings, yet he will have compassion, and will gather with everlasting kindness. They are very precious promises that are here made concerning the Israel of God, and which may be of use to us now.

1. Some think these promises had their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when many of the ten tribes joined themselves to Judah, and took the benefit of the liberty which Cyrus proclaimed, came up in great numbers out of the several countries into which they were dispersed, to their own land, appointed Zerubbabel their head, and coalesced into one people, whereas before they had been two distinct nations. And in their own land, where God had, by his prophets, disowned and rejected them as none of his, he would by his prophets own them and appear for them as his children; and from all parts of the country they shall come up to the temple to worship. And we have reason to think that, though this promise has a farther reference, yet it was graciously intended, and piously used, for the support and comfort of the captives in Babylon, as giving them a general assurance of mercy God had in store for them and their land. Their nation could not be destroyed so long as this blessing was in it, was in reserve for it.

2. Some think these promises will not have their accomplishment, at least not in full, till the general conversion of the Jews in the latter days, which is expected yet to come, when the vast incredible numbers of Jews, that are now dispersed as the sand of the sea, shall be brought to embrace the faith of Christ, and be incorporated in the gospel church. Then, and not till then, God will own them as his people, his children, even there where they had lain under the dismal tokens of their rejection. The Jewish doctors look upon this promise as not having had its accomplishment yet. But,

3. It is certain this promise had its accomplishment in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, by the preaching of the Gospel, and the bringing in both of Jews and Gentiles to it; for to this these words are applied by St. Paul, Rom. ix. 25, 26; and by St. Peter, when he writes to the Jews of the dispersion, 1 Pet. ii. 10. Israel here is the gospel church, the spiritual Israel, Gal. vi. 16; all believers who follow the steps, and inherit the blessing, of faithful Abraham, who is the father of all that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, Rom. iv. 11, 12. Now let us see what is promised concerning this Israel:

1st. That it shall greatly multiply, and the numbers of it be increased. It shall be "as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured, nor numbered." Though Israel, according to the flesh, be diminished and made few, the spiritual Israel shall be numerous, shall be innumerable. In the vast multitudes that, by the preaching of the Gospel, have been brought to Christ, both in the first ages of Christianity and ever since, this promise is fulfilled—thousands out of every tribe of Israel, and out of other nations, "a multitude which no man can number," Rev. vii. 4, 9; Gal. iv. 27. In this the promise made to Abram, when God called him Abraham, the high father of a multitude, had its full accomplishment, Gen. xvii. 5, and then Gen. xxii. 17. Some observe that they are here compared to the sand of the sea, not only for their numbers, but, as the sand of the sea serves for a boundary to the waters, that they shall not overflow the earth, so the Israelites indeed are a wall of defence to the places where they live, to keep off judgments. God can do nothing against Sodom while Lot is there.

2nd. That God will renew his covenant with the gospel Israel, and will incorporate it a church to himself, by as full and ample a charter as that whereby the Old Testament church was incorporated; nay, and its privileges shall be much greater. "In the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people," there shall ye be again admitted into covenant, and owned as my people. The abandoned Gentiles, in their respective places, and the rejected Jews in theirs, shall be favoured and blessed. There, where the fathers were cast off for their unbelief, the children upon their believing shall be taken in. This is a blessed resurrection, the making of those the people of God that were not a people. Nay, but the privilege is enlarged; now it is not only, Ye are my people, as formerly, but, "Ye are the sons of the living God," whether by birth ye were Jews or Gentiles. Israel under the law was God's son, his firstborn, but then they were as children under age; but now, under the Gospel, they are grown up both to greater understanding and greater liberty, Gal. iv. 1, 2. Note, First. It is the unspeakable privilege of all believers that they have the living God for their Father, the ever-living God, and may look upon themselves as his children by grace and adoption. Secondly. The sonship of believers shall be owned and acknowledged. It shall be said to them for their comfort and satisfaction, nay, and it shall be said for their honour, in the hearing of the world, "Ye are the sons of the living God." Let not the saints disquiet themselves, let not others despise them, for sooner or later there shall be a manifestation of the children of God, and all the world shall be made to know their excellency, and the value God has for them. Thirdly. It will add much to their comfort, very much to their honour, when they are dignified with the tokens of God's favour in that very place where they had lain long under the tokens of his displeasure. This speaks comfort to the believing Gentiles, that they need not go up to Jerusalem to be received and owned as God's children; no, they may stay where they are, and in that place, though it be in the remotest corner of the earth,—in that place where they were at a distance, where it was said to them, "You are not God's people," but are separated from them, Isa. lvi. 3, 6, even there, without leaving your country and kindred, you may, by faith, receive the spirit of adoption, witnessing with your spirits that you are the children of God.

3rd. That those who had been at variance should be happily brought together; ver. 11, "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together." This uniting of Judah and Israel, those two kingdoms that were now so much at variance, biting and devouring one another, is mentioned only as a specimen, or one instance, of the happy effect of the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, the bringing of those that had been at the greatest enmity one against another to a good understanding one of another, and a good affection one to another. This was literally fulfilled when the Galileans, who inhabited the part of that country which belonged to the ten tribes, and probably, for the most part, were descended from them, so heartily joined with those that were properly called Jews, (that were of Judæa,) in following Christ, and embracing his Gospel; and his first disciples were partly Jews and partly Galileans. The first that were blessed with the light of the Gospel were of the land of Zebulun and Napthali, Mat. iv. 15; and, though there was no goodwill at all between the Jews and the Galileans, yet, upon their believing in Christ, they were happily consolidated, and there were no remains of the former disaffection they had to one another; nay, when the Samaritans believed, though between them and the Jews there was a much greater enmity, yet in Christ there was a perfect unanimity, Acts viii. 14. Thus Judah and Israel were gathered together. Yet this is but a type of the much more celebrated coalition between Jews and Gentiles, when by the death of Christ the partition wall of the ceremonial law was taken down: see Eph. ii. 14—16. Christ died to "gather together in one all the children of God that were scattered abroad," Jno. xi. 52; Eph. i. 10.

4th. That Jesus Christ should be the centre of unity to God and all spiritual Israel. They shall all agree to appoint to themselves one head, which can be no other but he whom God hath appointed, even Christ. Note, Jesus Christ is the head of the church, the one only head of it; not only a head of government, as of the body politic, but a head of vital influence, as of the natural body. To believe in Christ is to appoint him to ourselves for our head, that is, to consent to God's appointment, and willingly to commit ourselves to his guidance and government; and this in concurrence and communion with all good Christians that make him their head, so that, though they are many, yet in him they are one, and so become one with each other. Qui conveniunt in aliquo tertio inter se conveniunt,—'Those who agree with a third agree with each other.'

5th. That having appointed Christ for their head, "they shall come up out of the land;" that is, they shall come, some of all sorts, from all parts, to join themselves to the church, as under the Jewish economy they came up from all corners of the land of Israel to Jerusalem, to worship; Ps. cxxii. 4, "Thither the tribes go up." To which there is a plain allusion in that prophecy of the accession of the Gentiles to the church, Isa. ii. 3, "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord." It speaks not a local removal, for they are said to be in the same place, ver. 10, but a change of their minds, a spiritual ascent to Christ. They shall come up from the earth, so it may be read; for those that have given up themselves to Christ as their head take their affections off from this earth, and the things of it, to set them upon things above, Col. iii. 1, 2, for they are not of the world, Jno. xv. 19, but have their conversation in heaven. They shall come up out of the land, though it be the land of their nativity; they shall in affection come out from it, that they may follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. Thus the learned Dr. Pocock takes it.

6th. That when all this comes to pass, "Great shall be the day of Jezreel." Though great is the day of Jezreel's affliction, (so some understand it,) yet great shall be the day of Jezreel's glory. This shall be Israel's day; the day shall be their own, after their enemies have long had their day. Israel is here called Jezreel, the seed of God, the holy seed, Isa. vi. 13, the substance of the land. This seed is now sown in the earth, and buried under the clods; but great shall be its day when the harvest comes. Great was the church's day, when there were "added to it daily such as should be saved." Then did the Almighty do great things for it.

CHAPTER II.

The scope of this chapter seems to be much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, and to point at the same events, and the causes of them. As there, so here, I. God, by the prophets, discovers sin to them, and chargeth it home upon them, the sin of their idolatry, their spiritual whoredom, their serving idols, and forgetting God and their obligations to him, ver. 1, 2, 5, 8. II. He threatens to take away from them that plenty of all good things with which they had served their idols, and to abandon them to ruin without remedy, ver. 3, 4, 6, 7, 9—13. III. Yet he promiseth at last to return in ways of mercy to them, for his own sake, ver. 14; to restore them to their former plenty, ver. 15; to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, ver. 16, 17; to renew the covenant with them, ver. 18—20; and to bless them with all good things, ver. 21—23.

SAY ye unto your brethren, Ammi;
And to your sisters, Ruhamah.
2 Plead with your mother, plead:
For she is not my wife,
Neither am I her husband:
Let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight,
And her adulteries from between her breasts;
3 Lest I strip her naked,
And set her as in the day that she was born,
And make her as a wilderness,
And set her like a dry land,
And slay her with thirst.
4 And I will not have mercy upon her children;
For they be the children of whoredoms.
5 For their mother hath played the harlot:
She that conceived them hath done shamefully:
For she said, I will go after my lovers,
That give me my bread and my water,
My wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink.

The first words of this chapter some make the close of the foregoing chapter, and add it to the promises which we have there of the great things God would do for them. When they shall have appointed Christ their head, and centred in him, then let them say to one another with triumph and exultation, 'let the prophets say it to them,' so the Chaldee, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people," is now their commission; say to them, Ammi, and Ruhamah, call them so again, for they shall no longer lie under the reproach and doom of Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah. They shall now be my people again, and obtain mercy. God's spiritual Israel, made up of Jews and Gentiles without distinction, shall call one another brethren and sisters, shall own one another for the people of God, and beloved of him, and for that reason shall embrace one another, and stir up one another, both to give thanks for, and to walk worthy of, this common salvation which they partake of. Or, rather, because the following words seem to have coherence with these, these also are designed for conviction and humiliation. The mother (ver. 2) seems to be the same with the brethren and sisters, (ver. 1,) the church of the ten tribes, the body of the people, which were brethren, and in a special manner with the heads and leaders, which were as the mother by whom the rest were brought up and nursed. But who are the children that must plead with their mother thus? Either, 1. The godly that were among them, that witnessed against the iniquities of the times. Let them boldly go on to bear their testimony against the idolatries and gross corruptions that prevail amongst them. Let them that had not bowed the knee to Baal reason the case with those that had, and endeavour to convince them with such arguments as are here put in their mouths. Note, Private persons may and ought, in their places, to appear and plead against the public profanations of God's name and worship. Children may humbly and modestly argue with their parents, when they do amiss. "Plead with your mother," plead as Jonathan with Saul, concerning David. Or, 2. The sufferers that were among them, that shared in the calamities of the times, let them not complain of God, let them not quarrel with him, or lay the blame on him, as if he had dealt hardly with them, and not like a tender father; no, let them plead with their mother, and lay the fault on her, where it ought to be laid: compare Isa. l. 1, "for her transgressions is your mother put away." She may thank herself, and you may thank her, for all your miseries. Let us see now how they must plead with her.

First. They must put her in mind of the relation wherein she had stood to God, the kindness he had had for her, the many favours he had bestowed upon her, and the farther favours he had designed her. Let them tell their brethren and sisters that they had been Ammi and Ruhamah. They had been God's people, and vessels of his mercy, and might have been so still, if it had not been their own fault, ver. 1. Note, Our relation to God, and dependence on him, is a great aggravation of our revolts from him, and rebellions against him.

Secondly. They must, in God's name, charge her with the violation of the marriage covenant between her and God. Let them tell her that God doth not look upon her as his wife, nor upon himself as her husband any longer. Tell her, ver. 2, that "she is not my wife, neither am I her husband," that by her spiritual whoredom she has forfeited all the honour and comfort of her relation to God, and provoked him to give her a bill of divorce. Note, No consideration can be more powerful to awaken us to repentance than the provocation we have by sin given to God to disown and cast us off. It is time to look about us, and to think what course we must take, when God threatens to reject us; for woe unto us if he be not our husband. They must charge this home upon her; ver. 5, "Their mother has played the harlot;" 'their congregation hath run a whoring after false prophets,' so the Chaldee; or rather after idols, wherein they were encouraged by their false prophets: "she that conceived them hath done shamefully," in making and worshipping idols. An idol is called a shame, ch. ix. 10, and idolatry is a shameful thing. It is not only an affront to God, but a reproach to men, to "fall down to the stock of a tree," as the prophet speaks; or it notes that the sinner was shameless, impudent in sin, and could not blush, Jer. vi. 15, or, "she has made ashamed," has made all that see her ashamed of her; her own children are ashamed of their relation to her.

Thirdly. They must upbraid her with her horrid ingratitude to God her benefactor, in ascribing to her idols the glory of the gifts he had given her, and then giving that for a reason why she paid them the homage due to him only, ver. 5. In this she did shamefully indeed, that she said, "I will go after my lovers that give me my bread and my water." Observe here, 1. Her wicked resolution to persist in idolatry, notwithstanding all that God said, both by his prophets and by his providences, to draw her from it. She said, whatever is offered to the contrary, "I will go after my lovers;" or 'those that cause me to love them,' whom I cannot but be in love with. The Chaldee understands it of the nations whose alliance Israel courted and depended upon, who supplied them with what they needed. But it is rather to be understood of the idols they worshipped, to justify their love of which they call them their lovers. See who do shamefully; those that are wilful and resolute in sin, and those that openly profess and own their resolution to go on in it. See the folly of idolaters to call those their lovers that had not so much as life! Yet let us learn to call our God our lover; let us keep up good thoughts of him, and put a high value upon our interest in him, and in his love. 2. The gross mistake upon which this resolution was grounded; "I will go after my lovers," because "they give me my bread and my water," which are necessary to sustain the body; "my wool and my flax," which are necessary to clothe the body; and pleasant things, "my oil and my drink,"—my liquors, so the word is,—wine and strong drink. Note, 1st. The things of sense are the best things with carnal hearts, and the most powerful attractives; and in pursuit of which they care not what they follow after. The God of Israel set before them his statutes and judgments, Deu. iv. 6, "more to be desired than gold, and sweeter than honey," Ps. xix. 10; promised them his favour, which would put "gladness into their hearts more than corn, wine, and oil," Ps. iv. 7. But they had no relish at all for these things; whence they thought their oil and their drink came, thither they would return their best affections. O curvæ in terram animæ et cœlestium inanes!—'O degenerate minds, bending towards the earth, and devoid of every thing heavenly!' 2nd. It is a great abuse and injury to God, in pursuance of the pleasures and delights of sense to forsake him, who not only gives us better things, but gives even those things too. The idolaters made Ceres the goddess of their corn, Bacchus the god of their wine, &c., and then foolishly fancied they had their corn and wine from these, forgetting the Lord their God, who both gave them that good land and gave them power to get wealth out of it. 3rd. Many are hardened in sin by their worldly prosperity. They had an abundance of those things when they served their idols, and then imagined them to be given them by their idols, which kept them to their service. Thus they argued, Jer. xliv. 17, 18, "While we burnt incense to the queen of heaven we had plenty of victuals."

Fourthly. They must persuade her to repent and reform. God will disown her if she persist in her whoredoms; let her therefore put away her whoredoms, ver. 2; let her be convinced that it is possible she may reform. The idols, as dear as they are, may yet be parted with, and it will certainly be well with her if she do reform. Note, Our pleading with sinners must be to drive them to repentance, not to drive them to despair. Let "her put away her whoredoms and her adulteries." The doubling of the words to the same purpose, and both plural, notes the abundance of idolatries that they were guilty of, all which must be abandoned ere God would be reconciled to them. Let her put them out of her sight, as detestable things which she cannot endure to look upon; let her say unto them, "Get ye hence," Isa. xxx. 22. Let her put them from her face and "from between her breasts," that is, let her not do as harlots use to do, that both discover their own wicked disposition and allure others to wickedness, by painting their faces, and exposing their naked breasts, and adorning them. Let her not thus, by annexing all possible gaieties and pleasures to the worship of idols, engage herself and allure others to it. Let her put away all these. Every sinful course persisted in is an adulterous departure from God; and here we may see what it is truly to repent of it, and turn from it. 1. True penitents will forsake both open sins and secret sins; will put away not only the whoredoms that lie in sight, but those that lie in secret, between their breasts, the sin that is "rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel." 2. They will both avoid the outward occasions of sin and mortify the inward disposition to it. Idolaters walked after their own eyes, which went a whoring after their idols, Eze. vi. 9; Deu. iv. 19, and therefore they must put them away out of their sight, lest they should be tempted to worship them: "Look not upon the wine when it is red." But that is not enough: the axe must be laid to the root; the corrupt bent and inclination of the heart must be changed; and it must be put away from between the breasts, that Christ alone may have the innermost and uppermost place there, Cant. i. 13.

Fifthly. They must shew her the utter ruin that will certainly be the fatal consequence of her sin, if she do not repent and reform; ver. 3, "Lest I strip her naked." This comes in here not by way of sentence passed upon her, but by way of warning given to her, that she may prevent it. 'Let her put away her whoredoms, that I may not strip her naked,' so it may be read; intimating that God waits to shew mercy to sinners, if they would but qualify themselves for that mercy. It is here threatened that God will deal with her as the just and jealous husband at length doth with an adulterous wife, that hath filled his house with a spurious brood, and will not be reclaimed,—he turns her and her children out of doors, and sends them a begging. "I will not have mercy upon her children," ver. 4. The particular persons that share in the calamity of the nation, and the rising generation, shall be ruined by it; for they are the "children of whoredoms," and keep up the vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers. Now it is here threatened that they shall be both stripped and starved. They thought their idols gave them their bread and their water, their wool and their flax, but God, by taking them away, will let them know it was he that gave them. 1. She shall be stripped. "Lest I strip her" of all her ornaments which she is proud of, and with which she courts her lovers; strip her, and set her "as in the day that she was born," that is, send her as naked out of the world as she came into it. This death doth, Job i. 21. "I will strip her," and so expose her to cold, and expose her to shame; and justly is she exposed to shame that did shamefully, ver. 5. The day when God brought them out of Egypt, where they were no better than slaves and beggars, was the day in which they were born; and God threatens to bring them back to as low and miserable a condition as he then found them in. Whatever they had that either gained them respect or screened them from contempt among their neighbours should be taken from them: see Eze. xvi. 4, 39. 2. She shall be starved; shall be deprived not only of her honours, but of her comforts and necessary supports. She shall be famished; shall be made as a wilderness, and a dry land, and slain with thirst. She that boasted so much of her bread and water, her oil and her drinks, which her lovers had given her, shall not have so much as necessary food. The land shall not afford subsistence for the inhabitants, for want of the rain of heaven; or, if it do, it shall be taken from them by the enemy, so that the rightful owners shall perish for want of it. Some understand it thus, I will make her as she was in the wilderness, and set her as she was in the desert land, where she was sometimes ready to perish for thirst. So it explains the former part of the verse; I will set her "as in the day that she was born," for it was in that vast howling wilderness that Israel was first formed into a people. They shall be in as deplorable a condition as their fathers were in, whose carcases fell in the wilderness, and in this respect worse, that then the children were reserved to be heirs of the land of promise; but now, "I will not have mercy upon her children," for their mother hath played the harlot.

6 Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns,
And make a wall,
That she shall not find her paths.
7 And she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them;
And she shall seek them, but shall not find them:
Then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband;
For then was it better with me than now.
8 For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil,
And multiplied her silver and gold,
Which they prepared for Baal.
9 Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof,
And my wine in the season thereof,
And will recover my wool and my flax
Given to cover her nakedness.
10 And now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers,
And none shall deliver her out of mine hand.
11 I will also cause all her mirth to cease,
Her feast days, her new moons, and her sabbaths,
And all her solemn feasts.
12 And I will destroy her vines and her fig trees,
Whereof she hath said, These are my rewards
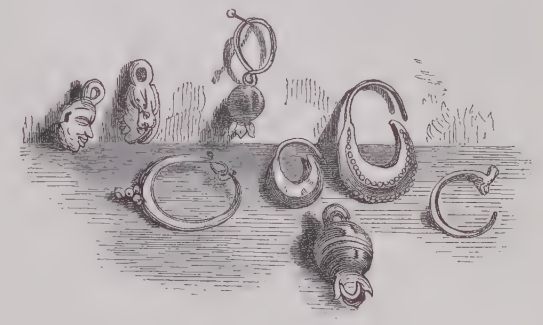
That my lovers have given me:
And I will make them a forest,
And the beasts of the field shall eat them.
13 And I will visit upon her the days of Baalim,
Wherein she burned incense to them,
And she decked herself with her earrings and her jewels,



EGYPTIAN EARRINGS.

And she went after her lovers,
And forgat me, saith the LORD.

HEDGE OF THORNS.—THE FICUS INDICUS.

God here goes on to threaten what he would do with this treacherous, idolatrous people, and therefore he warns that he may not wound, therefore he threatens that he may not strike. "If he turn not, he will whet his sword," Ps. vii. 12, but if he turn, he will sheathe it. They did not turn, and therefore all this came upon them; and its being threatened before shews that it was the execution of a Divine sentence upon them for their wickedness; and it is written for admonition to us.

First. They shall be perplexed and embarrassed in all their counsels, and disappointed in all their expectations. This is threatened, ver. 6, 7. But to the threatening is annexed a promise, that this shall be a means to convince them of their folly, and bring them home to their duty; and so good shall be brought out of evil, in token of the mercy God has yet in reserve for them. And this being the happy fruit and effect of the distress, it is hard to say whether the prediction or the distress itself should be called a threatening or a promise.

1. God will raise up difficulties and troubles in their way, so that their public counsels and affairs shall have no success, nor shall they be able to get forward in them. "I will hedge up thy way with thorns," that is, with such crosses as, like thorns and briers, are the product of sin and the curse, and are scratching, and tearing, and vexing, and, when the way we are in is hedged up with them, stop our progress, and force us to turn back. She said, "I will go after my lovers," I will pursue my leagues and alliances with foreign powers, and depend upon them; but God saith she shall be frustrated in these projects, and not be able to proceed in them; "I will hedge up thy way with thorns," and if that do not serve, "I will make a wall." If some lesser difficulties be got over, and prevail not to break thy measures, God will raise greater, for he will overcome when he judgeth. It shall be such a hedge and such a wall, as that "she shall not find her paths." The change of the person here, "I will hedge up thy way," and then she shall not find it, is usual in Scripture, especially in an earnest way of speaking. Sinner, do thou take notice, "I will hedge up thy way," and all you that are bystanders take notice what will be the effect of this, you may observe that she cannot find her paths; she shall be as a traveller that not only knows not which way to go of many that are before him, but that finds no way at all to go forward. And then "she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them;" shall endeavour to make an interest in the Assyrians and Egyptians, and to have them for her protectors, but she shall not gain her point; they shall either not come into confederacy with her or do her no service, shall help in vain, and be as the staff of a broken reed. "She shall seek them, but shall not find them," shall seek to her idols, but shall not find that satisfaction in them that she promised herself; the gods whom she trusted and courted, not only can do nothing for her, but have nothing to say to her to encourage her. Now, 1st. This is such a just judgment as the Sodomites met with, that were "struck with blindness, and wearied themselves to find the door," Gen. xix. 11; and the Syrians, 2 Kin. vi. 18. Note, Those that are most resolute in their sinful pursuits are commonly most crossed in them. "Thorns and snares in the way of the froward," Pr. xxii. 5; and thus with them God "shews himself froward," Ps. xviii. 26, and "walks contrary to those that walk contrary to him," Lev. xxvi. 23, 24. The lamenting prophet complains, "He hath enclosed my ways," Lam. iii. 7, 9. The way of God and duty is often hedged about with thorns, but we have reason to think it is a sinful way that is hedged up with thorns. 2nd. This is such a kind rebuke, and indeed such a mercy, as Baalam met with when the angel stood in his way to hinder his going forward to curse Israel, Num. xxii. 22. Note, Crosses and obstacles in an evil course are great blessings, and are so to be accounted; they are God's hedges, to keep us from transgressing, to restrain us from wandering out of the green pastures, to "withdraw man from his purpose," Job xxxiii. 17, to make the way of sin difficult, that we may not go on in it, and to keep us from it whether we will or not. We have reason to bless God for restraining grace and for restraining judgment.

2. These difficulties that God raiseth up in their way shall raise up in their minds thoughts of turning back. Then shall she say, Since I cannot overtake my lovers, I will even go "and return to my first husband," that is, will return to God, and humble myself to him, and desire him to take me in again; for when I kept close to him it was every way better with me than now. Two things are here extorted from this degenerate, apostate people. 1st. A just acknowledgment of the folly of their apostasy. They are now brought to own, that it was better with them while they kept close to their God than ever it was since they forsook him. Note, Whoever have exchanged the service of God for the service of the world and the flesh, have, sooner or later, been made to own that they changed for the worse; and that while they continued in good company, and went on in the way of good duties, and made conscience how they spent their time, and what they said or did, it was better with them, they had more true comfort and enjoyment of themselves, than ever they had since they went astray. 2nd. A good purpose to come back again to their duty. "I will go and return to my first husband," and she knows so much of his goodness and readiness to forgive that she speaks without any doubt of his receiving her again into favour, and making her condition as good as ever. Note, The disappointments we meet with in our pursuits of satisfaction in the creature, should, if nothing else will do it, drive us at length to the Creator, in whom alone it is to be had. When Moab is "weary of the high place," he shall "go to the sanctuary," Isa. xvi. 12. And when the prodigal son is reduced to husks, short allowance indeed, and remembers that in his father's house there is bread enough, then he saith, "I will arise and go to my father's house," Lu. xv. 17, 18.

Secondly. The necessary supports and comforts of life shall be taken from them, because they had dishonoured God with them, ver. 8, 9. Their land was plenteous. Now see here,

1. How graciously their plenty was given to them. God gave them not only corn for necessity, but wine for delight, and oil for ornament. Nay, he multiplied their silver and gold, wherewith to traffic with other nations, and bring home their products, and which they might hoard up for posterity. Silver and gold will keep longer than corn, and wine, and oil. He gave them wool and flax, too, to cover their nakedness, and to serve for ornament enough to them, Eze. xvi. 10. Note, God is a bountiful benefactor, even to those whom he foresees will be ungrateful and unthankful to him.

2. How basely their plenty was abused by them. 1st. They robbed God of the honour of his gifts. "She did not know that I gave her corn and wine," that is, she did not remember it. The law and the prophets had told them again and again, that all their comforts they received from God's bountiful providence; but they were so often told by their false prophets and idolatrous priests, that they had their corn from such an idol, and their wine from such an idol, &c., that they had quite forgot their relation to their great Benefactor, and their obligations to him. She did not consider it, she would not acknowledge it; this they were willingly ignorant of, and more brutish than the ox that knows his owner, and the ass that knows his master's crib. She did not know it, for she did not return thanks to him for his gifts, nor study what she should render; nor did she give him his dues out of them, and so carried it as if she were ignorant who was the donor. 2nd. They served and honoured his enemies with them. They prepared them for Baal. They adorned their images with gold and silver, Jer. x. 4, and adorned themselves for the worship of their images, ver. 13: see Eze. xvi. 17—19. 'Wherewith they made Baal,' so the margin reads it, that is, the image of Baal. Note, It is a very great dishonour to the God of heaven to make those gifts of his providence the food and fuel of our lusts which he gave us for our support in his service, and to be oil to the wheels of our obedience.

3. How justly their plenty should be taken from them. 'Therefore will I return,' I will alter my dealings with them, will take another course, and will "take away my corn," and other good things that I gave her. I will recover it, (a law term,) as a man by due course of law recovers what is unjustly detained from him, or, as when the tenant has committed waste, the landlord recovers locum vastatum,—'dilapidations.' Observe, God calls it, My corn, and my wine, my wool, and my flax; they called it theirs, My bread, and my water, ver. 5. But God lets them know they were not theirs, he only allowed them the use of them as tenants, intrusted them with the management of them as stewards, but still reserved the property in himself; It is my corn, and my wine. Note, God will have us to know, not only that we have all our creature comforts and enjoyments from him, but that he has still an incontestable right and title to them, that they are more his than ours, and therefore are to be used for him, and accounted for to him. He will therefore take it away from them, because they have forfeited it, by disowning his right; as a tenant by copy of court-roll, who holds at the will of his lord, forfeits his estate if he make a feoffment of it, as though he were a freeholder. He will recover it, will free or deliver it, that it may be no longer abused; as the creature is said to be "delivered from the bondage of corruption" under which it groans, Rom. viii. 21. He will take it away in the time thereof, and in the season thereof; then when they expected it, and thought they were sure of it, it shall suffer shipwreck in the harbour; and "the harvest shall be a heap." He will take it away by unseasonable weather, or by unreasonable men. Note, Those that abuse the mercies God gives them to his dishonour cannot expect to enjoy them long.

Thirdly. They shall lose all their honour, and be exposed to contempt; ver. 10, "I will discover her lewdness," that is, will bring to light all her secret wickedness, and make it public to her shame; I will shew, by the punishment of it, how heinous, how odious, how offensive it is. The fact has been denied, but now it shall appear; the fault has been diminished, but now it shall appear exceeding sinful. And this "in the sight of her lovers," that is, in the sight of the neighbour nations with whom she courted an alliance, and on whom she had a dependence; they shall despise her, and be ashamed of her, because of her weakness, and poverty, and ill-conduct; they shall not think her any longer worthy of their friendship. See this fulfilled, Lam. i. 8, "All that honoured her despise her, because they have seen her nakedness." Or, in the sight of the sun and moon, which she worshipped as her lovers, before them shall her lewdness be discovered. Compare this with Jer. viii. 1, 2, "They shall bring out the bones of their kings and princes, and spread them before the sun and moon, whom they have loved and served." Note, Sin will have shame; let those expect it that have done shamefully. What other lot can this impudent adulteress expect but that of a common whore, to be carted through the town? And when God comes to deal thus with her none shall deliver her out of his hands—neither the gods nor the men they confide in. Note, Those who will not deliver themselves into the hand of God's mercy cannot be delivered out of the hand of his justice.

Fourthly. They shall lose all their pleasure, and shall be left melancholy; ver. 11, "I will cause her mirth to cease." It seems, then, though they had "gone a whoring from their God," yet they could find in their hearts to "rejoice as other people," which is forbidden, ch. ix. 1. Note, Many who lie under guilt and wrath are yet very jocund and merry, and live jovially; but whether in their laughter their hearts are sad or no, it is certain the end of their mirth will be heaviness; for God "will cause all their mirth to cease." It is as Mr. Burroughs observes here, sin and mirth can never hold long together; but if men will not take away sin from their mirth, God will take away mirth from their sin.

1. God will take away the occasions of their sacred mirth; "their feast days, their new moons, their sabbaths, and all their solemn feasts." These God instituted to be observed in a religious manner, and they were to be observed with rejoicing; and it seems, though they had departed from the pure worship of God, yet they kept up the observation of these, not at God's temple at Jerusalem, for they had long since forgotten that, but probably at Dan and Bethel, where the calves were, or in some other places of meeting that they had. They observed them not for the honour of God, or with any true devotion towards him, but only because they were times of mirth and feasting, music and dancing, and meeting of friends, received by tradition from their fathers. Thus, when they had lost the power of godliness, and denied that, yet for the pleasing of a vain and carnal mind they kept up the form of it; and by this means their new moons and their sabbaths became an iniquity, which God "could not away with," Isa. i. 13. Now observe, 1st. God calls them their new moons and their sabbaths; not his, he disowns them, but theirs. 2nd. He will cause them to cease. Note, When men by their sins have caused the life and substance of ordinances to cease, it is just with God, by his judgments, to cause the remaining show and shadow of them to cease.

2. He will take away the supports of their carnal mirth. They loved the new moons and the sabbaths only for the sake of the good cheer that was stirring then, not for the sake of any religious exercises then performed, these they had dropped long ago; and now God will take away their provisions for these solemnities; ver. 12, "I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees." Note, If men destroy God's word and ordinances, by which he should be honoured on their feast days, it is just with him to destroy their vines and fig-trees with which they use to regale themselves. While they took the pleasure of these, they gave their lovers the praise of them. "These are my rewards which my lovers have given me;" I may thank my stars for these, and my worship of them; I may thank my neighbours for these, and my alliance with them. And therefore God will destroy them, will wither them with a blast, or bring in a foreign enemy that shall lay the country waste, so that their vineyards shall become a forest, the inclosures shall be thrown down, as is usual in war, all shall be laid in common, so that the beasts of the field shall eat their grapes and their figs; or, they shall be so blasted with the east wind, that fruit trees shall be of no more use than forest trees, but, being withered and good for nothing, what fruit there is shall be left to the beasts of the field; or, it shall be devoured by their enemies, by men as barbarous as wild beasts. Now,

1st. This shall be the ruin of their mirth. God will "cause all her mirth to cease." How will he do it? Taking away the new moons and the sabbaths will not do it; they can very easily part with them, and find no loss. But I will "destroy her vines and her fig-trees," will take away her sensual pleasures, and then she will think herself undone indeed. Note, The destruction of the vines and the fig trees causeth all the mirth of a carnal heart to cease; it will say, as Micah, You have taken away my gods, and what have I more?

2nd. This shall be the punishment of her idolatry; ver. 13, "I will visit upon her the days of Baalim," that is, I will reckon with her for all the worship of all the Baals they have made gods of, from the days of their fathers unto this day. We read of their worshipping Baal as long ago as the time of the Judges, and for aught I know this may look as far back as those times, those days of Baalim; for it is in the second commandment, which forbids idolatry, that God threatens to "visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children;" and justly is that sin so visited more than any other, because it commonly supports itself by prescription and long usage. Now the measure of the iniquity of Israel was full, all their former sins came into the account, and shall be required of this generation. Or, the days of Baalim are the solemn festival days which they kept in honour of their idols. Days of sinful mirth must be visited in days of mourning. These were the days wherein she burnt incense to idols, and to grace the solemnity, "decked herself with her earrings and her jewels," that appearing honourable, the honour she did to Baal might be thought the greater; or, she was as a wife that decks herself with the earrings and jewels that her husband gave her, to make herself amiable to her lovers, whom she follows after, and is ever mindful of. But "she forgat me, saith the Lord." Note, Our treacherous departures from God are owing to our forgetfulness of him, of his nature and attributes, his relation to us, and our obligations to him. Many that plead they have weak memories, and forget the things of God, yet can remember other things well enough; nay, it is because they are so mindful of lying vanities that they are so forgetful of their own mercies.

14 Therefore, behold, I will allure her,
And bring her into the wilderness,
And speak comfortably unto her.
15 And I will give her her vineyards from thence,
And the valley of Achor for a door of hope:

VALLEY OF ACHOR.

And she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth,
And as in the day when she came up out of the land of [Egypt.
16 And it shall be at that day, saith the LORD,
That thou shalt call me Ishi;
And shalt call me no more Baali.
17 For I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth,
And they shall no more be remembered by their name.
18 And in that day will I make a covenant for them
With the beasts of the field,
And with the fowls of heaven,
And with the creeping things of the ground:
And I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth,
And will make them to lie down safely.
19 And I will betroth thee unto me for ever;
Yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment,
And in lovingkindness, and in mercies.
20 I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness:
And thou shalt know the LORD. [LORD,
21 And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear, saith the
I will hear the heavens,
And they shall hear the earth; [oil;
22 And the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the
And they shall hear Jezreel.
23 And I will sow her unto me in the earth;
And I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy;
And I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people;
And they shall say, Thou art my God.

The state of Israel, ruined by their own sin, did not look so black and dismal in the former part of the chapter, but that the state of Israel, restrained by the Divine grace, looks as bright and pleasant here in the latter part of the chapter; and the more surprisingly so, as the promises follow thus close upon the threatenings; nay, which is very strange, they are, by a note of connection, joined to and inferred from that declaration of their sinfulness upon which the threatenings of their ruin are grounded. "She went after her lovers, and forgat me, saith the Lord, therefore I will allure her." Fitly, therefore, is that "therefore," which is the note of connection, immediately followed with a note of admiration, "Behold, I will allure her!" When it was said, "She forgat me," one would think it should have followed, Therefore I will abandon her, I will forget her, I will never look after her more; no, Therefore I will allure her. Note, God's thoughts and ways of mercy are infinitely above ours, his reasons are all fetched from within himself, and not from any thing in us; nay, his goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious, Isa. lvii. 17, 18. "Therefore," because she will not be restrained by the denunciations of wrath, God will try whether she will be wrought upon by the offers of mercy. Some think it may be translated 'Afterwards,' or, 'Nevertheless' I will allure her. It comes all to one; the design is plainly to magnify free grace to those on whom God will have mercy, purely for mercy's sake. Now that which is here promised to Israel is,

First. That, though now they were disconsolate and ready to despair, they should again be revived with comforts and hopes, ver. 14, 15. This is expressed here with an allusion to God's dealings with that people when he brought them out of Egypt, through the wilderness, to Canaan; as their forlorn and deplorable condition in their captivity was compared to their state in Egypt in the day that they were born, ver. 3. They shall be new formed by such miracles of love and mercy as they were first formed by, and such a transport of joy shall they be in as they were in then. It is hard to say when this had its accomplishment in the kingdom of the ten tribes; but it principally aims, no doubt, at the bringing in both of Jews and Gentiles into the church by the Gospel of Christ; and it is applicable, nay, we have reason to think it was designed that it should be applied, to the conversion of particular souls to God. Now observe,

1. The gracious methods God will take with them. 1st. He will bring them into the wilderness, as he did at first when he brought them out of Egypt, where he instructed them, and took them into covenant with himself. The land of their captivity shall be to them now, as that wilderness was then, the furnace of affliction, in which God will choose them: see Eze. xx. 35, 36, "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you." God had said he would make them as a wilderness, ver. 3, which was a threatening; now, when it is here made a part of a promise that he would bring them into the wilderness, the meaning may be, that he would, by his grace, bring their minds to their condition, they shall have humble hearts under humbling providences; being poor, shall be poor in spirit, shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity, and then they are prepared to have comfort spoken to them. When God delivered Israel out of Egypt he led them into the wilderness to "humble them, and prove them, that he might do them good," Deu. viii. 2, 3, 15, 16; and so he will do again. Note, Those whom God has mercy in store for he first brings into a wilderness, into solitude and retirement, that they may the more freely converse with him out of the noise of this world; into distress of mind, through sense of guilt, and dread of wrath, which brings a soul to be quite at a loss in itself, and bewildered, and by those convictions he prepares for consolations; and sometimes into outward distress and trouble, by that to open the ear to discipline. 2nd. He will then allure them, and speak comfortably to them; will persuade them, and speak to their hearts; that is, he will, by his word and Spirit, incline their hearts to return to him, and encourage them to do so. He will allure them with the promises of his favour, as before he had terrified them with the threatenings of his wrath; will speak friendly to them, both by his prophets and by his providences, as before he had spoken roughly, Isa. xl. 1, 2. 'By the hand of my servants the prophets I will speak comfort to her heart;' so the Chaldee. This refers to the Gospel of Christ, and the offers of Divine grace in the Gospel, by which we are allured to forsake our sins and to turn to God, and which speaks to the heart of a convinced sinner that which is every way suited to his case, speaks abundant consolation to those that sorrow for sin, and lament after the Lord. And when by the Spirit it is indeed spoken to the heart effectually, and so as to reach the conscience, —which it is God's prerogative to do,—O what a blessed change is wrought by it! Note, The best way of reducing wandering souls to God is by fair means. By the promise of rest in Christ we are invited to take his yoke upon us; and the work of conversion may be forwarded by comforts as well as by convictions. 3rd. He will "give her her vineyards from thence;" from that time and from that place where he hath afflicted her, and brought her to see her folly, and to humble herself, from thenceforward he will do her good; not only speak comfortably to her, but do well for her, and undo what he had done against her. He had "destroyed her vines," ver. 12; but now he will give her whole vineyards, as if for every vine destroyed she should have a vineyard restored, and so be repaid with interest; she shall not only have corn for necessity, but vineyards for delight. These note the privileges and comforts of the Gospel, which are prepared for those that "come up out of the wilderness" leaning upon Christ as their beloved, Cant. viii. 5. Note, God has vineyards of consolation ready to bestow on those who repent and return to him; and he can give vineyards out of a wilderness, which are of all other the most welcome, as rest to the weary. 4th. He will give her "the valley of Achor for a door of hope." The valley of Achor was that in which Achan was stoned; it signifies the valley of trouble, because he troubled Israel, and there God troubled him. This was in the beginning of the wars in Canaan, and their putting away the accursed thing in that place gave them ground to hope that God would continue his presence with them and complete their victories. So when God returns to his people in mercy, and they to him in duty, it will be to them as happy an omen as any other, if they put away the accursed thing from among them; if, by mortifying sin, they stone the Achan that has troubled their camp, their subduing that enemy within themselves is an earnest to them of victory over all the kings of Canaan. Or, if the allusion be to the name, it intimates that trouble for sin, if it be sincere, opens a door of hope; for that sin that truly troubles us shall not ruin us. The valley of Achor was a very fruitful, pleasant valley; some think it the same with the valley of Engedi, famous for vineyards, Cant. i. 14. This God gave to Israel, as a pattern and pledge of the whole land of Canaan; so, 'God will, by his Gospel, give to all believers such gifts, graces, and comforts in this life, as shall be a taste of those more perfect good things of the kingdom of heaven, and shall give them an assured hope of a full possession of them in due time.' So the learned Dr. Pocock expounds it; and to the same purpose this whole context.

2. The great rejoicing with which they shall receive God's gracious returns towards them. "She shall sing there as in the days of her youth." This plainly refers to that triumphant and prophetic song which Moses and the children of Israel sung at the Red Sea, Ex. xv. 1. When they are delivered out of captivity they shall repeat that song, and to them it shall be a new song, because sung upon a new occasion, not inferior to the former. God had said, ver. 11, he would "cause all her mirth to cease," but now he would cause it to revive; she shall sing as in the day that she came out of Egypt. Note, When God repeats former mercies we must repeat former praises; we find the song of Moses sung in the New Testament, Rev. xv. 3. This promise of Israel's singing has its accomplishment in the Gospel of Christ, which furnisheth us with abundant matter for joy and praise; and, wherever it is received in its power, enlargeth the heart in joy and praise. And this is that land flowing with milk and honey which the valley of Achor opens a door of hope to. We rejoice in tribulation.

Secondly. That though they had been much addicted to the worship of Baal, they should now be perfectly weaned from it, shall relinquish and abandon all appearances of idolatry, and approaches towards it, and cleave to God only, and worship him as he appoints, ver. 16, 17. Note, The surest pledge and token of God's favour to any people is his effectual parting between them and their beloved sins. The worship of Baal was the sin that did most easily beset the people of Israel, it was their own iniquity, the sin that had dominion over them; but now that idolatry shall be quite abolished, and there shall not be the least remains of it among them.

1. The idols of Baal shall not be mentioned, not any of the Baals that in the days of Baalim had made so great a noise with, O Baal, hear us! O Baal, hear us! The very names of Baalim shall be taken out of their mouths. They shall be so disused that they shall be quite forgotten, as if their names had never been known in Israel. They shall be so detested that people will not bear to mention them themselves, or to hear others mention them; so that posterity shall scarce know that ever there were such things. They shall be so ashamed of their former love to Baal, that they shall do all they can to blot out the remembrance of it. They shall tie themselves up to the strictest literal meaning of that law against idolatry, Ex. xxiii. 13, "Make no mention of the names of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth;" as David, Ps. xvi. 4. Thus the apostle expresseth the abhorrence we ought to have of all fleshly lusts, "Let them not be once named among you," Eph. v. 3. But how can such a change of the Ethiopian's skin be wrought? It is answered, the power of God can do it, and will; "I will take away the names of Baalim;" as Zec. xiii. 2, "I will cut off the names of the idols." Note, God's grace in the heart will change the language by making that iniquity to be loathed which was beloved; Zeph. iii. 9, "I will turn to the people a pure language." One of the rabbins saith this promise relates to the Gentiles as well as Israel; and we know it had its accomplishment in the turning of the Gentiles, by the Gospel of Christ, from the idolatries which they had been wedded to, 1 Thes. i. 9.

2. The very word Baal shall be laid aside, even in its innocent signification. God saith, "Thou shalt call me Ishi, and call me no more Baali." Both signify my husband, and both had been made use of concerning God; Isa. liv. 5, "Thy Maker is thy husband," thy Baal, so the word is, thy owner, patron, and protector. It is probable many good people had accordingly made use of the word Baali in worshipping the God of Israel; when their wicked neighbours bowed the knee to Baal they gloried in this, that God was their Baal. But, saith God, you shall call me so no more, because I will have the very names of Baalim taken away. Note, That which is very innocent in itself, yet, when it has been abused to idolatry, should be abolished, and the very use of it taken away, that nothing may be done to keep idols in remembrance, much less to keep them in reputation. When calling God Ishi will do as well, and signify as much as Baali, let that word be chosen rather, lest, by calling him Baali, others should be put in mind of their quondam Baals. Some think there is another reason intimated why God would be called Ishi, and not Baali. They both signify my husband; but Ishi is a compellation of love, and sweetness, and familiarity; Baali, of reverence and subjection. Ishi is vir meus,—'my man;' Baali is dominus meus,—'my lord.' In gospel times God hath so revealed himself to us as to encourage us to come boldly to the throne of his grace, and to use a holy, humble freedom there; we ought to call God our Master, for so he is, but we are more taught to call him our Father. Ishi is a man the Lord, Gen. iv. 1, and intimates that in gospel times the church's husband shall be the man Christ Jesus, made like unto his brethren, and therefore they call him Ishi, not Baali.

Thirdly. That though they had been in continual troubles, as if the whole creation had been at war with them, now they shall enjoy perfect peace and tranquillity, as if they were in a league of friendship with the whole creation; ver. 18. In that day, when they have forsaken their idols, and put themselves under the Divine protection, "I will make a covenant for them."

1. They shall be protected from evil, nothing shall hurt them, or do them any mischief. Tranquillus Deus tranquillat omnia,—'When God is at peace with us he makes every creature to be so too.' The inferior creatures shall do them no harm, as they had done, when the beasts of the field ate up their vineyards, ver. 12, and when noisome beasts were one of God's sore judgments, Eze. xiv. 15. The fowls and the creeping things are taken into this covenant, for they also, when God makes use of them as the instruments of his justice, may become very hurtful. But they shall be no more so; nay, by virtue of this covenant they shall be made serviceable to them, and brought into their interests. Note, God has the command of the inferior creatures, and brings them into what covenant he pleaseth; he can make the beasts of the field to honour him, so he has promised, Isa. xliii. 20, and to contribute to his people's comfort. And if the inferior creatures are thus laid under an engagement to serve us, it is our part of the covenant not to abuse them, but to serve God with them. Some think this had its accomplishment in the miraculous power Christ gave his disciples to take up serpents, Mar. xvi. 17, 18. It agrees with the promises made particularly to Israel, in their return out of captivity, Eze. xxxiv. 25, "I will cause evil beasts to cease out of the land;" and the more general ones to all the saints: Job v. 22, 23, "The beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee;" and Ps. xci. 13, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder." But this is not all. Men are more in danger from one another than from the brute beasts, and therefore it is farther promised that God will make wars to cease, will disarm the enemy. "I will break the bow, and sword, and battle." He can do it when he pleaseth, Ps. xlvi. 9, and will do it for those whose ways please him, for he "maketh even their enemies to be at peace with them," Pr. xvi. 7. This agrees with the promise that in gospel times "swords shall be beaten into ploughshares," Isa. ii. 4.

2. They shall be "quiet from the fear of evil." God will not only keep them safe, but make them to lie down safely, as those that know themselves to be under the protection of heaven, and therefore are not afraid of the powers of hell.

Fourthly. That though God had given them a bill of divorce for their whoredoms, yet upon their repentance he would again take them into covenant with himself, into a marriage covenant, ver. 19, 20. God's making a covenant for them with the inferior creatures was a great favour, but it was nothing to this, that he took them into covenant with himself, and engaged himself to do them good. Observe,

1. The nature of this covenant. It is a marriage covenant, founded in choice and love, and founding the nearest relation, "I will betroth thee unto me," and again, and a third time, "I will betroth thee." Note, All that are sincerely devoted to God are betrothed to him; that is, God gives them the most sacred and inviolable security imaginable, that he will love them, protect them, and provide for them, and that he will do the part of a husband to them, and that he will incline their hearts to join themselves to him, and will graciously accept of them in so doing. Believing souls are espoused to Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 2. The gospel church is "the bride, the Lamb's wife;" and they would never come into that relation to him if he did not by the power of his grace betroth them to himself. The separation begins on our side, we alienate ourselves from God; the coalition begins on his side, he betroths us to himself.

2. The duration of the covenant. "I will betroth thee for ever." The covenant itself shall be inviolable; God will not break it on his part, and you shall not on yours; and the blessings of it shall be everlasting. One of the Jewish rabbins saith, this is a promise, that she shall attain to the life of the world to come, which is absolute eternity or perpetuity.

3. The manner how this covenant shall be made. 1st. In righteousness and judgment; that is, God will deal sincerely and uprightly in covenanting with them. They have broken covenant, and God is righteous; but, saith God, I will renew the covenant in righteousness. The matter shall be so ordered as that God may receive even these backsliding children into his family again without any reflection upon his justice; nay, that being satisfied by the Mediator of this covenant, very much to the honour of it. But what reason can there be why God should take a people into covenant with him that had so often dealt treacherously? Will it not reflect upon his wisdom? No, saith God, I will do it in judgment; not rashly, but upon due consideration. Let me alone to give a reason for it, and to justify my own conduct. 2nd. In loving-kindness and in mercies. God will deal tenderly and graciously in covenanting with them; and will be not only as good as his word, but better; and, as he will be just in keeping covenant with them, so he will be merciful in keeping them in the covenant. They are subject to many infirmities, and if he be extreme to mark what they do amiss, they will soon lose the benefit of the covenant. He therefore promiseth that it shall be a covenant of grace made in a compassionate consideration of their infirmities, so as that every transgression in the covenant shall not throw them out of covenant. He will gather with everlasting loving-kindness. 3rd. In faithfulness. Every article of the covenant shall be punctually performed; faithful is he that hath called them, who also will do it,—he cannot deny himself.

4. The means by which they shall be kept right and faithful to the covenant on their part. "Thou shalt know the Lord." Which is not only a promise that God will reveal himself to them more fully and clearly than ever, but that he will give them a heart to know him; they shall know more of him, and shall know him in another manner than ever yet. The ground of their apostasy was, not knowing God to be their benefactor, ver. 8; therefore, to prevent the like, they shall all be taught of God to know him. Note, God keeps up his interest in men's souls by giving them a good understanding, and a right knowledge of things, Heb. viii. 11.

Fifthly. That though the heavens had been to them as brass, and the earth as iron, now the heavens shall yield their dews, and by that means the earth its fruits, ver. 21, 22. God having betrothed the gospel church, and in it all believers, to himself, how shall he not with himself, and with his Son, freely give them all things; all things pertaining both to life and godliness, all things they need or can desire? All is theirs, for they are Christ's, betrothed to him; and with the righteousness of the kingdom of God which they seek first all other things shall be added unto them. And yet this promise of corn and wine is to be taken also in a spiritual sense, (so the learned Dr. Pocock thinks.) It is an effusion of those blessings and graces which relate to the soul that is here promised under the metaphor of temporal blessings; the dew of heaven as well as the fatness of the earth, and that put first, as in the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 28. God had threatened, ver. 9, that he would "take away the corn and the wine;" but now he promiseth to restore them again, and that in the common course and order of nature. While they lay under the judgment of famine they called to the earth for corn and wine, for the support of themselves and their families; very gladly would the earth have supplied them, but cannot give unless she receive; cannot produce corn and wine unless it be "enriched with the river of God," Ps. lxv. 9, and therefore calls to the heavens for rain,—the former and latter rain in their season; gapes for it, and, by its melancholy aspect when rain is denied, pleads for it. But, say the heavens, we have no rain to give unless He who hath the keys of the clouds unlock them, and open these bottles; so that, if the Lord do not help you, we cannot. But when God takes them into covenant with himself, then the wheel of nature shall be set a-going again in favour of them, and the streams of mercy shall flow in the usual channel. "Then I will hear, saith the Lord;" I will receive your prayers, so the Chaldee interprets the first hearing. God will graciously take notice of their addresses to him. And then, "I will hear the heavens;" I will answer them, so it may be read, and then they shall "hear and answer the earth," and pour down seasonable rain upon it; and then the earth shall hear the corn and vines, and supply them with moisture, and they shall hear Jezreel, and be nourishment and refreshment for them that inherit Jezreel. See here the coherence of second causes with one another, as links in a chain, and the necessary dependence they all have upon God the First Cause. Note, We must expect all our comforts from God in the usual method, and by the appointed means; and when we are at any time disappointed in them, we must look up to God, "above the hills and mountains," Ps. cxxi. 1, 2. See how ready the creatures are to serve the people of God, how desirous of the honour; the corn cries to the earth, the earth to the heavens, the heavens to God, and all that they may supply them. And see how ready God is to give relief; "I will hear, saith the Lord, yea, I will hear." And if God will hear the cry of the heavens for his people, much more will he hear the intercession of his Son for them, who is made higher than the heavens. See what a peculiar delight those that are in convenant with God may take in their creature comforts, as seeing them all come to them from the hand of God; they can run up all the streams to the fountain, and taste covenant love in common mercies, which makes them doubly sweet.

Sixthly. That whereas they were now dispersed, not only, as Simeon and Levi, divided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel, but divided and scattered all the world over, God will turn this curse, as he did that, into a blessing. I will not only water the earth for her, but will sow her unto me in the earth; her dispersion shall be not like that of the chaff in the floor, which the wind driveth away, but like that of the seed in the field, in order to its greater increase; wherever they are scattered they shall take root downwards, and bear fruit upwards. The "good seed are the children of the kingdom;" "I will sow her unto me." This alludes to the name Jezreel, which signifies 'sown of God,' or, 'for God.' As she was scattered of him, (which is one signification of the words,) so she shall be sown of him; and to what he sows he will give the increase. When in all parts of the world Christianity got footing, and every where there were professors of it, then this promise was fulfilled, "I will sow her unto me in the earth." Note, The greatest blessing of this earth is, that God has a church in it, and from that ariseth all the tribute of glory he hath out of it; it is what he hath sworn to himself, and what he will therefore secure to himself.

Seventhly. That whereas they had been Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah, not a people, and not finding mercy with God, now they shall be restored to his favour, and taken again into covenant with him, ver. 23. They had not obtained mercy, but seemed to be abandoned; they were not my people, not distinguished, not dealt with, as my people, but left to lie in common with the nations. This was the case of the rejected Jews; and the same, or more deporable, was that of the Gentile world, to whom the apostle applies this, Rom. ix. 24, 25, that had no hope, and were without God in the world; but, when great multitudes both of Jews and Gentiles were, upon their believing in Christ, incorporated into a Christian church, then, 1. God had mercy on those who had not obtained mercy. Those found favour with God, and became the children of his love, who had been long out of favour, and the children of his wrath, and if Infinite Mercy had not interposed would have been for ever so. Note, God's mercy must not be despaired of anywhere on this side hell. 2. He took those into a covenant relation to himself who had been strangers and foreigners; he saith to them, "Thou art my people," whom I will own and bless, protect and provide for; and they shall say, "Thou art my God," whom I will serve and worship, and to whose honour I will be entirely and for ever devoted. Note, 1st. The sum total of the happiness of believers is the mutual relation that is between them and God, that he is theirs, and they are his; this is the crown of all the promises. 2nd. This relation is founded in free grace; we have not chosen him, but he hath chosen us. He first saith, They are my people, and makes them willing to be so in the day of his power, and then they avouch him to be theirs. 3rd. As we need desire no more to make us happy, but to be the people of God, so we need desire no more to make us easy and cheerful but to have him to assure us that we are so, to say unto us, by his Spirit witnessing with ours, "Thou art my people." 4th. Those that have accepted of the Lord for their God must avouch him to be so, must go to him in prayer, and tell him so, "Thou art my God," and must be ready to make profession before men. 5th. It adds to the comfort of our covenant with God, that in it there is a communion of saints, who, though they are many, yet here they are one. It is not, I will say to them, Ye are my people, but, "Thou art;" for he looks upon them as all one in Christ, and as such in him he speaks to them, and covenants with them; and they also do not say, Thou art our God, for they look upon themselves as one body, and desire with one mind and one mouth to glorify him, and therefore say, "Thou art my God;" or, it intimates that such a covenant as God made of old with his people Israel in general, now under the Gospel he makes with particular believers, and saith to each of them, even the meanest, with as much pleasure as he did of old to the thousands of Israel, "Thou art my people," and invites and encourageth each of them to say, "Thou art my God," and to triumph therein, as Moses and all Israel did; Ex. xv. 2, He is my God, and my fathers' God.

CHAPTER III.

God is still, by the prophet, inculcating the same thing upon this careless people, and much in the same manner as before, by a type or sign, that of the dealings of a husband with an adulterous wife. In this chapter we have, I. The bad character which the people of Israel now had; they were, as is said of the Athenians, Acts xvii. 16, wholly given to idolatry, ver. 1. II. The low condition which they should be reduced to by their captivity, and other the instances of God's controversy with them, ver. 2—4. III. The blessed reformation that should at length be wrought upon them in the latter days, ver. 5.

THEN said the LORD unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the LORD toward the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine. 2 So I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley: 3 And I said unto her, Thou shalt abide for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man: so will I also be for thee. 4 For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim: 5 Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the LORD their God, and David their king; and shall fear the LORD and his goodness in the latter days.

EGYPTIAN EPHOD.

Some think this chapter refers to Judah, the two tribes, as the adulteress the prophet married, ch. i. 3, represented the ten tribes; for this was not to be divorced, as the tribes were, but to be left desolate for a long time, and then to return, as the two tribes did. But these are called the children of Israel, which was the ten tribes; and therefore it is more probable that of them this parable, as well as that before, is to be understood. Go and repeat it, saith God to the prophet, Go yet again. Note, For the conviction and reduction of sinners it is necessary that precept be upon precept, and line upon line. If they will not believe one sign, try another, Ex. iv. 8, 9.

First. Now in this parable we may observe,

1. God's goodness and Israel's badness, strangely serving for a foil to each other, ver. 1. Israel is as a woman beloved of her friend, either of him that has married her, or of him that only courts her, and yet an adulteress; such is the case between God and Israel. We say of those whose affection is mutual, that there is no love lost between them; but here we find a great deal of the love, even of God himself, lost and thrown away upon an unworthy, ungrateful people. The God of Israel retains a very great love for the children of Israel, and yet they are an evil and adulterous generation. "Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and wonder, O earth." 1st. That God's goodness has not put an end to their badness. The Lord loves them, has a kindness for them, and is continually shewing kindness to them; they know it, they cannot but own it, that he has been as a friend and father to them; and yet they look to other gods, gods that they can see, and to the love of which they are drawn by the eye; they look to them with an eye of adoration; they offer up all their services to them, and with an eye of dependence they expect all their comforts from them. If they were restrained from bowing the knee to idols, yet they gave them an amorous glance, and had eyes full of that spiritual adultery. And they love flagons of wine; they therefore joined with idolaters, because they lived merrily, and drank hard; they had a kindness for other gods for the sake of the plenty of good wine with which they had been sometimes treated in their temples. Idolatry and sensuality commonly go together; those that make a god of their belly, as drunkards do, will easily be brought to make a god of any thing else. God's priests were to drink no wine when they went in to minister, and his Nazarites none at all; but the worshippers of other gods drank wine in bowls, nay, no less than flagons of wine would content them. 2nd. That their badness had not put an end to God's goodness, and stopped the current of his favours to them. This is a wonder of mercy indeed, that she is thus "beloved of her friend, though an adulteress." Such is the "love of the Lord toward the children of Israel." Go, saith God, love such a woman: see if thou canst find in thy heart to do it; no, thou canst not; the breast of no man would admit such a love, yet such is my love to the children of Israel. It is love to the loveless, to the unlovely, to those that have a thousand times forfeited it. Note, In God's goodwill to poor sinners his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, and his love is more condescending and compassionate than ours is or can be. In this, as much as any thing, he is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

2. The method found for the bringing of a God so very good and a people so very bad together again. This is the thing aimed at; and what God aims at, he will accomplish. To our great surprise we find a breach, thus wide as the sea, effectually healed; miracles cease not, so long as Divine mercy doth not cease. Observe here,

1st. The course God takes to humble them, and make them know themselves; ver. 2, "I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and an homer and an half of barley," that is, I courted her to be reconciled, to leave her ill courses, and return to her first husband, as ch. ii. 14. I allured her, and spake comfortably to her; as the Levite went after his concubine, that had played the harlot from him, and was run away with another man, he "spake friendly to her," Jud. xix. 3; but here the present which the prophet brought her for the purchasing of her favour is observed to be a very small one; but it was all that was intended for her separate maintenance, and in it she is reduced to a short allowance, and, to punish her for her pride, is made to look very mean. When Samson went to be reconciled to his wife, that had disobliged him, he visited her with a kid, Jud. xv. 1, which was a genteel entertainment. But the prophet here visited his wife with fifteen pieces of silver; a small sum, which yet she must be content to live upon a great while, so long as till her husband thought fit to restore her to her first estate. She shall also have a homer and a half of barley for bread-corn; and that is all she must expect till she be sufficiently humbled, and by a competent time of trial satisfactory proof given that she is indeed reformed. Let her be made sensible that it is not for her own merit that her husband makes court to her; it is but at a lame price that he values her. The price of a servant was thirty shekels, Ex. xxi. 32. This was but half so much; yet let her know it is more than she is worth. God had given Egypt for Israel's ransom once, so precious were they then in his sight, and so honourable, Isa. xliii. 3, 4; but now they have gone a whoring from him he will give but fifteen pieces of silver for them, so much have they lost in their value by their iniquity. Note, Those whom God designs honour and comfort for he first makes sensible of their own worthlessness, and brings them to acknowledge with the prodigal, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Time was when Israel was fed with the finest of the wheat; but they grew wanton, and loved flagons of wine; and therefore, in order to the humbling and reducing of them, they must be brought, in the land of their captivity, to eat barley bread, and be thankful they can get it, and to eat that too by weight and measure, whereas they did not use to be stinted. Note, Poverty and disgrace sometimes prove a happy means of making great sinners penitents.

2nd. The new terms upon which God is willing to come with them; ver. 3, "Thou shalt abide for me many days, and shalt not be for another, so will I be for thee." He might justly have given them a bill of divorce, and have resolved to have no more to do with them; but he is willing to shew them kindness, and that the matter should be compromised. He deals not with them in strict justice, according to the rigour of the law, but according to the multitude of his mercies; and it represents God's gracious dealings with the apostate race of mankind, that had gone a whoring from him; he bought them indeed with an inestimable price, not for their honour, but for the honour of his own justice. And now this is the proposal he makes to them, the covenant of grace he is willing to enter into with them,—they must be to him a people, and he will be to them a God, the same with the proposal here made to Israel.

First. They must take to themselves the shame of their apostasy from him; must submit to, and accept of, the punishment of their iniquity. "Thou shalt abide for many days" in solitude and silence, as a widow that is desolate and in sorrow. They must lay aside their ornaments, and wait with patience and submission to know what God will do with them, and whether he will please to admit such unworthy wretches into his favour again, as they did Ex. xxxiii. 4, 5. Their father, their husband, has spit in their face, (as God said concerning Miriam,) hath put them under the marks of his displeasure; and therefore, like her, they must be "ashamed seven days," and be "shut out of the camp," Num. xii. 14, till "their uncircumcised hearts be humbled," Lev. xxvi. 41. Let them sit alone and "keep silence, waiting for the salvation of the Lord," and in the meantime let them bear the yoke, Lam. iii. 26—28. Let them not expect that God should speedily return in mercy to them, as sometimes he has done, that comfort should come over cheap and easy to them; no, let them want it, let them wait for it many days, during all the days of their captivity, and reckon it a miracle of mercy, and worth waiting for, if it comes at last. Note, Those whom God designs mercy for he will first bring to abase themselves, and to put a high value upon his favours.

Secondly. They must never return to folly again. That is the condition upon which God will "speak peace to his people, and to his saints," Ps. lxxxv. 8, and no other; "Thou shalt not play the harlot," shalt not worship idols in the land of thy captivity, while thou art there set apart for thine uncleanness. Note, It is not enough to take shame to ourselves for the sins we have committed, and to justify God in correcting us for them; but we must resolve, in the strength of God's grace, that we will not offend any more; that we will not again go a whoring from God, after the world and the flesh. Blessed be God, though it is the law of the covenant, it is not the condition of it, that we shall never in any thing do amiss; but "thou shalt not play the harlot," thou shalt not serve other gods, "shalt not be for another man." In the land of their captivity they would be courted to worship the idols of the country; that would be a trial to them, a long trial, many days; but if thou keep thy ground, and hold fast thine integrity, if, when all this is come upon thee, yet thou dost not "stretch out thy hand to a strange god," thou wilt be qualified for the returns of God's favour. Note, It is a certain sign that our afflictions are means of much good to us, and earnests of more, when we are kept by the grace of God from being overcome by the temptations of an afflicted state.

3rd. Upon these terms their Maker will again be their husband; "So will I also be for thee." This is the covenant between God and returning sinners, that if they will be for him to serve him, he will be for them to save them. Let them renounce and abjure all rivals with God for the throne in the heart, and devote themselves entirely to him, and him only, and he will be to them a God all-sufficient. If we be faithful and constant to God in a way of duty, and will never leave nor forsake him, he will be so to us in a way of mercy, and will never leave or forsake us; and a fairer proposal could not be made.

Secondly. Now in the two last verses we have the reddition of the parable, and the application of it to Israel.

1. They must long sit like a widow, stripped of all their joys and honours; Lam. i. 1, 2; "They shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince," &c.; and a nation in this condition may well be called a widow. They want the blessing, 1st. Of civil government. They shall abide without a king, and without a prince of their own. There were kings and princes over them to oppress them, and rule them with rigour, but they had no king or prince to protect them, to fight their battles for them, and administer justice to them, and to take care of their common safety and welfare. Note, Magistracy is a very great blessing to a people, and it is a sad and sore judgment to want it. 2nd. Of public worship. They shall abide "without a sacrifice, and without an image," (or, a statue or pillar; it is used concerning the pillars Jacob erected, Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 45; xxxv. 20;) and "without an ephod and teraphim." The teraphim being here closely joined to the ephod, some think the Urim and Thummim were meant by it, in the breastplate of the high priest. The meaning is, that in their captivity they should not only have no face of a nation upon them, but no face of a church; they should not have (as a learned expositor speaks) liberty of any public profession or exercise of religion, either true or false, according to their choice. They shall have 'no sacrifice or altar;' so the Seventy, and therefore no sacrifice because no altar. They shall have no ephod, or teraphim, no legal priesthood, no means of knowing God's mind, no oracle to consult in doubtful cases, but shall be all in the dark. Note, The case of those is very melancholy that are deprived of all opportunities to worship God in public. This was the case of the Jews in their captivity; and is so far the case of the scattered Jews at this day, that, though they have their synagogues, they have no temple service. Desolate indeed is their condition that are shut out from communion with God, that have no opportunity of directing their addresses to God by sacrifice and altar, and of receiving instructions from him by ephod and teraphim.

2. They shall at length be received again as a wife, ver. 5; "Afterwards," in process of time, when they have gone through this discipline, "they shall return;" that is, they shall repent of their idolatries, and forsake them; they shall apply themselves to God, and adhere to him, and herein they shall be accepted of him. Two things are here promised as instances of their return, and steps towards their acceptance with God in their return.

1st. The inquiries they shall make after God. "They shall seek the Lord their God, and David their king." Note, Those that would find God, and find favour with him, must seek him, must ask after him, covet acquaintance with him, desire to be reconciled to him, set their love on him, and labour in this, that they may be accepted of him. Their seeking him implies that they had lost him, that they were lamenting their loss, and that they were solicitous to retrieve what they had lost. They shall seek him as their God; for, "should not a people seek unto their God?" And they shall seek "David their king," who can be no other than the Messiah, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the "root and offspring of David," whom David himself called Lord, Ps. cx. 1, and to whom God gave "the throne of his father David," Lu. i. 32. The Chaldee reads it, 'They shall seek the service of the Lord their God, and shall obey Messiah, the Son of David, their king:' compare this with Jer. xxx. 9; Eze. xxxii. 23; xxxvii. 25. Note, Those that would seek the Lord so as to find him must apply themselves to Jesus Christ, and must seek to him as their King, and become his willing people, and take an oath of fealty and allegiance to him.

2nd. The reverence they shall have of God. "They shall fear the Lord and his goodness." Some, by his goodness, here understand the temple towards which they shall look in worshipping God. The Jews say, There were three things which Israel cast off in the days of Rehoboam, the kingdom of heaven, the family of David, and the house of the sanctuary; and it will never be well with them till they return and seek them all three, which is here promised. They shall seek the kingdom of heaven in the Lord their God, the royal family in David their king, and the temple in the goodness of the Lord. Others by his goodness understand Christ, the same with David their king; but it is rather to be taken for that attribute of God which he shewed as his glory, and by which he proclaimed his name. Note, It is not only the Lord and his greatness that we are to fear, but the Lord and his goodness; not only his majesty, but his mercy. They shall flee for fear to the Lord and his goodness, (so some take it,) shall flee to it as their city of refuge. We must fear God's goodness; that is, we must admire it, and stand amazed at it; must adore it, and worship, as Moses did at the proclaiming of this name, Ex. xxxiv. 6. We must be afraid of offending his goodness, of making any ungrateful returns for it, and so forfeiting it. "There is forgiveness with God that he may be feared," Ps. cxxx. 4. We must rejoice with trembling in the goodness of God; must not be high-minded, but fear.

Now this promise had its accomplishment when, by the Gospel of Christ, great multitudes, both of Jews and Gentiles, were brought home to God, and incorporated in the New Testament church, served God in Christ with a filial fear of Divine grace, and were accepted of God as his Israel. And some think it is to be yet farther accomplished in the conversion of those Jews to the faith of Christ who shall remain in unbelief; when they shall seek their Messiah, as David their king, and by him all Israel shall be saved, when the fulness of the Gentiles is brought in. Time was when they sought him to put him to death, saying, "We have no king but Cæsar;" but the day is coming when they shall seek him to appoint him their head, and to lay their necks under his yoke. He that hath here promised they shall do it will enable them to do it, and bring about this great work in his own way and time, "in the latter days" of the last time, the times of the Messiah. But, alas, who shall live when God doth this? How far we are to expect a general conversion of that nation, I cannot say, but I am sure we ought to pray that the Jews may be converted.

CHAPTER IV.

Prophets were sent to be reprovers, to tell people of their faults, and to warn them of the judgments of God, to which by sin they exposed themselves; so the prophet is employed in this and the following chapters. He is here, as counsel for the King of kings, opening an indictment against the people of Israel, and labouring to convince them of sin, and of their misery and danger because of sin, that he might prevail with them to repent and reform. I. He shews them what were the grounds of God's controversy with them. A general prevalency of vice and profaneness, ver. 1, 2; ignorance and forgetfulness of God, ver. 6, 7; the worldly mindedness of the priests, ver. 8; drunkenness and uncleanness, ver. 11; using divination and witchcraft, ver. 12; offering sacrifice in the high places, ver. 13; whoredoms, ver. 14, 18; and bribery among magistrates, ver. 18. II. He shews them what would be the consequences of God's controversy. God would punish them for these things, ver. 9; the whole land should be laid waste, ver. 3; all sorts of people cut off, ver. 5; their honour lost, ver. 7; their creature comforts unsatisfying, ver. 10; and themselves made ashamed, ver. 19; and, which is several times mentioned here as the sorest judgment of all, they should be let alone in their sins, ver. 17; they shall not reprove one another, ver. 4; God will not punish them, ver. 14; nay, he will let them prosper, ver. 16. III. He gives warning to Judah not to tread in the steps of Israel, because they saw the steps went down to hell, ver. 15.

HEAR the word of the LORD, ye children of Israel:
For the LORD hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land,
Because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land.
2 By swearing, and lying, and killing,
And stealing, and committing adultery, they break out,
And blood toucheth blood.
3 Therefore shall the land mourn,
And every one that dwelleth therein shall languish,
With the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven;
Yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away.
4 Yet let no man strive, nor reprove another:
For thy people are as they that strive with the priest.
5 Therefore shalt thou fall in the day,
And the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night,
And I will destroy thy mother.

Here is, First. The court set, and both attendance and attention demanded. "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel," for to you is the word of this conviction sent, whether you will hear or whether you will forbear. Whom may God expect to give him a fair hearing, and to take from him a fair warning, but the children of Israel, his own professing people; yea, they will be ready enough to hear when God speaks comfortably to them, but are they willing to hear when he hath a controversy with them? Yes, they must hear him when he pleads against them, when he has something to lay to their charge. "The Lord has a controversy with the inhabitants of the land," of this land, of this holy land. Note, Sin is the great mischief-maker, it sows discord between God and Israel. God sees sin in his own people, and a good action he has against them for it. Some more particular actions lie against his own people, which do not lie against other sinners. He has a controversy with them for breaking covenant with him, for bringing a reproach upon him, and for an ungrateful return to him for his favour. God's controversy will be pleaded; pleaded by the judgments of his mouth, before they are pleaded by the judgments of his hand, that he may be justified in all he doth, and may make it appear he desires not the death of sinners. And God's pleadings ought to be attended to; for, sooner or later, they shall have a hearing.

Secondly. The indictment read, by which the whole nation stands charged with crimes of a heinous nature, by which God is highly provoked.

1. They are charged with national omissions of the most important duties. There is no truth nor mercy, neither justice nor charity; these most weighty matters of the law, as our Saviour accounts them, Mat. xxiii. 23, judgment, mercy, and faith. The generality of the people seemed to have no sense at all of the thing called honesty; they made no conscience of what they said and did, though never so contrary to the truth and injurious to their neighbour. Much less had they any sense of mercy, or any obligation they were under to pity and help the poor. And it is not strange there is "no truth and mercy," when there is no "knowledge of God in the land." What good can be expected where there is no knowledge of God? It was the privilege of that land, that in Israel God was made known, and his name great, which was an aggravation of their sin, that they did not know him, Ps. lxxvi. 1.

2. Hence follow national commissions of the most enormous sins against both the first and second table, for they had no regard at all to either. Swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, against the third, ninth, sixth, eighth, and seventh commandments, were to be found in all the corners of the land, and among all orders and degrees of men among them, ver. 2. The corruption was universal. What good people there were among them were either lost or hid, or hid themselves. By these they break out; that is, they transgress all bounds of reason, and conscience, and the Divine law. "They have exceeded," Job xxxvi. 9; they have been "overmuch wicked," Eccl. vii. 17; they suffer their corruptions to break out; they themselves break over and break through all that stand in their way, and would stop them in their sinful career, as water overflows the banks. Note, Sin is a violent thing, and its power exorbitant. When men's hearts are fully set in them to do evil, (Eccl. viii. 11,) what will be restrained from them? Gen. xi. 6. When they break out thus, "blood touches blood;" that is, abundance of murders are committed in all parts of the country, and, as it were, in a constant series and succession. Cædes aliæ aliis sunt contiguæ,—'Murders touch murders.' A stream of blood flows down among them, even royal blood. It was about this time that there was so much blood shed in grasping at the crown. Shallum slew Zechariah, and Menahem slew Shallum; Pekah slew Pekahiah, and Hoshea slew Pekah; and the like bloody work, it is likely, there was among other contenders; so then the land was "polluted with blood," Ps. cvi. 38; "it was filled with blood from one end to the other," 2 Kin. xxi. 16.

Thirdly. Sentence passed upon this guilty and polluted land, ver. 3. It shall be utterly destroyed and laid waste. The whole land is infected with sin, and therefore the whole land shall mourn under God's sore judgments; shall sit in mourning, being stripped of all its wealth and beauty. As the valleys are said to shout for joy, and sing when there is plenty and peace, so here they are said to mourn, when by war and famine they are made desolate. The "whole land shall be brimstone, and salt, and burning," as was threatened in the law, Deu. xxix. 23. They had broken all God's commandments, and now God threatens to take away all their comforts. The land mourns when there is neither grass for the cattle nor herb for the service of man; and then "every one that dwelleth therein shall languish" for want of nice food to support a wasting life, and fret for want of the usual dainties for delight. The "beasts of the field will languish," Jer. xiv. 5, 6. Nay, the destruction of the fruits of the earth shall be so great that there shall not be picking for the fowls of the air to keep them alive; they shall suffer with man; and their dying, or growing lean, will be a punishment to those who used to have their tables replenished with wild fowl. Nay, "the fishes of the sea shall be taken away, or gathered together," that they may go away in shoals to some other coast, and then the fishing trade will be worth nothing. This desolation shall be in that respect more general than that by Noah's flood, for that did not affect the fishes of the sea, but this shall. It was part of one of the plagues of Egypt that he slew their fish, Ps. cv. 29; when the waters are dried, the fish die, Isa. l. 2; Zeph. i. 2, 3. Note, When man becomes disobedient to God, it is just that the inferior creatures should be made unserviceable to man. Oh what reason have we to admire God's patience and mercy to our land, that though there is in it so much swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and adultery, yet there is plenty of flesh, and fish, and fowl on our tables!

Fourthly. An order of court, that no pains should be taken with the condemned criminal to bring him to repentance, with the reason for that order. Observe,

1. The order itself; ver. 4, "Yet let no man strive or reprove another;" that is, let no means be used to reduce and reclaim them; let their physicians give them up as desperate, and past cure. It intimates that as long as there is any hope we ought to reprove sinners for their sins; it is a duty we owe to one another to give and take reproofs: it was one of the laws of Moses, Lev. xix 17, "Thou shalt in anywise rebuke thy neighbour;" it is an instance of brotherly love. Sometimes there is need to rebuke sharply; not only to reprove, but to strive, so loth are men to part with their sins. But it is a sign that persons and people are abandoned to ruin when God saith, Let them not be reproved. Yet this is to be understood as God's commands sometimes to the prophets not to pray for them, notwithstanding which they did pray for them; but the meaning is, they are so hardened in sin, and so ripened for ruin, that it will be to little purpose either to deal with them or to deal with God for them. Note, It bodes ill to a people when reprovers are silenced, and when those that should witness against the sins of the times retire into a corner, and give up the cause: see 2 Chr. xxv. 16.

2. The reasons of this order. Let them not reprove one another; for, 1st. They are determined to go on in sin, and no reproofs will cure them of that. "Thy people are as they that strive with the priest;" that is, they are grown so very impudent in sin, so very insolent and impatient of reproof, that they will fly in the face even of a priest himself, if he should but give them the least check, without any regard to his character and office; and how then can it be thought they should take a reproof from a private person? Note, Those sinners have their hearts wickedly hardened that quarrel with their ministers for dealing faithfully with them; and those who rebel against ministerial reproof, which is an ordinance of God for their reformation, have forfeited the benefit of brotherly reproof too. Perhaps this may refer to the late wickedness of Joash king of Judah, and his people, who stoned Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, for delivering them a message from God, 2 Chr. xxiv. 21; he was a priest, with him they strove when he was officiating between the temple and the altar. And Dr. Lightfoot thinks the prophet had an eye to his case when he spoke (ver. 2) of "blood touching blood," the blood of the sanctifier was mingled with the blood of the sacrifice. That, saith he, was the apex of their wickedness, from thence their ruin was to be dated, Mat. xxiii. 35, as this is of their incorrigibleness, that they are as those who "strive with the priest," therefore let no man reprove them; for, 2nd. God also is determined to proceed in their ruin, ver. 5. Therefore, because thou wilt take no reproof, no advice, thou shalt fall; and it is in vain for any to think of preventing it, for the decree is gone forth. Thou shalt stumble and "fall in the day," and the prophet, the false prophet, that flattered and seduced thee, "shall fall with thee in the night;" that is, both thou and thy prophet shall fall, night and day; shall be continually falling into one calamity or other; the darkness of the night shall not help to cover thee from trouble, nor the light of the day help thee to flee from it. The prophets are blind leaders, and the people blind followers; and, to the blind, day and night are alike, so that, whether it be day or night, both shall fall together into the ditch. Thou shalt fall in the day, when thy fall is least feared by thyself, and thou art very secure, and in the day, when it will be seen and be observed by others, and turn most to thy shame; and the prophet shall fall in the night, when to himself it will be most terrible. Note, The ruin of those who have helped to ruin others, will, in a special manner, be intolerable. And did the children think, when they were in danger of falling, their mother would help them? It shall be in vain to expect it, for "I will destroy thy mother," Samaria, the mother city, the whole state or kingdom, which is as a mother to every part; it shall all be made silent. Note, When all are involved in guilt, nothing less can be expected but that all should be involved in ruin.

6 My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge:
Because thou hast rejected knowledge,
I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me:
Seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God,
I will also forget thy children.
7 As they were increased, so they sinned against me:
Therefore will I change their glory into shame.
8 They eat up the sin of my people,
And they set their heart on their iniquity.
9 And there shall be, like people, like priest:
And I will punish them for their ways,
And reward them their doings.
10 For they shall eat, and not have enough:
They shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase:
Because they have left off to take heed to the LORD.
11 Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart.

God is here proceeding in his controversy, both with the priests and with the people. The people were as those that strove with the priests, ver. 4, when they had priests that did their duty; but the generality of them lived in the neglect of their duty; and here is a word for those priests, and for the people that love to have it so, Jer. v. 31. And it is observable here how the punishment answers the sin, and how, for the justifying of his own proceedings, God sets the one over against the other.

First. The people strive with the priests that should have taught them the knowledge of God justly, therefore are they "destroyed for lack of knowledge," ver. 6. Note, Those that rebel against the light can expect no other but to perish in the dark. Or, it is a charge upon the priests, who should have been still teaching the people knowledge, (Eccl. xii. 9,) but they did not, or did it in such a manner that it was as if they had not done it at all, so there was no knowledge of God in the land; and because there was no vision, or none to any purpose, the people perished, Pr. xxix. 18. Note, Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion that it is the mother of destruction. Lack of knowledge is ruining to any person or people. They are my people that are thus destroyed. Their relation to God, as his people, aggravates both their sin in not taking pains to get the knowledge of that God whose command they were under, and with whom they were taken into covenant, and their sin likewise who should have taught them. God set his children to school to them, and they never minded them, nor took any pains with them.

Secondly. Both priests and people rejected knowledge, and justly therefore will God reject them. The reason why the people did not learn, and the priests did not teach, was not because they had not the light, but because they hated it; not because they had not ways of coming to the knowledge of God, and of communicating it, but because they had no heart to it. They rejected it; they desired not the knowledge of God's ways, but put it from them, and shut their eyes against the light, and therefore "I will also reject thee;" I will refuse to take cognizance of thee, and to own thee. You will not know me, but bid me depart; I will therefore say, "Depart from me, I know you not." Thou shalt be no priest to me. 1st. The priests shall be no longer admitted to the privileges, or employed in the services, of the priesthood, nor shall they ever be received again, as we find, Eze. xliv. 13. Note, Ministers that reject knowledge, that are grossly ignorant and scandalous, ought not to be owned as ministers, but that which they seemed to have should be taken away, Lu. viii. 18. 2nd. The people shall be no longer as they have been, a kingdom of priests, a royal priesthood, Ex. xix. 6. God's people, by rejecting knowledge, forfeit their honour, and profane their own crown.

Thirdly. They forgot the law of God, neither desired nor endeavoured to retain it in mind, nor to transmit the remembrance of it to their posterity, and therefore justly will God forget them and their children, the people's children; they did not educate them as they ought to have done, in the knowledge of God and their duty to him, and therefore God will disown them, as not in covenant with him. Note, If parents do not teach their children when they are young to remember their Creator, they cannot expect that their Creator should remember them. Or, it may be meant of the priests' children; they shall not succeed them in the priests' office, but shall be reduced to poverty, as is threatened against Eli's house, 1 Sam. ii. 20.

Fourthly. They dishonoured God with that which was their honour; and justly, therefore, will God strip them of it, ver. 7. It was their honour that they were increased in number, wealth, power, and dignity. The beginning of their nation was small, but in process of time it greatly increased, and grew very considerable; the family of the priests increased wonderfully; but as they were increased, so they sinned against God; the more populous the nation grew, the more sin was committed, and the more profane they were; their wealth, honour, and power did but make them the more daring in sin. Therefore, saith God, "will I change their glory into shame." Are their numbers their glory? God will diminish them, and make them few. Is their wealth their glory? God will impoverish them, and bring them low; so that they shall themselves be ashamed of that which they gloried in. Their priests shall be made contemptible and base, Mal. ii. 9. Note, That which is our honour, if we dishonour God with it, will sooner or later be turned into shame to us; for "they that despise God shall be lightly esteemed," 1 Sam. ii. 30.

Fifthly. The priests eat up the sin of God's people, and therefore "they shall eat, and not have enough." 1. They abused the maintenance that was allowed to the priest, to the priests of the house of Aaron, by the law of God, and to the mock priests of the calves, by their constitution; ver. 8, "They eat up the sin of my people," that is, their sin offerings. If it be meant of the priests of the calves, it intimates their seizing that which they had no right to; they usurped the revenues of the priests, though they were no priests. If it be meant of those who were legal priests, it intimates their greediness of the profits and perquisites of their office, when they took no care at all to do the duty of it. They feasted upon their part of the offerings of the Lord, but forgot the work for which they were so well paid. They set their hearts upon the people's iniquities; they lifted up their soul to them; that is, they were glad when people did commit iniquity, that they might be obliged to bring an offering to make atonement for it, which they should have their share of. The more sins, the more sacrifices, and therefore they cared not how much sin people were guilty of. Instead of warning the people against sin, from the consideration of the sacrifices, which shewed them what an offence sin was to God, since it needed such an expiation, they emboldened and encouraged the people to sin, since an atonement might be made at so small an expense. Thus they glutted themselves upon the sins of the people, and helped to keep up that which they should have beaten down. Note, It is a very wicked thing to be well pleased with the sins of others because some way or other they may turn to our advantage. 2. God will therefore deny them this blessing upon their maintenance; ver. 10, "They shall eat, and not have enough." Though they have great plenty by the abundance of offerings that are brought in, yet they shall have no satisfaction in it. Either their food shall yield no good nourishment, or their greedy appetites shall not be satisfied with it. Note, What is unlawfully gained cannot be comfortably used; no, nor that which is inordinately coveted. It is just that the desires that are insatiable should always be unsatisfied, and that those should never have enough who never know when they have enough: see Mic. vi. 14; Hag. i. 6.

Sixthly. The more they increased, the more they sinned, ver. 7; and therefore, though they commit whoredom, though they take the most wicked methods to multiply their people, yet they shall not increase. Though they have many wives and concubines, as Solomon had, yet they shall not have their families built up thereby in a numerous progeny, any more than he had. Note, Those that hope any way to increase by unlawful means will be disappointed; and therefore God will thus blast their projects, "because they have left off to take heed to the Lord." Time was when they had some regard to God and to his authority over them, and interest in them, but they have left it off; they take no heed to his word or to his providences; they do not eye him in either. They forsake him, so as not to take heed to him; they have apostatised to that degree that they have no manner of regard to God, but are perfectly without God in the world. Note, Those that leave off to take heed to the Lord leave off all good, and can expect no other but that all good should leave them.

Seventhly. The people and the priests did harden one another in sin, and therefore justly shall they be sharers in the punishment; ver. 9, "There shall be like people, like priest." So they were in character; people and priest were both alike ignorant and profane, regardless of God and their duty, and addicted to idolatry. And so they shall be in condition; God will bring judgments upon them that shall be the destruction both of priest and people. The famine that deprives a people of their meat shall deprive the priests of their meat offerings, Joel i. 9. It is part of the description of an universal desolation, that it shall be "as with the people, so with the priest," Isa. xxiv. 2. God's judgments, when they come with commission, will make no difference. Note, Sharers in sin must expect to be sharers in ruin. Thus God will "punish them" both "for their ways, and reward them their doings." God will cause their doings to return upon them, so the word is. When a sin is committed, the sinner thinks it is gone, and he shall hear no more of it; but he shall find it called over again, and made to return, either to his humiliation or condemnation.

Eighthly. They indulged themselves in the delights of sense, to hold up their hearts, but they shall find that they take away their hearts; ver. 11, "Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart." Some join this with the foregoing words, They have forsaken the Lord, to take heed to whoredom and wine and new wine; or, Because these have taken away their heart. Their sensual pleasures have taken them off from their devotions, and drowned all that is good in them. Or, we may take it as a distinct sentence, containing a great truth we see confirmed by every day's experience. Theft, drunkenness, and uncleanness, are sins that besot and infatuate men, weaken and enfeeble them; they take away both the understanding and the courage.

12 My people ask counsel at their stocks,
And their staff declareth unto them:
For the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err,
And they have gone a whoring from under their God.
13 They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains,
And burn incense upon the hills,
Under oaks and poplars and elms,
Because the shadow thereof is good:
Therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom,
And your spouses shall commit adultery. [whoredom,
14 I will not punish your daughters when they commit
Nor your spouses when they commit adultery:
For themselves are separated with whores,
And they sacrifice with harlots:
Therefore the people that doth not understand shall fall.
15 Though thou, Israel, play the harlot,
Yet let not Judah offend;
And come not ye unto Gilgal,
Neither go ye up to Beth-aven,
Nor swear, The LORD liveth.
16 For Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer:
Now the LORD will feed them as a lamb in a large place.
17 Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone.
18 Their drink is sour:
They have committed whoredom continually:
Her rulers with shame do love, Give ye.
19 The wind hath bound her up in her wings,
And they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices.

In these verses we have, as before,

First. The sins charged upon the people of Israel, for which God had a controversy with them; and they are,

1. Spiritual whoredom, that is, idolatry. They have in them a "spirit of whoredoms," that is, a strong inclination to that sin, the bent and bias of their hearts is that way; it is their own iniquity, they are carried out towards it with an unaccountable violence, and this causeth them to err. Note, The errors and mistakes of the judgment are commonly owing to the corrupt affections; men, therefore, have a good opinion of sin, because they have a disposition towards it; and, having such erroneous notions of idols, and such passionate motions towards them, no marvel that, with such a head and such a heart, they have "gone a whoring from under their God," ver. 12. They ought to have been in subjection to him as their head and husband, to have been under his conduct and command; but they revolted from their allegiance, and put themselves under the conduct and protection of false gods. So ver. 15, Israel has played the harlot; their carriage in the worship of their idols was like that of a harlot, wanton and impudent. And ver. 16, "Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer;" as an untamed heifer, so some; or, as a perverse or refractory one, so others; as a heifer that, if turned loose, runs madly about the pasture; or, if put under the yoke, (which seems rather to be alluded to here,) will draw back, instead of going forward, will struggle to get her neck out of the yoke, and her feet out of the furrow. Thus unruly, ungovernable, untractable, were the people of Israel. They had begun to draw in the yoke of God's ordinances, but they drew back, as children of Belial, that will not endure the yoke; and, when the prophets were sent with the goad of reproof, to put them forwards, they kicked against the pricks, and ran backwards. The sum of all is, ver. 17, "Ephraim is joined to idols," is perfectly wedded to them, his affections are glued to them, and his heart is upon them. There are two instances given of their spiritual whoredom, in both of which they gave that honour to their idols which is due to God only. 1st. They consulted them as oracles, and used those arts of divination which they had learned from their idolatrous priests; ver. 12, "My people ask counsel at their stocks," their wooden gods; they apply themselves to them for advice and direction in what they should do, and for information concerning the event. They say to a stock, Thou art my father, Jer. ii. 27; and if it were indeed a father it were worthy of this honour. But it was a great affront to God, who was indeed their Father, and whose lively oracles they had among them, with which they had liberty to consult at any time, thus to ask counsel at their stocks. And they expect that their staff should declare to them what course they should take, and what the event should be. It is probable this refers to some wicked methods of divination used among the Gentiles, and which the Jews learned from them, by a piece of wood, or by a staff, like Nebuchadnezzar's divining by his arrows, Eze. xxi. 21. Note, Those who forsake the oracles of God to take their measures from the world and the flesh, do, in effect, but consult with their stocks and their staves. 2nd. They offered sacrifice to them as gods, whose favour they wanted, and whose wrath they dreaded and deprecated, ver. 13. They sacrifice to them to atone and pacify them, and burn incense to them to please and gratify them, and hope, by both, to recommend themselves to them. God had pitched upon the place where he would record his name, but they, having forsaken that, chose places for their irreligious rites which pleased their own fancies. They chose, First. High places, "upon the tops of the mountains, and upon the hills," foolishly imagining that the height of the ground gave them some advantage in their approaches towards heaven. Secondly. Shady places, "under oaks, and poplars, and elms;" because the shadow thereof is pleasant to them, especially in those hot countries, and therefore they thought it was pleasing to their gods; or, they fancied that a thick shade befriends contemplation, possesses the mind with something of an awe, and therefore is proper for devotion.

2. Corporeal whoredom is another crime charged upon them; "They have committed whoredom continually," ver. 18. They drove a trade of uncleanness; it was not a single act now and then, but their constant practice, as it is of many that have "eyes full of adultery," and which cannot cease from that sin, 2 Pet. ii. 14. Now the abominable filthiness and lewdness that was found in Israel is here spoken of, 1st. As a concomitant of their idolatry; their false gods drew them to it; for the devil whom they worshipped, though a spirit, is an unclean spirit. They that worshipped idols were separated with whores, and they sacrificed with harlots, for because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, but dishonoured him, therefore God gave them up to vile affections, by the indulging of which they dishonoured themselves, Rom. i. 24, 28. 2nd. As a punishment of it. The men that worshipped idols were separated with whores that attended the idolatrous rites, as in the worship of Baal-peor, Num. xxv. 1—3; and to punish them for that, God gave up their wives and daughters to the like vile affections; they committed whoredom and adultery, ver. 13, which could not but be a great grief and reproach to their husbands and parents; for those that are not chaste themselves desire to have their wives and daughters so. But thus they might read their sin in their punishment, as David's adultery was punished in the debauching of his concubines by his own son, 2 Sam. xii. 11. Note, When the same sin in others is made men's grief and affliction which they have themselves been guilty of, they must own the Lord is righteous.

3. The perverting of justice, ver. 18. Their rulers, be it spoken to their shame, do love "Give ye;" that is, they love bribes, and have it continually in their mouths, Give, give. They are given to filthy lucre; every one that has any business with them must expect to be asked, What will ye give? Though, as rulers, they are bound by office to do justice, yet none can have justice done them without a fee, and then you may be sure, for a fee, they will do injustice. Note, The love of money is the ruin of equity, and the root of all iniquity; but, of all men, it is a shame for rulers, who should be men fearing God, and hating covetousness, to love "Give ye." Perhaps this is intended in that part of the charge here, "Their drink is sour;" it is dead, it is gone. Justice, duly administered, is refreshing, like drink to the thirsty; but when it is perverted, and rulers take rewards, either to acquit the guilty or to condemn the innocent, the drink is sour, they "turn judgment into wormwood," Am. v. 7. Or, it may refer in general to the depraved morals of the whole nation; they had lost all their life and spirit, and were as offensive to God as dead or sour drink is to us: see Deu. xxxii. 32, 33.

1. Their wives and daughters should not be punished for the injury and disgrace they did to their families; ver. 14, "I will not punish your daughters," and, not being punished for it, they would go on in it. Note, The impunity of one sinner is sometimes made the punishment of another. Or, I will not punish them so as I will punish you; for you must own, as Judah did concerning her daughter-in-law, that they are more righteous than you, Gen. xxxviii. 26.

2. They themselves should prosper for awhile, but their prosperity should help to destroy them. It comes in as a token of God's wrath; ver. 16, "The Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place;" they shall have a fat pasture and a large one, in which they shall be fed to the full, and fed with the best, but it shall be only to prepare them for the slaughter, as a lamb is that is so fed. If they wax fat and kick, they do but wax fat for the butcher. But others make them feed as a lamb on the common, a large place indeed, but where it has short grass, and lies exposed. The Shepherd of Israel will turn them both out of his pastures and out of his protection.

3. No means should be used to bring them to repentance; ver. 17, "Ephraim is joined to idols," is in love with them, and addicted to them, and therefore "let him alone," as, ver. 4, Let no man reprove him; let him be given up to his own heart's lust, and walk in his own counsels; we would have healed him, and he would not be healed, therefore forsake him. See what their end will be, Deu. xxxii. 20. Note, It is a sad and sore judgment for any man to be let alone in sin, for God to say concerning a sinner, He is joined to his idols, the world and the flesh—he is incurably proud, covetous, or profane, an incurable drunkard or adulterer,—let him alone; conscience, let him alone; minister, let him alone; providences, let him alone; let nothing awaken him till the flames of hell do it. The father corrects not the son any more when he determines to disinherit him. Those that are not disturbed in their sin will be destroyed for their sin.

4. They should be hurried away with a swift and shameful destruction; ver. 19, "The wind hath bound her up in her wings" to carry her away into captivity, suddenly, violently, and irresistibly. He shall take them away as with a whirlwind, Ps. lviii. 9; and then "they shall be ashamed because of their" sacrifices; ashamed of their sin, in offering sacrifice to idols; ashamed of their folly, in putting themselves to such an expense upon gods that have no power to help them, and thereby to make that God their enemy that has an almighty power to destroy them. Note, There are sacrifices that men will one day be ashamed of. Those that have sacrificed their time, strength, honour, and all their comforts to the world and the flesh, will shortly be ashamed of it. Yea, and those that bring to God blind, and lame, and heartless sacrifices, will be ashamed of them too.

Thirdly. The warning given to Judah, not to sin after the similitude of Israel's transgression. It is said in the close of ver. 14, They that do not understand shall fall. They must needs fall that do not understand how to avoid or get over the stumbling-blocks they meet with; and, therefore, "let him that thinks he stands take heed lest he fall," particularly the two tribes; ver. 15, "though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend." Though Israel be given to idolatry, yet let not Judah take the infection. Now, 1st. This was a very needful caution. The men of Israel were brethren and near neighbours to the men of Judah; Israel was more numerous, and at this time in a prosperous condition, and therefore there was danger lest the men of Judah should learn their way, and get a snare to their souls. Note, The nearer we are to the infection of sin, the more need we have to stand upon our guard. 2nd. It was a very rational caution. Let Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah do so; for Judah has greater means of knowledge than Israel, has the temple and priesthood, and a king of the house of David. From Judah Shiloh is to come, and for Judah God has reserved great blessings in store; therefore, let not Judah offend, for more is expected from them than from Israel, and they will have more to answer for if they do offend, and from them God will take it more unkindly. If Israel play the harlot, let not Judah do so too, for then God will have no professing people in the world. God bespeaks Judah here, as Christ doth the twelve, when many turned their backs upon them, "Will you also go away?" Jno. vi. 67. Note, Those that have hitherto kept their integrity should, for that reason, still hold it fast, even in times of general apostasy. Now to preserve Judah from offending as Israel had done, two rules are here given: First. That they might not be guilty of idolatry they must keep at a distance from the places of idolatry; "Come not ye unto Gilgal," where all their wickedness was, ch. ix. 15, xii. 11; there they multiplied transgression, Am. iv. 4; and perhaps they contracted a veneration for that place, because there it was said to Joshua, "The place where thou standest is holy ground," Josh. v. 15; therefore they are forbidden to enter into Gilgal, Am. v. 5. And for the same reason they must not go up to Bethel. here called the house of vanity, for so Beth-aven signifies; not the house of God, as Bethel signifies. Note, Those that would be kept from sin, and not fall into the devil's hands, must studiously avoid the occasions of sin, and not come upon the devil's ground. Secondly. That they might not be guilty of idolatry, they must take heed of profaneness, and not swear "The Lord liveth." They are commanded to swear, "The Lord liveth, in truth and righteousness," Jer. iv. 2; and, therefore, that which is here forbidden is swearing so in untruth and unrighteousness, swearing rashly and lightly, or falsely and with deceit; or swearing by the Lord and the idol, Zeph. i. 5. Note, Those that would be steady in their adherence to God must possess themselves with an awe and reverence of God, and always speak of him with solemnity and seriousness; for those that can make a jest of the true God will make a god of any thing.

CHAPTER V.

The scope of this chapter is the same with the foregoing chapter, to discover the sin both of Israel and Judah, and to denounce the judgments of God against them. I. They are called to hearken to the charge, ver. 1, 8. II. They are accused of many sins, which are here aggravated: 1. Persecution, ver. 1, 2; 2. Spiritual whoredom, ver. 3, 4; 3. Pride, ver. 5; 4. Apostacy from God, ver. 7; 5. The tyranny of the princes, and the tameness of the people in submitting to it, ver. 10, 11. III. They are threatened with God's displeasure for their sins. He knows all their wickedness, ver. 3; and makes known his wrath against them for it, ver. 9. 1. They shall fall in their iniquity, ver. 5; 2. God will forsake them, ver. 6; 3. Their portions shall be devoured, ver. 7; 4. God will rebuke them, and pour out his wrath upon them, ver. 9, 10; 5. They shall be oppressed, ver. 11; 6. God will be as a moth to them in secret judgments, ver. 12, and as a lion in public judgments, ver. 14. IV. They are blamed for the wrong course they took under their afflictions, ver. 13. V. It is intimated that they shall at length take a right course, ver. 15. The more generally these things are expressed, of so much the more general use they are for our learning, and particularly for our admonition.

HEAR ye this, O priests;
And hearken, ye house of Israel;
And give ye ear, O house of the king;
For judgment is toward you,
Because ye have been a snare on Mizpah,
And a net spread upon Tabor.
2 And the revolters are profound to make slaughter,
Though I have been a rebuker of them all.
3 I know Ephraim,
And Israel is not hid from me:
For now, O Ephraim, thou committest whoredom,
And Israel is defiled.
4 They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God:
For the spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them,
And they have not known the LORD.
5 And the pride of Israel doth testify to his face:
Therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity;
Judah also shall fall with them.
6 They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the LORD;
But they shall not find him;
He hath withdrawn himself from them.
7 They have dealt treacherously against the LORD:
For they have begotten strange children:
Now shall a month devour them with their portions.

Here, First. All orders and degrees of men are cited to appear, and answer to such things as shall be laid to their charge; ver. 1, "Hear ye this, O priests," whether in holy orders, as those in Judah, and perhaps many in Israel too,—for in the ten tribes there were divers cities of priests and Levites, who it is probable stayed in their own lot after the revolt of the ten tribes, and did so much of their office as might belong at a distance from the temple,—or pretending holy orders, as the priests of the calves, who, some think, are included here, "Hearken, ye house of Israel," the common people, and "give ear, O house of the king." Let them all take notice, for they have all contributed to the national guilt, and they shall all share in the national judgments. Note, If neither the sanctity of the priesthood, nor the dignity of the royal family, will prevail to keep out sin, it cannot be expected they should avail to keep out wrath. If the priests, and the house of the king, though they bear such noble characters, sin like others, their noble characters will not excuse them, but they must smart like others. Nor shall it be any plea for the house of Israel that they were misled by their priests and princes, but they shall receive their doom with them, and neither their meanness nor their multitude shall be their exemption.

Secondly. Witness is produced against them, one instead of a thousand; it is God's omniscience; ver. 3, "I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me." "They have not known the Lord," ver. 4, but the Lord has known them; knows their true character, however disguised; knows their secret wickedness, however concealed. Note, Men's rejecting the knowledge of God will not secure them from his knowledge of them; and when he contends with them he will prove their sins upon them by his own knowledge, so that it will be in vain to plead Not guilty.

Thirdly. Very ill things are laid to their charge.

1. They had been both very ingenious and very industrious to draw people either into sin, or into trouble; Ye have been "a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor," ver. 1, that is, such snares and nets as the huntsmen use to lay upon these mountains in pursuit of their game. When the worship of the calves was set up in Israel, the patrons of that idolatry, and sticklers for it, contrived by all possible arts and wiles to draw men into it, and reconcile those to it that at first had a dread of it. Note, Those that allure and entice men to sin, however they may pretend friendship and goodwill, are to be looked upon as snares and nets to them, and their hands as bands, Eccl. vii. 26; but to those whom they could not seduce into sin they were as a net and a snare, to bring them into trouble. Some think it was their practice to set spies in the road, and particularly upon the mountains of Mizpah and Tabor, at the times of the solemn feasts at Jerusalem, to watch if any of their people who were piously affected went thither, and to inform against them, that they might be prosecuted for it; thus doing the devil's work, who disquiets those whom he cannot debauch.

2. They had been both very crafty and very cruel in carrying on their designs; ver. 2, "The revolters are profound to make slaughter." Note, Those that have themselves apostatized from the truths of God are often the most subtle and barbarous persecutors of those who still adhere to them. Nothing will serve them but to make slaughter; it is the blood of the saints that they thirst after, and with the serpent's sting they have his head,—they are profound to do it. O the depth of the depths of Satan, of the wickedness of his agents, of those that have deeply revolted! Isa. xxxi. 6. Now that which aggravated this was the many reproofs and warnings that had been given them; "Though I have been a rebuker of them all." The prophet had been so, a reprover by office, he had many a time told them of the evil of their ways and doings, had dealt plainly with them all, and had not spared either the priests or the house of the king. God himself had been a rebuker of them all by their own consciences, and by his providences. Note, Sins against reproof are doubly sinful, Pr. xxix. 1.

3. They had committed whoredom, had defiled their own bodies with fleshly lusts, had defiled their own souls with the worship of idols, ver. 3. This God was a witness to, though secretly committed and artfully palliated. Nay, the piercing eye of God saw "the spirit of whoredom" that was "in the midst of them," their secret inclination and disposition to those sins, the love they had to their sins, and the dominion their sins had over them, how much they were under the power of a "spirit of whoredoms," that root of bitterness which bore all this gall and wormwood, that corrupt and poisoned fountain.

4. They have no disposition at all to come into acquaintance and communion with God. The "spirit of whoredoms" having caused them to err from him, keeps them wandering endlessly, ver. 4. 1st. "They have not known the Lord," nor desired to know him, but have rather declined, nay, dreaded the knowledge of him, for that would disturb them in their sinful ways. 2nd. Therefore "they will not frame their doings, to turn to their God;" by which it appeared they did not know him aright. It speaks their obstinate persisting in their apostasy from God. They would not turn to God, though he is their God, theirs in covenant, by whose name they have been called, and whom they were bound to serve. They would not return to their worship of him, from which they had turned aside. Nay, they would not frame their doings to turn to God. They would not consider their ways, nor dispose themselves into a serious temper, nor apply their minds to think of those things that would bring them to God. It is true we cannot, by our own power, without the special grace of God, turn to him; but we may by the due improvement of our own faculties, and the common aids of his Spirit, frame our doings to turn to him. And those that will not do that, that "prepare not their hearts to seek the Lord," 2 Chr. xii. 14, owe it to themselves that they are not turned, they die because they will die; and to those that will do this farther grace shall not be wanting.

5. They were guilty of notorious arrogancy and insolence in sin; ver. 5, "The pride of Israel doth testify to his face," doth witness against him, that he is a rebel to God and his government. The spirit of whoredoms which was in the midst of them shewed itself in the gaiety and gaudiness of their worship, as a harlot is known by her attire, Pr. vii. 10. The wantonness of her dress testifies to her face that she is not a modest woman. Or, their pride, in confronting the prophets God sent them, and the message they brought, Jer. xliii. 2. Or, a haughty, scornful carriage towards their brethren, and those that were under them; this witnessed against them that they were not God's people, and justified God in all the humbling judgments he brought upon them. His pride testifies in his face; so some read it, agreeing with Isa. iii. 9, "The show of their countenance doth witness against them." They have that proud look which the Lord hates.

6. They departed from God to idols, and bred up their children in idolatry; "They have dealt treacherously against the Lord," as a wife that, in contempt of the marriage covenant, forsakes her husband, and lives in adultery with another. Thus they who are guilty of spiritual idolatry, whose god is their money, whose god is their belly, deal treacherously against the Lord; they violate their engagements to him, and frustrate his expectations from them. Note, Wilful sinners are treacherous dealers, "they have begotten strange children," that is, their children which they have begotten are estranged from God, and trained up in a false way of worship; they are a spurious brood, as children of fornication, Jno. viii. 41, whom God will disown. Note, Those deal treacherously with God indeed who not only turn from following him themselves, but train up their children in wicked ways.

Fourthly. Very sad things are made to be their doom. In general, ver. 1, "Judgment is toward you," God is coming forth to contend with you, and to testify his displeasure against you for your sins. It is time to hearken when judgment is towards us. In particular,

1. They shall fall in their iniquity. This follows upon their pride testifying to their face; ver. 5, "Therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity." Note, Pride will have a fall; it is the certain presage and forerunner of it. They that exalt themselves shall be abased. The face in which pride testifies shall be filled with confusion. They shall not only fall, but fall in their iniquity, the saddest fall of all other. Their pride kept them from repenting of their iniquity, and therefore they shall fall in it. Note, Those that are not humbled for their sins are likely to perish for ever in their sins. It is added, "Judah also shall fall with them," in her iniquity. As the ten tribes were carried captive into Assyria for their idolatry, so the two tribes, in process of time, were carried into Babylon for following their ill example; but the former fell and were utterly cast down, the latter fell and were raised up again. Judah had the temple and priesthood, and yet that shall not secure them; but if any sin with Israel and Ephraim, with them they shall fall.

2. They shall fall short of God's favour when they profess to seek it; ver. 6, "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord," but in vain; "they shall not find him." This seems to be spoken principally of Judah, when they fell into their iniquity, and when they fell in their iniquity. 1st. When they fell into their iniquity they sought the Lord, but they did not seek him only, and therefore he was not found of them. When they worshipped strange gods, yet they kept up the show and shadow of the worship of the true God; yet they went as usual, at the solemn feasts, "with their flocks and herds, to seek the Lord;" but their hearts were not upright with him, because they were not entire for him, and therefore he would not accept them; for then only shall we find him when we seek him with our whole heart, not divided between God and Baal, Eze. xiv. 3. 2nd. When they fell in their iniquity, or found themselves falling by it, they sought the Lord; but they did not seek him early, and therefore he will not be found of them. They shall see ruin coming upon them, and shall then in their distress flee to God, and think to make him their friend with burnt offerings and sacrifices; but it will be too late then to turn away his wrath when the decree is gone forth. Even Josiah's reformation did not prevail to turn away the wrath of God, 2 Kin. xxiii. 25, 26. Those that go with their flocks and their herds only to seek the Lord, and not with their hearts and souls, cannot expect to find him, for his favour is not to be purchased with thousands of rams; nor shall those speed who do not seek the Lord while he may be found, for there is a time when he will not be found. They shall not find him, for he hath withdrawn himself, he will not be inquired of by them, but will turn a deaf ear to their prayers, and have no regard to their sacrifices. See how much it is our concern to seek God early, now while the accepted time is, and the day of salvation.

3. They and their portions shall all be swallowed up. They have "dealt treacherously against the Lord," and have thought to strengthen themselves in it by their alliances with strange children, but "now shall a month devour them with their portions," that is, their estates and inheritances, all those things which they have taken, and taken up with, as their portions; or, their portion, that is, their idols, whom they chose for their portion instead of God. Note, They that make an idol of the world, by taking it for their portion, will themselves perish with it. A month shall devour them, or eat them up, that is, a certain time prefixed, and a short time. When God's judgments begin with them they shall soon make an end, one month will do their business. How much may a body be weakened by one month's sickness, or a kingdom wasted by one month's war! "Three shepherds," saith God, "I cut off in one month," Zec. xi. 8. Note, The judgments of God sometimes make quick work with a sinful people. A month devours more, and more portions, than many years can repair.

8 Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah,
And the trumpet in Ramah:
Cry aloud at Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin.
9 Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke:
Among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be. [bound:

Therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them like water.
11 Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment,
Because he willingly walked after the commandment.
12 Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a moth,
And to the house of Judah as rottenness.
13 When Ephraim saw his sickness,
And Judah saw his wound,
Then went Ephraim to the Assyrian,
And sent to king Jareb:
Yet could he not heal you,
Nor cure you of your wound.
14 For I will be unto Ephraim as a lion,
And as a young lion to the house of Judah:
I, even I, will tear and go away;
I will take away, and none shall rescue him.
15 I will go and return to my place,
Till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face:
In their affliction they will seek me early.

Here is, First. A loud alarm sounded, giving notice of judgments coming; ver. 8, "Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah," and in Ramah, two cities near together, in the confines of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel; Gibeah a frontier town of the kingdom of Judah, Ramah of Israel; so that the warning is hereby sent into both kingdoms. "Cry aloud at Beth-aven," or Bethel, which place seems to be already seized upon by the enemy, and therefore the trumpet is not sounded there, but you hear the outcries of them that shout for mastery mixed with theirs that are overcome. Let them cry aloud, "After thee, O Benjamin," comes the enemy. The tribe of Ephraim is already vanquished, and the enemy will be upon thy back, O Benjamin, in a little time; thy turn comes next. The cup of trembling shall go round. The prophet had described God's controversy with them as a trial at law, ch. iv. 1; here he describes it as a trial by battle, and here also when he judgeth he will overcome; let all therefore prepare to meet their God. He had before spoken of the judgments as certain, here he speaks of them as near; and when they are apprehended as just at the door they are very startling and awakening. The blowing of this cornet is explained, ver. 9, "Among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be;" that which is true or certain, so the word is. Note, The destruction of impenitent sinners is a thing which shall surely be; it is not mere talk, to frighten them, but it is an irrevocable sentence. And it is a mercy to us that it is made known to us, that we have timely warning given us of it, that we may flee from the wrath to come. It is the privilege of the tribes of Israel that, as they are told their duty, so they are told their danger, by the oracles of God committed to them.

Secondly. The ground of God's controversy with them.

1. He has a quarrel with the princes of Judah, because they were daring leaders in sin; ver. 10, they are "like them that remove the bound," or the ancient landmarks. God hath given them his law to be a fence about his own property; but they have sacrilegiously broken through it, and set it aside. They have encroached even upon God's rights, have trampled upon the distinctions between good and evil, and the most sacred obligations of reason and equity, thinking, because they were princes, their will was a law, and they might do any thing, quicquid libet, licet,—'their will was a law.' Or, it may be understood of their invading the liberty and property of the subject, for the advancing of the prerogative, which was like removing the ancient landmarks. Some have observed that the princes of Judah were more absolute, and assumed a more arbitrary power, than the princes of Israel did. Now for this God has a controversy with them: "I will pour out my wrath upon them like water," in great abundance, like the waters of the flood which were poured upon the giants of the old world, for the violence which the earth was filled with through them, Gen. vi. 13. Note, There are bounds which even princes themselves must not remove; bounds both of religion and justice, which they are limited by; and which, if they break through, they must know that there is a God above them who will call them to account for it.

2. He has a quarrel with the people of Ephraim, because they were sneaking followers in sin; ver. 11, "He willingly walked after the commandment," that is, the commandment of Jeroboam, and the succeeding kings of Israel, who obliged all their subjects by a law to worship the calves at Dan and Bethel, and never to go up to Jerusalem to worship. This was the commandment; it was the law of the land, and backed with reasons of state. And the people not only walked after it in a blind, implicit obedience to authority, but they willingly walked after it, from a secret antipathy they had to the worship of God, and a strong bias to the worship of idols. Note, An easy compliance with the commandments of men that thwart the commandments of God, ripens a people for ruin as much as any thing else. And the punishment of this sequacious disobedience (if I may so call it) answers the sin; for it is for this that "Ephraim is oppressed, and broken in judgment," has all his civil rights and liberties broken in upon and trodden down. And, 1st. It is just with God it should be so, that those who betray God's property should lose their own, that those who subject their consciences to a fallible judge, and an arbitrary power, should have enough of both. 2nd. There is a natural tendency in the thing itself towards it. They that willingly walk after the commandment, even when it walks contrary to the command of God, will find the commandment an encroaching thing, and that the more power is given it the more it will claim. Note, Nothing gives greater advantage to a mastiff-like tyranny, that is fierce and furious, than a spaniel-like submission, that is fawning and flattering. Thus is Ephraim "oppressed and broken in judgment," that is, he is wronged under a face and colour of right. Note, It is a sad and sore judgment upon any people to be oppressed under pretence of having justice done them. This explains the threatening, ver. 9, "Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke." Note, Daring sinners must expect that a day of rebuke will come, and such a day of rebuke as will make them desolate, will deprive them of the comfort of all they have and all they hope for.

Thirdly. The different methods that God would take both with Judah and Ephraim; sometimes one method, and sometimes the other, and sometimes both together. Or, rather, by which, first the one and then the other, he would advance towards their complete ruin.

1. He would begin with lesser judgments, which should sometimes work silently and insensibly; ver. 12, "I will be," that is, my providences shall be "unto Ephraim as a moth," nay, (as it might better be supplied,) they are unto Ephraim as a moth; for it is such a sickness as Ephraim now sees, ver. 13. Note, The judgments of God are sometimes, to a sinful people, as a moth, and as rottenness, or as a worm. The former signifies the little animals that breed in clothes; the latter those that breed in wood. As these consume the clothes and wood, so shall the judgments of God consume them. 1st. Silently, so as not to make any noise in the world; nay, so as they themselves shall not be sensible of it. They shall think themselves safe and thriving; but when they come to look more narrowly into their state, shall find themselves wasting and decaying. 2nd. Slowly, and with long delays and intervals, that he may give them space to repent. Many a nation, as well as many a person, in the prime of its time, dies of a consumption. 3rd. Gradually God comes upon sinners with lesser judgments, so to prevent greater, if they will be wise and take warning; comes upon them step by step, to shew he is not willing they should perish. 4th. The moth breeds in the clothes, and the worm, or rottenness, in the wood. Thus sinners are consumed by a fire of their own kindling.

2. When it appeared those had not done their work, he would come upon them with greater; ver. 14, "I will be unto Ephraim as a lion," and as a young lion to the house of Judah; though Judah is himself, in Jacob's blessing, a "lion's whelp." Lest any should think his power weakened, because he was said to be as a moth to them, he saith he will now be as a lion to them, not only to frighten them with his roaring, but to pull them to pieces. Note, If lesser judgments prevail not to do their work, it may be expected that God will send greater. Christ is sometimes a lion of the tribe of Judah; here he is a lion against that tribe. See what God will do to a people that are secure in sin, "Even I will tear." He seems to glory in it as his prerogative to be able to destroy, as the alone lawgiver, Jas. iv. 12. I, even I, I will take the work into my own hands; I say it, that will do it. There is a more immediate work of God in some judgments than in others; "I will tear and go away." He will go away, 1st. As not fearing them. He will go away in state, and with a majestic face, as the lion from his prey. 2nd. As not helping them. If God tear by afflicting providences, and yet by his graces and comforts stays with us, it is well enough; but our condition is sad indeed if he tear and go away, if, when he deprives us of our creature-comforts, he doth himself depart from us. When he goes away he will take away all that is valuable and dear; for "when God goes, all good goes along with him." He will take away, "and none shall rescue him;" as the prey cannot be rescued from the lion, Mic. v. 8. Note, None can be delivered out of the hands of God's justice but those that are delivered into the hands of his grace. It is in vain for a man to strive with his Maker.

Fourthly. The different effects of those different methods.

1. When God contended with them by lesser judgments they neglected him, and sought to creatures for relief, but sought in vain, ver. 13. When God was to them as a moth, and as rottenness, they perceived their sickness and their wound; after awhile they found themselves going down the wind, and that they were behind-hand in their affairs, their state was sensibly decaying, and then they sent to the Assyrian to come in to their assistance, made their court to king Jareb, which some think was one of the names of Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria, to whom both Israel and Judah applied themselves for relief in their distress, hoping by an alliance with them to repair and re-establish their declining interests. Note, Carnal hearts, in time of trouble, see their sickness, and see their wound, but do not see the sin that is the cause of it, nor will be brought to acknowledge that; no, nor to acknowledge the hand of God, his mighty hand, much less his righteous hand, in their trouble; and therefore, instead of going the next way to the Creator that could relieve them, they take a great deal of pains to go about to creatures that can do them no service. Those who repent not that they have offended God by their sins are loth to be beholden to him in their affliction, but would rather seek relief anywhere than with him. And what comes of it? "Yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound." Note, Those who neglect God, and seek to creatures for help, will certainly be disappointed; that depend upon them for support, will find them not foundations, but broken reeds; that depend upon them for supply, will find them not fountains, but broken cisterns; that depend upon them for comfort and a cure, will find them miserable comforters, and physicians of no value. The kings of Assyria, whom Judah and Israel sought unto, "distressed them, and helped them not," 2 Chr. xxviii. 16, 21. Some make king Jareb to signify the great, potent, or magnificent king, for they built much upon his power; others, the king that will plead, or should plead, for they built much upon his wisdom and eloquence, and his interesting himself in their affairs. They had sent him a present, (ch. x. 6,) a good fee; and having so retained him of counsel for them, they doubted not of his fidelity to them; but he deceived them, as an arm of flesh doth those that trust in it, Jer. xvii. 5, 6.

2. When, to convince them of their folly, God brought greater judgments upon them, then they would at length be forced to apply themselves to him, ver. 15. When he has torn as a lion, 1st. He will leave them. "I will go and return to my place," that is, to heaven, or to the mercy-seat, the throne of grace, which is his glory. When God punisheth sinners he comes out of his place, Isa. xxvi. 21; but, when he designs them favour, he returns to his place, where he waits to be gracious upon their submission. Or, he will return to his place when he has corrected them; as not regarding them, hiding his face from them, and not taking notice of their troubles or prayers. And this for their farther humiliation, till they are qualified in some measure for the return of his favour. 2nd. He will at length work upon them, and bring them home to himself by their afflictions, which is the thing he waits for; and then he will no longer withdraw from them. Two things are here mentioned as instances of their return: First. Their penitent confession of sin, "till they acknowledge their offence;" margin, 'till they be guilty,' that is, till they be sensible of their guilt, and are brought to own it, and humble themselves before God for it. Note, When men begin to complain more of their sins than of their afflictions, then there begins to be some hopes of them. And this is that which God requires of us, when we are under his correcting hand, that we own ourselves in a fault and justly corrected. Secondly. Their humble petition for the favour of God. Till they seek my face, which it may be expected they will do, when they are brought to the last extremity, and they have tried other helpers in vain. "In their affliction they will seek me early;" that is, diligently and earnestly, and with great importunity. And if they seek him thus, and be sincere in it, though it might be called seeking him late, because it was long ere they were brought to it, yet it is not too late; nay, he is pleased to call it seeking him early, so willing is he to make the best of true penitents in their return to him. Note, When we are under the convictions of sin, and the corrections of the rod, our business is to seek God's face; that is, we must desire the knowledge of him, and an acquaintance with him, that he may manifest himself to us, and for us, in token of his being at peace with us. And it may reasonably be expected that affliction will bring those to God that had long gone astray from him, and kept at a distance. Therefore God, for a time, turns away from us, that he may turn us to himself, and then return to us. "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray."

CHAPTER VI.

The closing words of the foregoing chapter gave us some hopes that God and his Israel, notwithstanding their sins and his wrath, might yet be happily brought together again; that they would seek him, and he would be found of them. Now this chapter carries that matter farther; and some join the beginning of this chapter with the end of that, "They will seek me early," saying, "Come and let us return." But God doth again complain of the wickedness of this people; for, though some did repent and reform, the greater part continued obstinate. Observe, I. Their resolution to return to God, and the comforts wherewith they encourage themselves in their return, ver. 1—3. II. The instability of many of them in their professions and promises of repentance, and the severe course which God therefore took with them, ver. 4, 5. III. The covenant God made with them, and his expectation from them, ver. 6; and their violation of that covenant, and frustrating those expectations, ver. 7—11.

COME, and let us return unto the LORD:
For he hath torn, and he will heal us;
He hath smitten, and he will bind us up.
2 After two days will he revive us:
In the third day he will raise us up,
And we shall live in his sight.
3 Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the LORD:
His going forth is prepared as the morning;
And he shall come unto us as the rain,
As the latter and former rain unto the earth.

This may be taken either as the words of the prophet to the people, calling them to repentance, or as the words of the people to one another, exciting and encouraging one another to seek the Lord, and to humble themselves before him, in hopes of finding mercy with him. God had said in their affliction they would seek him; now the prophet, and the good people his friends, would strike while the iron was hot, and set in with the convictions their neighbours seemed to be under. Note, Those who are disposed to turn to God themselves should do all they can to excite, and engage, and encourage others to return to him. Observe,

First. What it is they engage to do; "Come, and let us return to the Lord," ver. 1. Let us go no more to the Assyrian, nor send to king Jareb, we have enough of that, but let us return to the Lord. Return to the worship of him from our idolatries, and to our hope in him from all our confidences in the creature. Note, It is the great concern of those who have revolted from God to return to him; and those who have gone from him by consent, and in a body, drawing one another to sin, should by consent, and in a body, return to him, which will be for his glory and their mutual edification.

Secondly. What inducements and encouragements to do this they fasten upon, to stir up one another with.

1. The experience they had had of his displeasure. Let us return to him, for "he has torn, he hath smitten;" we have been torn, and it was he that tore us; we have been smitten, and it was he that smote us. Therefore let us return to him, because it is for our revolts from him that he has torn and smitten us in anger, and we cannot expect he should be reconciled to us till we do return to him; and for this end he has afflicted us thus, that we might be wrought upon to return to him; and his hand will be stretched out still against us, if the people "turn not to him that smiteth them," Isa. ix. 12, 13. Note, The consideration of the judgments of God upon us and our land, especially when they are tearing judgments, should awaken us to return to God by repentance, and prayer, and reformation.

2. The expectation they had of his favour. He that has torn will heal us, that hath smitten will bind us up; as the skilful surgeon with a tender hand binds up the broken bone, or bleeding wound. Note, The same providence of God that afflicts his people relieves them, and the same Spirit of God that convinceth the saints comforts them; that which is first a spirit of bondage is afterwards a spirit of adoption. This is an acknowledgment of the power of God; he can heal, though we be never so ill torn, and of his mercy he will do it; nay, therefore, he has torn that he may heal. Some think this points particularly to the return of the Jews out of Babylon, when they sought the Lord, and joined themselves to him, in the prospect of his gracious return to them in a way of mercy. Note, It will be of great use to us, both for our support under our afflictions and for our encouragement in our repentance, to keep up good thoughts of God, and of his purposes and designs concerning us.

Now this favour of God, which they are here in expectation of, is described in several instances.

1st. They promise themselves that their deliverance out of their troubles should be to them as life from the dead; ver. 2, "After two days he will revive us," that is, in a short time, in a day or two; and the third day, when it is expected that the dead body should putrefy and corrupt, and be buried out of our sight, then will he "raise us up, and we shall live in his sight," that is, we shall see his face with comfort, and it shall be reviving to us. Though he forsake for a small moment, he will gather with everlasting kindness. Note, The people of God may not only be torn and smitten, but left for dead, and may lie so a great while; but they shall not always lie so, nor shall they long lie so. God will in a little time revive them; and the assurance given them of this should engage them to return and adhere to him. But this seems to have a further reference to the resurrection of Jesus Christ; and the time limited is expressed by the two days and the third day, that it may be a type and figure of Christ's rising the third day, which he is said to do, "according to the Scriptures," according to this Scripture; for all the prophets witnessed of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. Let us see and admire the wisdom and goodness of God, in ordering the prophet's words so as that, when he foretold the deliverance of the church out of her troubles, he should at the same time point out our salvation by Christ, which other salvations were both figures of and fruits of. And though they might not be aware of this mystery in the words, yet now they are fulfilled in the letter of them in the resurrection of Christ; it is a confirmation to our faith that "this is he that should come," and we are to look for no other. And it is agreeable enough that a prophecy of Christ's rising should be thus expressed; he will raise us up, and we shall live. For Christ rose as the first-fruits, and we revived with him; we live through him, he rose for our justification, and all believers are said to be risen with Christ: see Isa. xxvi. 19. And it would serve for a comfort to the church then, and an assurance that God would raise them out of their low estate; for in his fulness of time he would raise his Son from the grave, who would be the life and glory of his people Israel. Note, A regard by faith to a rising Christ is a great support to a suffering Christian, and gives abundant encouragement to a repenting, returning sinner; for he hath said, "Because I live, you shall live also."

2nd. That then they shall improve in the knowledge of God; ver. 3, "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord." Then, when God returns in mercy to his people, and designs favour for them, he will, as a pledge and fruit of his favour, give them more of the knowledge of himself; the earth shall be full of that knowledge, Isa. xi. 9; "knowledge shall be increased," Dan. xii. 4; "all shall know God," Jer. xxxi. 34. We shall know, we shall follow to know the Lord, so the words are. And it may be taken as the fruit of Christ's resurrection, and the life we live in God's sight by him, that we shall have not only greater means of knowledge, but grace to improve in knowledge by those means. Note, When God designs mercy for a people he gives them a heart to know him, Jer. xxiv. 7. They that are risen with Christ have the spirit of wisdom and revelation given them; and, if we understand our living in his sight, as the Chaldee paraphrast doth, of the day of the resurrection of the dead, it fitly follows, we shall know, we shall follow to know, the Lord; for in that day we shall see him as he is, and our knowledge of him shall be perfected, and yet be eternally increasing. Or, taking it as we read it, "If we follow on to know," we have here, First. A precious blessing promised; then shall we know, shall know the Lord. Then, when we return to God, those that come to God shall be brought into an acquaintance with him. When we are designed to live in his sight, then he gives us to know him; for this is life eternal, to know God, Jno. xvii. 3. Secondly. The way and means of obtaining this blessing; we must follow on to know him. We must value and esteem the knowledge of God as the best knowledge; we must cry after it, and dig for it, Pr. ii. 3, 4; must "seek and intermeddle with all wisdom," Pr. xviii. 1; and must proceed in our inquiries after this knowledge, and our endeavours to improve in it. And if we do the prescribed duty, we have reason to expect the promised mercy, that we shall know more and more of God, and be at last perfect in this knowledge.

3rd. That then they shall abound in Divine consolations. "His going forth is prepared as the morning;" that is, the returns of his favour, which he had withdrawn from us, when he went and returned to his place. His outgoings again are prepared and secured to us as firmly as the return of the morning after a dark night; and we expect it as those do that wait for the morning after a long night, and are sure it will come at the time appointed, and will not fail. And the light of his countenance will be both welcome to us and growing upon us, unto the perfect day, as the light of the morning is. "He shall come to us," and be welcome to us "as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth," which refresheth it, and makes it fruitful. Now this looks farther than their deliverance out of captivity, and no doubt was to have its full accomplishment in Christ and the grace of the Gospel. The Old Testament saints followed on to know him, earnestly looked for redemption in Jerusalem; and at length the outgoings of Divine grace in him, in his going forth to visit this world were, First. As the morning to this earth, when it is dark; for he went forth as the Sun of righteousness, and in him the dayspring from on high visited us. "His going forth was prepared as the morning;" for he came in the fulness of time. John Baptist was his forerunner, nay, he was himself the bright and morning star. Secondly. As the rain to this earth when it is dry; "He shall come down as the rain upon the mown grass," Ps. lxxii. 6. And in him showers of blessings descend upon this world, which give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater, Isa. lv. 10. And the favour of God in Christ is what is said of the king's favour, "like the cloud of the latter rain," Pr. xvi. 15. The grace of God in Christ is both "the latter and the former rain;" for by it the good work of our fruit-bearing is both begun and carried on.

4 O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee?
O Judah, what shall I do unto thee?
For your goodness is as a morning cloud,
And as the early dew it goeth away.
5 Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets;
I have slain them by the words of my mouth:
And thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth.
6 For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice;
And the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.
7 But they like men have transgressed the covenant:
There have they dealt treacherously against me.
8 Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity,
And is polluted with blood,
9 And as troops of robbers wait for a man,
So the company of priests murder in the way by consent:
For they commit lewdness.
10 I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel:
There is the whoredom of Ephraim,
Israel is defiled.
11 Also, O Judah, he hath set an harvest for thee,
When I returned the captivity of my people.

Two things, two ill things, both Judah and Ephraim are here charged with, and justly accused of.

First. That they were not firm to their own convictions, but were unsteady, unstable as water; ver. 4, 5, "O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee?" This is a strange expression. Can infinite wisdom be at a loss what to do? Can it be nonplussed, or put upon taking new measures? By no means; but God speaks after the manner of men, to shew how absurd and unreasonable they were, and how just his proceedings against them were. Let them not complain of him as harsh and severe, in tearing them and smiting them as he has done; for what else should he do? What other course could he take with them? God had tried various methods with them; "What could have been done more to his vineyard than he had done?" Isa. v. 4; and very loth he was to let things go to extremity. He reasons with himself, as ch. xi. 8, 9, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" God would have done them good, but they were not qualified for it. "What shall I do unto thee?" What else can I do but cast thee off, when I cannot in honour save thee? Note, God never destroys sinners till he sees there is no other way with them. See here,

1. What their carriage was towards God. This goodness, or kindness, was "as a morning cloud." Some understand it of their kindness to themselves, and their own souls, in their repentance. It is indeed mercy to ourselves to repent of our sins; but they soon retracted that kindness to themselves, undid it again, and wronged their own souls as much as ever; but it is rather taken for their piety and religion; what good appeared in them sometimes soon vanished and disappeared again, as a morning cloud, and as the early dew. Such was the goodness of Israel in Jehu's time, and of Judah in Hezekiah's and Josiah's time; it was soon gone. In time of drought the morning cloud promiseth rain, and the early dew is some present refreshment to the earth; but the cloud is dispersed, and hypocrites are compared to "clouds without water," Jude 12. The dew doth not soak into the ground, but is drawn back again into the air, and the earth is parched still. What shall he do with them? Shall he accept their goodness? No, for it passeth away; and factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'that which does not continue can scarcely be said to be done.' Note, That goodness will never be either pleasing to God or profitable to ourselves which is as the morning cloud and the early dew. When men promise fair, and do not perform; when they begin well in religion, and do not hold on; when they leave their first love, and their first works; or, though they do not quite cast off religion, yet are unsteady, uneven, and inconstant in it, then is their goodness "as a morning cloud and the early dew."

2. What course God had taken with them; ver. 5, "Therefore," because they were so rough and ill-shapen, "I have hewed them by the prophets," as timber or stone are hewed for use, that is, 'I have slain them by the words of my mouth.' What the prophets did was done by the word of God in their mouths, which never returned void. By it they thought themselves slain, were ready to say the prophets killed them, or cut them to the heart, when they dealt faithfully with them. 1st. The prophets hewed them, by convictions of sin, endeavouring to cut off their transgressions from them. They were uneven in religion, ver. 4, therefore God hewed them. The hearts of sinners are not only as stone, but as rough stone, which require a great deal of pains to bring it into shape; or as knotty timber, that is not squared without a deal of difficulty. Ministers' work is to hew them, and God, by the minister, hews them; for with the froward he will shew himself froward. And there are those whom ministers must rebuke sharply,—every word should cut; and though the chips fly in the face of the workman, though the reproved fly in the face of the reprover, and reckon him an enemy because he tells the truth, yet he goes on with his work. 2nd. They slew them by the denunciations of wrath, foretelling that they should be slain, as Ezekiel is said to destroy the city when he prophesied of the destruction of it, Ezc. xliii. 3. And God accomplished that which was foretold; I have slain them by my judgments, according to the words of my mouth. Note, The word of God will be either the death of the sin or the death of the sinner; a savour either of life unto life or of death unto death. Some read it, 'I have hewed the prophets, and slain them by the words of my mouth;' that is, I have employed them in laborious service for the people's good, which has wasted their strength; they have spent themselves, and hewed away all their spirits in their work, and in hazardous service, which has cost many of them their lives. Note, Ministers are the tools which God makes use of in working upon people; and though with many they labour in vain, yet God will reckon for the wearing out of his tools. 3rd. God was hereby justified in the severest proceedings against them afterwards. His prophets had taken a deal of pains with them, had admonished them of their sin and warned them of their danger, but the means used had not the desired effect. Some good impressions, perhaps, were made for the present, but they wore off, and passed away as the morning cloud; and now they cannot charge God with severity if he bring upon them the miseries threatened. The prophet turns to him and acknowledgeth, "Thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth;" evidently just, just and righteous. Note, Though sinners be not reclaimed by the pains that ministers take with them, yet thereby God will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth: see Mat. xi. 17—19.

Secondly. That they were not faithful to God's covenant with them, ver. 6, 7, &c. Whence observe,

1. What the covenant was that God made with them, and upon what terms they should obtain his favour, and be accepted of him; ver. 6, "I desired mercy, and not sacrifice," that is, rather than sacrifice, and insisted upon the knowledge of God more than upon burnt offerings. Mercy here is the same word which is rendered "goodness," ver. 4, chesed,—piety, sanctity; it is put for all practical religion; it is the same with charity in the New Testament, the reigning love of God and our neighbour; and this, accompanied with, and flowing from, the knowledge of God, as he has revealed himself in his word, a firm belief that he is, and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him, a good affection to Divine things, guided by a good judgment, which cannot but produce a very good conversation. This is that which God, by his covenant, requires, and not sacrifice and offering. This is fully explained, Jer. vii. 22, 23, "I spake not to your fathers concerning burnt offerings;" that was the smallest of the matters I spake to them of, and on which the least stress was laid; but "this I said, Obey my voice," Mic. vi. 6—8. To love God and our neighbour is "better than all offering and sacrifice," Mar. xii. 33; Ps. li. 16, 17. Not but that sacrifice and offering were required, and to be paid, and had their use, and when they were accompanied with mercy, and the knowledge of God, were acceptable to him; but without them God regarded them not—he despised them, Isa. i. 10, 11. Perhaps this is mentioned here to shew a difference between the God whom they deserted and the gods whom they went over to. The true God aimed at nothing but that they should be good men, and live good lives, for their own good, and the ceremony of honouring him with sacrifices was one of the smallest matters of his law; whereas the false gods required that only. Let their priests and altars be regaled with sacrifices and offerings, and the people might live as they list; what fools were they then that left a God who aimed at giving his worshippers a new nature, for gods who aimed at nothing but making themselves a new name? It is mentioned, likewise, to shew that God's controversy with them was not for the omission of sacrifices, "I will not reprove thee for them," Ps. l. 8; but because there was no justice, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God among them, ch. iv. 1; and to teach us all that the power of godliness is the main thing God looks at and requires, and without it the form of godliness is of no avail. Serious piety in the heart and life is the one thing needful; and, separate from that, the performances of devotion, though never so plausible, never so costly, are of no account. Our Saviour quotes this to shew that moral duties are to be preferred before rituals, whenever they come in competition, and to justify himself in eating with publicans and sinners, because it was in mercy to the souls of men; and in healing on the sabbath day, because it was in mercy to the bodies of men, to which the ceremony of singularity in eating, and the sabbath rest, must give way, Mat. ix. 13; xii. 7.

2. How little they had regarded this covenant. Though it was so well ordered in all things,—though they, and not God, would be the gainers by it,—yet see here what came of it.

1st. In general they broke with God, and proved unfaithful. There were good things committed to them to keep, the jewels of mercy and pity, and the knowledge of God in the cabinet of sacrifice and burnt offering; but they betrayed their trust, kept the cabinet, but pawned the jewels for the gratification of a base lust; and this is that for which God has justly a quarrel with them; ver. 7, "They like men have transgressed the covenant," that covenant which God made with them; they have broken the conditions of it, and so forfeited the benefit of it. By casting off mercy and the knowledge of God, and other instances of disobedience, First. They had contracted the guilt of perjury and covenant-breaking; they were like men that transgress a covenant by which they had solemnly bound themselves, which is a thing that all the world cries out shame on. Men that have done so deserve not again to be valued, or trusted, or dealt with. "There," in that thing, "they have dealt treacherously against me;" they have been perfidious, base, and false children, in whom is no faith, though I depended upon their being children that would not lie. Secondly. In this they had but acted like themselves, like men who are generally false and fickle, and in whose nature, that is, their corrupt nature, it is to deal treacherously; "All men are liars," and they are like the rest of that degenerate race, all gone aside, Ps. xiv. 2, 3. They have transgressed the covenant like men, that is, like the Gentiles that transgressed the covenant of nature, (like mean men, the word here used is sometimes put for men of low degree,) they have dealt deceitfully, like base men that have no sense of honour. Thirdly. Herein they trode in the steps of our first parents. They, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant; so it might very well be read. As he transgressed the covenant of innocency, so they transgressed the covenant of grace, so treacherously, so foolishly. There, in paradise, he violated his engagements to God; and there, in Canaan, another paradise, they violated their engagements; and, by their treacherous dealing, they, like Adam, have ruined themselves and theirs. Note, Sin is so much the worse the more there is in it of the "similitude of Adam's transgression," Rom. v. 14. Low thoughts of God, and of his authority and favour, were at the bottom of all this; for so some read it, They have transgressed the covenant, as of a man, as if it had been but the covenant of a man, that stood upon even ground with them; as if the commands of the covenant were but like those of a man like themselves, and the kindness conveyed by it no more valuable than that of a man. There is something sacred and binding in a man's covenant, as the apostle shews, Gal. iii. 15, but much more in the covenant of God, which yet they made small account of; and there, in that covenant, they dealt treacherously; promised fair, but performed nothing. And dealing treacherously with God is here called dealing treacherously against him; for it is both an affront and an opposition. Deserters are traitors, and will so be treated; the revolting heart is a rebellious heart.

2nd. Some particular instances of their treachery are here given. There they dealt treacherously, that is, in the places hereafter named.

First. Look on the other side Jordan, to the country which lay most exposed to the insults of the neighbour nations, and where therefore the people were concerned to keep themselves under the Divine protection, yet there you will find the most daring provocations of the Divine Majesty; ver. 8, Gilead, which lay in the lot of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, was a city of the workers of iniquity. Wickedness was the trade that was driven there; the country was called Gilead, but it was called a city, because they were all, as it were, incorporated in one society of rebels against God. Or, as most think, Ramoth Gilead is the city here meant, one of the three cities of refuge on the other side Jordan, and a Levites' city. The inhabitants of it, though of the sacred tribe, were workers of iniquity, contrived it and practised it. Note, It is bad indeed when a Levites' city is "a city of those that work iniquity;" when those that are to preach good doctrine live ill lives. Particularly it is polluted with blood, as if that were a sin which the wicked Levites were in a special manner guilty of. In popish countries the clergy are observed to be the most bloody persecutors. Or, as it was a city of refuge, by abusing the power it had to judge of murderers it became polluted with blood. They would for a bribe protect those that were guilty of wilful murder whom they ought to have put to death; and would deliver those to the avenger of blood that were guilty but of chance medley, if they were poor and had nothing to give them; and both these ways they were polluted with blood. Note, Blood defiles the land where it is shed, and no inquisition made, or no vengeance taken for it. And see how the best institutions, that are never so well designed to keep the balance even between justice and mercy, are capable of being abused and perverted to the manifest prejudice and violation of both.

Secondly. Look among those whose business it was to minister in holy things, and they were as bad as the worst, and as vile as the vilest; ver. 9, "The company of priests" are so; not here and there one that is the scandal of his order, but the whole order and body of them. The priests go all one way by consent, with one shoulder, as the word is, one and all; and they make one another worse, more daring and fierce, and impudent in sin, more crafty and more cruel. A company of priests will say and do that in conspiracy which none of them would dare to say or do singly. The companies of priests were as troops of robbers, as banditti, or gangs of highwaymen, that cut men's throats to get their money. 1*st.* They were cruel and bloodthirsty. They murder those that they have a pique against, or that stand in their way; nothing less will satisfy them. 2*nd.* They were cunning. They laid wait for men, that they might have a fair opportunity to compass their mischievous, malicious designs. Thus the company of priests laid wait for Christ to take him, saying, Not on the feast day. 3*rd.* They were concurring as one man. They murder in the way, in the highway, where travellers should be safe, there they murder by consent, aiding and abetting one another in it. See how unanimous wicked people are in doing mischief, and should not good people be so then in doing good? They murder 'in the way to Shechem,' so the margin reads it, as a proper name, such as were going to Jerusalem (for that way Shechem lay) to worship. Or, 'in the way to Shechem,' some think means in the same manner that their father, Levi, with Simeon his brother, murdered the Shechemites, Gen. xxxiv., by fraud and deceit; and some understand it of their destroying the souls of men by drawing them to sin. 4*th.* They did it with contrivance; they commit lewdness. The word signifies such wickedness as is committed with deliberation, and of malice prepense, as we say. The more there is of device and design in sin the worse it is.

Thirdly. Look into the body of the people, take a view of the whole house of Israel, and they are all alike; ver. 10, "I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel," and though it be never so artfully managed God discovers it, and will discover it to them; and who can deny that which God himself saith he hath seen? "There is the whoredom of Ephraim," both corporeal and spiritual whoredom; there it is too plain to be denied. Note, The sin of sinners, especially sinners of the house of Israel, has enough in it to make them tremble; for it is a horrible thing, it is amazing, and it is threatening. Oh, make them blush, for Israel is thereby defiled, and rendered odious in the sight of God.

Fourthly. Look into Judah, and you find them sharing with Israel; ver. 11, "Also, O Judah, he hath set an harvest for thee;" thou must be reckoned with as well as Ephraim, thou art ripe for destruction too, and the time, even the set time, of thy destruction is hastening on, when thou that hast ploughed iniquity and sown wickedness shalt reap the same. The general judgment is compared to a harvest, Mat. xiii. 39; so are particular judgments, Joel iii. 13; Rev. xiv. 15. I have appointed a time to call thee to account, even "when I returned the captivity of my people," that is, when those captives of Judah, which were taken by the men of Israel, were restored, in obedience to the command of God sent them by Obed the prophet, 2 Chr. xxviii. 8—15. When God spared them that time he set them a harvest, that is, he designed to reckon with them another time for all together. Note, Preservations from present judgments, if a good use be not made of them, are but reservations for greater judgments.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter we have, I. A general charge drawn up against Israel for those high crimes and misdemeanours by which they had obstructed the course of God's favours to them, ver. 1, 2. II. A particular accusation, 1. Of the court: the king, princes, and judges, ver. 3—7; 2. Of the country; Ephraim is here charged with conforming to the nations, ver. 8; senselessness and stupidity under the judgments of God, ver. 9—11; ingratitude to God for his mercies, ver. 13; incorrigibleness under his judgments, ver. 14; contempt of God, ver. 15; and hypocrisy in their pretences to return to him, ver. 16. They are also threatened with a severe chastisement, which shall humble them, ver. 12; and if that prevail not, then with an utter destruction, ver. 13, particularly their princes, ver. 16.

WHEN I would have healed Israel,
Then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered,
And the wickedness of Samaria:
For they commit falsehood;
And the thief cometh in,
And the troop of robbers spoileth without.
2 And they consider not in their hearts
That I remember all their wickedness:
Now their own doings have beset them about;
They are before my face.
3 They make the king glad with their wickedness,
And the princes with their lies.
4 They are all adulterers,
As an oven heated by the baker,
Who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough,
Until it be leavened.
5 In the day of our king
The princes have made him sick with bottles of wine;
He stretched out his hand with scorners.
6 For they have made ready their heart like an oven,
Whiles they lie in wait:
Their baker sleepeth all the night;
In the morning it burneth as a flaming fire.
7 They are all hot as an oven,
And have devoured their judges;
All their kings are fallen:
There is none among them that calleth unto me

EASTERN OVEN, WITH MAN KNEADING.

Some take away the last words of the foregoing chapter, and make them the beginning of this. "When I returned," or would have returned, "the captivity of my people, when I was about to come towards them in ways of mercy, even "when I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim," that is, the country and common people, was discovered; and the wickedness of Samaria, that is, the court and the chief city. Now in these verses we may observe,

First. A general idea given of the present state of Israel, ver. 1, 2. See how the case now stands with them.

1. God graciously designed to do well for them; "I would have healed Israel." Israel was sick and wounded; their disease was dangerous and malignant, and likely to be fatal, Isa. i. 6, but God offered to be their Physician, to undertake the cure, and there was balm in Gilead sufficient to recover the health of the daughter of my people. Their case was bad, but it was not desperate, nay, it was hopeful when God would have healed Israel; that is, 1st. He would have reformed them, would have parted between them and their sins, would have purged out the corruptions that were among them, by his laws and prophets. 2nd. He would have delivered them out of their troubles, and restored to them their peace and prosperity. Several healing attempts were made, and their declining state seemed sometimes to be in a hopeful way of recovery, but their own folly put them back again. Note, If sinful, miserable souls be not healed and helped, but perish in their sin and misery, they cannot lay the blame on God, for he both could and "would have healed them;" he offered to take the ruin under his hand. And there are some special seasons, when God manifests his readiness to heal a distempered church and nation; now and then a hopeful crisis, which, if carefully watched and improved, might, even when the case is very bad, turn the scale for life and health.

2. They stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. When God would have healed them, when they bid fair for reformation and peace, then their iniquity was discovered, and their wickedness, and that stopped the current of God's favours, and undid all again. 1st. Then when their case came to be examined and inquired into, in order to their cure, that wickedness which had been concealed and palliated was found out—not that it was ever hid from God, but he speaks after the manner of men. As a surgeon, when he probes a wound in order to the cure of it, and finds it touches the vitals and is incurable, goes no farther in his endeavour to cure it, so when God came down to see the case of Israel, (as the expression is, Gen. xviii. 21,) with kind intentions towards them, he found their wickedness so very flagrant, and them so hardened in it, so impudent and impenitent, that he could not in honour shew them the favour he designed them. Note, Sinners are not healed, because they would not be healed. Christ would have gathered them, and they would not. 2nd. Then when some endeavours were used to reform and reclaim them, that wickedness which had been restrained and kept under broke out; and from God's steps towards the healing of them they took occasion to be so much the more provoking. When endeavours were used to reform them, vice grew more impetuous, more outrageous, and swelled so much the higher, as a stream when it is dammed up; when they began to prosper they grew more proud, wanton, and secure, and so stopped the progress of their cure. Note, It is sin that turns away good things from us, then when they are coming towards us; and it is the folly and ruin of multitudes, that when God would do well for them they do ill for themselves. And what was it that did them this mischief? In one word, they commit falsehood, they worship idols, so some; defraud one another, so others; or rather, they dissemble with God, in their profession of repentance and regard to him. They say they are desirous to be healed by him, and in order to that willing to be ruled by him; but they lie unto him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue.

3. A practical disbelief of God's omniscience and government was at the bottom of all their wickedness; ver. 2, "They consider not in their hearts," they never say it to their own hearts, never think of this, "that I remember all their wickedness." As if God either could not see it, though he is all eye; or did not heed it, though his name is jealous; or had forgot it, though he is an eternal Mind, that can never be unmindful; or would not reckon for it, though he is the Judge of heaven and earth. This is the sinner's atheism: as good say there is no God, as say he is either ignorant or forgetful; none that judgeth in the earth, as say he remembers not the things he is to give judgment upon. It is a high affront they put upon God, it is a damning cheat they put upon themselves; they say, "The Lord shall not see," Ps. xciv. 7. They cannot but know that "God remembers all their works," they have been told it many a time; nay, if you ask them, they cannot but own it, and yet they do not consider it; they do not think of it when they should, and with application to themselves and their own works, else they would not, they durst not, do as they do. But the time will come when those who thus deceive themselves shall be undeceived; "now their own doings have beset them about," that is, they are come at length to such a pitch of wickedness that their sins appear on every side of them. All their neighbours see how bad they are; and can they think that God doth not see it? Or rather, 'the punishment of their doings besets them about, they are surrounded and embarrassed with troubles, so that they cannot get out; by which it appears that the sins they smart for are before my face; not only that I have seen them, but that I am displeased at them;' for till God, by pardoning our sins, hath cast them behind his back, they are still before his face. Note, Sooner or later God will convince those who do not now consider it, that he remembers all their works.

4. God hath begun to contend with them by his judgments, in earnest of what was farther coming. "The thief comes in, and the troop of robbers spoils without." Some take this as an instance of their wickedness, that they robbed and spoiled one another. Nec hospes ab hospite tutus,—'The host and the guest stand in fear of each other.' It seems rather to be a punishment of their sin; they were infested with secret thieves among themselves, that robbed their houses and shops, and picked their pockets, and troops of robbers, foreign invaders, that with open violence spoil abroad. So far was Israel from being healed, that they had fresh wounds given them daily by robbers and spoilers; and all this the effect of sin, all to punish them for robbing God, Isa. xlii. 24; Mal. iii. 8, 11.

Secondly. A particular account of the sins of the court, the kings and princes, and those about them, and the tokens of God's displeasure they were under for them.

1. Their king and princes were pleased with the wickedness and profaneness of their subjects, who were emboldened thereby to be so much the more wicked; ver. 3, "They make the king and princes glad with their wickedness." It pleased them to see the people conform to their wicked laws and examples, in the worship of their idols, and other instances of impiety and immorality, and to hear them flatter and applaud them in their wicked ways. When Herod saw that his wickedness pleased the people he proceeded farther in it; much more will the people do so when they see it pleaseth the prince, Acts xii. 3. Particularly they made them glad with their lies, with the lying praises with which they crowned the favourites of the prince, and the lying calumnies and censures with which they blackened those whom they knew the princes had a dislike of. Those that shew themselves pleased with slanders, and ill-natured stories, shall never want those about them that will fill their ears with such stories, Pr. xxix. 12. If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked, and will make him glad with their lies.

2. Drunkenness and revelling abounded much at the court, ver. 5. The day of our king was a merry day with them; either his birthday or his inauguration day, of which it is probable they had an anniversary observation. Or perhaps it was some holiday of his appointing, which was therefore called his day. On that day the princes met to drink the king's health, and got him among them, to be merry, and "made him sick with bottles of wine." It should seem that the king did not ordinarily drink to excess, but he was now, upon a high day, brought to it by the artifices of the princes, tempted by the goodness of the wine, the gaiety of the company, or the healths they urged; and so little was he used to it, that it made him sick; and it is justly charged as a crime, as crimen læsæ majestatis,—'treason,' upon those who thus imposed upon him, and made him sick. Nor would it serve for an excuse that it was the day of their king, but was rather an aggravation of the crime, that, when they pretended to do him honour, they dishonoured him to the highest degree. If it is a great affront and injury to a common person to make him drunk, and there is a woe to those that do it, Hab. ii. 15, much more to a crowned head; for the greater any man's dignity is, the greater disgrace it is to him to be drunk. "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine," Pr. xxxi. 4, 5. See what a prejudice the sin of drunkenness is to a man, to a king, 1st. In his health; it made him sick. It is a force upon nature; and strange it is by what charms men, otherwise rational enough, can be drawn to that which, besides the offence it gives to God, and the damage it doth to their spiritual and eternal welfare, is a present disorder and distemper to their own bodies. 2nd. In his honour; for when he was thus intoxicated "he stretched out his hand with scorners." Then he that was intrusted with the government of a kingdom lost the government of himself, and so far forgot, First. The dignity of a king, that he made himself familiar with players, and buffoons, and those whose company was a scandal. And, Secondly. The duty of a king, that he joined in confederacy with atheists, and the profane scoffers at religion, whom he ought to have silenced and put to shame. He "sat in the seat of the scornful," of those that are arrived at the highest pitch of impiety. He struck in with them, said as they said, did as they did, and exerted his power, and stretched forth the hand of his government, in concurrence with them. Goodness and good men are often made "the song of the drunkards," Ps. lxix. 12; xxxv. 16; but woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is such a child as to stretch forth his hand with those that make them so, Eccl. x. 16.

3. Adultery and uncleanness prevailed much among the courtiers. This is spoken of, ver. 4, 6, 7, and that of drunkenness comes in in the midst of this article; for wine is oil to the fire of lust, Pr. xxiii. 33. Those that are inflamed with fleshly lusts, that are adulterers, ver. 4, are here again and again compared to an "oven heated by the baker," ver. 4; "They have made ready their heart like an oven," ver. 6; "They are all but as an oven," ver. 7. Note, 1st. An unclean heart is like an oven heated; and the unclean lusts and affections of it are as the fuel that makes it hot. It is an inward fire, it keeps the heat within itself. So adulterers and fornicators secretly burn in lust, as the expression is, Rom. i. 27. The heat of the oven is an intense heat, especially as it is here described. He that heats it stirs up the fire, and ceaseth not from raising it up, till the bread is ready to be put in, being kneaded and leavened. All which only signifies that they are like an oven when it is at the hottest; nay, when it is too hot for the baker, (so the learned Dr. Pocock,) when it is hotter than he would have it, so that the raiser up of the fire ceaseth so long as while the dough that is kneaded is in the fermenting, that the heat may abate a little. Thus fiery hot are the lusts of an unclean heart. 2nd. The unclean wait for an opportunity to compass their wicked desire. Having made ready their heart, like an oven, they lie in wait to catch their prey; "The eye of the adulterer waits for the twilight," Job xxiv. 15. "Their baker sleeps all the night, but in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire," that is, as the baker hath kindled a fire in his oven, and laid sufficient fuel to it, goes to bed and sleeps all night, and in the morning finds his oven well heated, and ready for his purpose, so these wicked people, when they have laid some wicked plot, and formed a design for the gratifying of some covetous, ambitious, revengeful, or unclean lusts, have their hearts so fully set in them to do evil, that though they may stifle them for awhile, yet the fire of corrupt affection is still glowing within; and, as soon as ever there is an opportunity for it, their purposes, which they have compassed and imagined, break out into overt acts, as a fire flames out when it hath vent given it. Thus "they are all hot as an oven." Note, Lust in the heart is like fire in an oven, puts it into a heat. But the day is coming when those who thus make themselves like a fiery oven with their own vile affections, if that fire be not extinguished by Divine grace, shall be made as a fiery oven by Divine wrath, Ps. xxi. 9, when the day comes that shall burn as an oven, Mal. iv. 1.

4. They resist the proper methods of reformation and redress. They have "devoured their judges," those few good judges that were among them, that would have put out these fires with which they were heated; they fell foul upon them, and would not suffer them to do justice, but were ready to stone them, and perhaps did so; or, as some think, they provoked God to deprive them of the blessings of magistracy, and to leave all in confusion. "All their kings are fallen" one after another, and their families with them, which could not but put the kingdom into confusion, crumble it into contending parties, and occasion a great deal of bloodshed. There are heart-burnings among them, they are hot as an oven with rage and malice at one another, and this occasions the devouring of their judges, the falling of their kings. "For the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof," Pr. xxviii. 2. But in the midst of all this trouble and disorder, "there is none among them that calls unto God," that sees his hand stretched out against them in these judgments, and deprecates the strokes of it; none, or next to none, that stir up themselves to take hold on God, Isa. lxiv. 7. Note, Those are not only heated with sin, but hardened in sin, that continue to live without prayer, even when they are in trouble and distress.

8 Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people;
Ephraim is a cake not turned. [not:
9 Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it
Yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not.
10 And the pride of Israel testifieth to his face:
And they do not return to the LORD their God,
Nor seek him for all this.
11 Ephraim also is like a silly dove without heart:
They call to Egypt, they go to Assyria.
12 When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them,
I will bring them down as the fowls of the heaven;
I will chastise them, as their congregation hath heard
13 Woe unto them! for they have fled from me:
Destruction unto them! because they have transgressed against me:
Though I have redeemed them, yet they have spoken lies against me.
14 And they have not cried unto me with their heart,
When they howled upon their beds:
They assemble themselves for corn and wine,
And they rebel against me.
15 Though I have bound and strengthened their arms,
Yet do they imagine mischief against me.
16 They return, but not to the most High:
They are like a deceitful bow: [tongue:
Their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their
This shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.

Having seen how vicious and corrupt the court was, we now come to inquire how it is with the country, and we find that to be no better; and no marvel if the distemper that hath so seized the head affect the whole body, so that there is no soundness in it. The iniquity of Ephraim is discovered, as well as the sin of Samaria; of the people, as well as the princes; of which here are divers instances.

First. They were not peculiar and entire for God, as they should have been, ver. 8. 1. They did not distinguish themselves from the heathen, as God had distinguished them. Ephraim, he hath mingled himself among the people; hath officiated with them, and conformed himself to them, and has, in a manner, confounded himself with them, and lost his character among them. God had said, "The people shall dwell alone;" but they "mingled themselves with the heathen, and learned their works," Ps. cvi. 35. They went up and down among the heathen, to beg help of one of them against another, so some; whereas, if they had kept close to God, they had not needed the help of any of them. 2. They were not entirely devoted to God. Ephraim is a cake not turned, and so is burnt on one side and dough on the other side, but good for nothing on either side. As in Ahab's time, so now, they halted between God and Baal; sometimes they seemed zealous for God, but at other times as hot for Baal. Note, It is sad to think how many, who, after a sort, profess religion, are made up of contraries and inconsistencies, as a cake not turned; a constant self-contradiction, and always in one extreme or the other.

Sixthly. They were strangely insensible of the judgments of God which they were under, and which threatened their ruin, ver. 9. Observe, 1. The condition they were in. God was now to them, in his judgments, as a moth, and as rottenness; they were silently and slowly drawing towards the ruin of their state; partly by the encroachments of foreigners upon them, "Strangers have devoured his strength," and eaten him up; they have wasted his wealth and treasure, lessened his numbers, and consumed the fruits of the earth. Some devoured them by open wars, as, 2 Kin. xiii. 7, when the king of Syria made them like the dust, by threshing; others, by pretending treaties of peace and amity, in which they extorted abundance of wealth from them, and made them pay dear for that which did them no good, but which afterwards they paid dearer for, as 2 Kin. xvi. 9. This Ephraim got by mingling himself with the heathen, and suffering them to mingle with him; they devoured that which he stayed upon, and supported himself with. Note, Those that make not God their strength, Ps. lii. 7, make that their strength which will soon be devoured by strangers. They were thus reduced partly by their own maladministrations among themselves; "yea, grey hairs are here and there upon him," (are sprinkled upon him, so the word is,) that is, the sad symptoms of a decaying, declining state, that is waxing old, and ready to vanish away; the effects of trouble and vexation. Cura facit canos,—'Care turns grey.' The almond-tree doth not as yet flourish, but it begins to turn colour, which speaks aloud to him that the evil days are coming, and the years of which he shall say he has no pleasure in them, Eccl. xii. 1, 5. 2. Their regardlessness of these warnings; "He knoweth not," he is not aware of the hand of God gone out against him; it is lifted up, but he "will not see," Isa. xxvi. 11. He doth not know how near his ruin is, and takes no care to prevent it. Note, Stupidity under lesser judgments is a presage of greater coming.

Thirdly. They went on frowardly in their wicked ways, and were not reclaimed by the rebukes they were under; ver. 10, "The pride of Israel" still "testifieth to his face," as it had done before, ch. v. 5; under humbling providences their hearts were still unhumbled, their lusts unmortified; and it is "through the pride of their countenance" that they "will not seek after God," Ps. l. 4. They "do not return to the Lord their God" by repentance and reformation, "nor do they seek him" by faith and prayer, "for all this." Though they suffer for going astray from him,—though it can never be well with them till they come back to him, and though they have in vain sought to others for relief,—yet they think not of applying to God.

Fourthly. They were infatuated in their counsels, and took very wrong methods when they were in distress; ver. 11, 12, "Ephraim is like a silly dove without a heart." To be harmless as a dove, without gall, and not to hurt or injure others, is commendable, but to be sottish as a dove, without heart, that knows not how to defend herself, and provide for her own safety, is a shame. The silliness of this dove is, 1. That she laments not the loss of her young that are taken from her, but will make her nest again in the same place; so they have their people carried away by the enemy, and are not affected with it, but continue their dealings with those that deal barbarously with them. 2. That she is easily enticed by the bait into the net, and has no heart, no understanding, to discern her danger, as many other fowls do, Pr. i. 17. She "hasteth to the snare, and knows not that it is for her life," Pr. vii. 23; so they were drawn into leagues with neighbour nations that were their ruin. 3. That when she is frightened she has not courage to stay in the dove-house, where she is safe, and under the careful protection of her owner, but flutters and hovers, seeking shelter first in one place, then in another, and thereby exposeth herself so much the more. So this people, when they were in distress, sought not to God; did not fly "like the doves to their windows," where they might have been secured from all the birds of prey that struck at them, but threw themselves out of God's protection, and then called to Egypt to help them, and went in all haste to Assyria, to seek for that aid in vain, which they might, by repentance and prayer have found nearer home in their God. Note, It is a silly, senseless thing, for those that have a God in heaven to go to trust to creatures for that refuge and relief that is to be had in him only; and they that do so are a people of no understanding; they are without heart. Now see what comes of this silly dove; ver. 12, "When they shall go" to Egypt and Assyria "I will spread my net upon them." Note, Those that will not abide by the mercy of God must expect to be pursued by the justice of God. Here, 1st. They are ensnared; "I will spread my net upon them," bring them into straits, that they may see their folly, and think of returning. Note, It is common for those that go away from God to find snares there where they expected shelters. 2nd. They are humbled. They soar upwards, proud of their foreign alliances, and confiding in them; but "I will bring them down," let them fly never so high, "as the fowls of the heaven," that are shot flying. Note, God can and will bring those down that exalt themselves as the eagle, Oba. 3, 4. 3rd. They are made to smart for their folly; "I will chastise them." Note, The disappointments we meet with in the creature, when we put confidence in it, are a necessary chastisement, or discipline, that we may learn to be wiser another time. 4th. In all this the Scripture is fulfilled; it is "as the congregation has heard." They have been many a time told, by the word of God read and preached, and sung in their religious assemblies, that "vain is the help of man," that "in the son of man there is no help." They have heard, both from the law and from the prophets, what judgments God would bring upon them for their wickedness; and, as they have heard, now they shall see,—they shall feel. Note, It concerns us to take notice of the word of God, which we hear from time to time in the congregation, and to be governed by it, for we must shortly be judged by it; and it will justify God in the condemnation of sinners, and aggravate it to them, that they have had plain public warning given them of it. It is what their congregation has heard many a time, but they would not take warning. Son, remember thou wast told what would come of it, and now thou seest they were not vain words, Zec. i. 6.

Fifthly. They revolted from God, and rebelled against him, notwithstanding the various methods he took to retain them in their allegiance, ver. 13—15. Whence observe,

1. How kindly and tenderly God had dealt with them, as a gracious sovereign toward a people dear unto him, and whose prosperity he had much at heart. He had redeemed them, ver. 13, brought them at first out of the land of Egypt, and since delivered them out of many a distress. He had bound and strengthened their arms, ver. 15. When their power was weakened, like an arm broken, or out of joint, God set it again, and bound it, as the surgeon doth a broken bone, to make it knit. God had given Israel victories over the Syrians, 2 Kin. xiii. 16, 17; had "restored their coast," 2 Kin. xiv. 25, 26; had "girded them with strength for battle." Though 'I have chastened them,' so the margin reads it—sometimes corrected them for their faults and thereby taught them—at other times strengthened their arms, and relieved them; though I have used both fair means and foul to work upon them, it was all to no purpose; they were mercy proof and judgment proof.

2. How impudent their carriage had been towards him notwithstanding, which is described here for the conviction and humiliation of all those that have gone on in any way of wickedness, that they may see how exceeding sinful their sin is, how heinous; how the God of heaven interprets it, how he resents it. 1st. He had courted them to him, and taken them into covenant with himself; but they fled from him, as if he had been their dangerous enemy, who had always approved himself their faithful friend. They wandered from him, as the silly dove from her nest; for those who forsake God will find no rest or settlement in the creature, but wander endlessly. They fled from God when they forsook the worship of him, and ran away from his service, and withdrew themselves from their allegiance to him. 2nd. He had given them his laws, which were all holy, just, and good, by which he designed to keep them in the right way; but they transgressed against him. They sinned with a high hand and a stiff neck, wilfully and presumptuously, so the word signifies. They broke through the fence of the Divine law, and therein thwarted the design of the Divine love. 3rd. He had made known his truths to them, and given them all possible proofs of the sincerity of his goodwill to them, and yet they spoke lies against him; they set up false gods in competition with him; they denied his providence and power; thus they belied the Lord, Jer. v. 12. They rejected his messages sent them by his prophets, and said they should have peace, though they went on in sin, directly against what he said. In their hypocritical professions of religion, shows of devotion, and promises of amendment, they lied to the Lord, which he took as lying against him. 4th. He was their rightful Lord and King, and had always ruled in Jacob with equity, and for the public good, and yet they rebelled against him, ver. 14. They not only went off from him, but took up arms against him, would have deposed him if they could, and set up another. 5th. He designed well for them, but they imagined mischief against him, ver. 14. Sin is a mischievous thing; it is mischief against God, for it is treason against his crown and dignity. Not that the sinners can do any thing to hurt their Creator, (as one of the ancients observes on these words,) but what they can they do; and it is so much the worse when it is not done by surprise, or through inadverteney, but designedly, and with contrivance. The Jews have a saying, which Dr. Pocock quotes here, 'The thoughts of transgression are worse than the transgression.' The designing of mischief is doing it, in God's account; compassing and imagining the death of the king is treason by our law. They that imagine an ill thing, though it prove a vain thing, Ps. i. 2, will be reckoned with for the imagination.

3. How they shall be punished for this; ver. 13, "Woe unto them, for they have fled from me." Note, Those who fly from God have woes sent after them, and are, without doubt, in a woful case. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against them. The word of God saith, Woe to them; and observe what follows immediately, "destruction unto them." Note, The woes of God's word have real effects; destruction makes them good. The judgments of his hand shall verify the judgments of his mouth. Those whom he curseth and pronounceth woful, they are cursed, they are woful indeed.

Sixthly. Their shows of devotion and reformation were but shows, and in them they did but mock God.

1. They pretended devotion, but it was not sincere, ver. 14. When the hand of God was gone forth against them they made some sort of application to him; "When he slew them, then they sought him. Lord, in trouble have they visited thee;" but it was all in hypocrisy. 1st. When they were under personal troubles, and called upon God in secret, they were not sincere in that; "They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds." When they were "chastened with pain upon their beds," and "the multitude of their bones with strong pains," (perhaps ill of the wounds they received in war) they cried, and groaned, and complained in the forms of devotion; and, it may be, they used many good words, proper enough for the circumstances they were in. They cried, God help us, and, Lord, look upon us; but they did not cry with their heart, and therefore God reckons it was no crying to him. Moses is said to cry unto God when he spoke not a word; only his heart prayed with faith and fervency, Ex. xiv. 15. These here made a great noise, and said a deal, and yet did not cry to God, because their hearts were not right with him, not subjected to his will, devoted to his honour, or employed in his service. To pray is to lift up the soul to God; this is the essence of prayer. If that be not done, words, though never so well worded, are but wind; but if there be that, it is an acceptable prayer, though the groanings cannot be uttered. Note, Those do not pray to God at all that do not pray in spirit. Nay, God is so far from approving it, and accepting it, that he calls it howling. Some think it intimates the noisiness of their prayers; they cried to God, as they used to cry to Baal, when they thought he must be awakened; or the brutish, violent passions which they vented in their prayer,—they snarled at the stone, and howled under the whip, but regarded not the hand. Or, it notes that their hypocritical prayers were so far from pleasing God that they were offensive to him. He was angry at their prayers. The "songs of the temple shall be howlings," Am. viii. 3. God will be so far from pitying them, that he will justly laugh at their calamity who have so often laughed at his authority. 2nd. When they were under public troubles, and met together to implore God's favour, in that also they were hypocritical; they assembled themselves for fashion's sake, because it was usual to call a solemn assembly in time of general mourning, Zeph. ii. 1. But it was only to pray for corn and wine that they came together, which was the thing they wanted, and feared being deprived of by the want of rain, the judgment they now laboured under. They did not pray for the favour and grace of God, that God would give them repentance, pardon their sins, and turn away his wrath, but only that he would not take away from them their corn and wine. Note, Carnal hearts in their prayers covet temporal mercies only, and dread and deprecate no other but temporal judgments, for they have no sense of any other.

2. They pretended reformation, but neither was that sincere, ver. 16. Here is, 1st. The sin of Israel. "They return," that is, they make show as if they would return. They take on them to repent, and amend their doings, but they make nothing of it. They do not come home to God, nor return to their allegiance; whereas God saith, Jer. iv. 1, "If thou wilt return, O Israel, return to me; do not only turn towards me, but return to me." This dissimulation of theirs makes them like a deceitful bow, which looks as if it were fit for business, and is bent and drawn accordingly; but when strength comes to be laid to it either the bow or string breaks, and the arrow, instead of flying to the mark, drops at the archer's foot. Such were their essays towards repentance and reformation. 2nd. The sin of the princes of Israel. That which is charged upon them is "the rage of their tongues," quarrelling with God and his providence, and with all about them, when they are crossed. Princes think they may say what they will, and that it is their prerogative to huff and bluster, to curse and rail, and call names at their pleasure; but let them know there is a God above them that will call them to an account for the rage of their tongues, and make their own tongues to fall upon them. 3rd. The punishment of Israel, and their princes, for their sin. As for the princes, they shall fall by the sword, either of their enemies or of their own people,—some by one, and some by the other. And "this shall be their derision;" this is that for which they shall be derided in the land of Egypt, when they flee to the Egyptians for succour, ver. 11. Their sin and punishment shall make them a laughing-stock to all about them. Note, Those that are treacherous and deceitful in their dealings with God, and passionate and outrageous in their carriage towards men, will justly be made a derision to their neighbours, for they make themselves ridiculous.

CHAPTER VIII.

This chapter, as that before, divides itself into the sins and punishments of Israel; every verse almost speaks both, and all to bring them to repentance. When they saw the malignant nature of their sin, in the description of that, they could not but be convinced how much it was their duty to repent of what was so ill in itself; and when they saw the mischievous consequences of their sin, in the predictions of them, they could not but see how much it was their interest to repent, for the preventing of them. I. The sin of Israel is here set forth, 1. In many general expressions, ver. 1, 3, 12, 14; 2. In many particular instances, setting up kings without God, ver. 4, and setting up idols against God, ver. 4—6, 11, and courting alliances with the neighbour nations, ver. 8—10; 3. In this aggravation of it, that they still kept up a profession of religion, and relation to God, ver. 2, 13, 14. II. The punishment of Israel is here set forth as answering the sin. God would bring an enemy upon them, ver. 1, 3; all their projects should be blasted, ver. 7; their confidence, both in their idols and in their foreign alliances, should disappoint them, ver. 6, 8, 10; their strength at home should fail them, ver. 14; their secrets should have no reckoning made of them, and their sins should have a reckoning made for them, ver. 13.

SET the trumpet to thy mouth.
He shall come as an eagle against the house of the LORD,
Because they have transgressed my covenant,
And trespassed against my law.
2 Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee.
3 Israel hath cast off the thing that is good:
The enemy shall pursue him.
4 They have set up kings, but not by me:
They have made princes, and I knew it not:
Of their silver and their gold have they made them idols,
That they may be cut off.
5 Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off;
Mine anger is kindled against them:
How long will it be ere they attain to innocency?
6 For from Israel was it also:
The workman made it; therefore it is not God:
But the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces.
7 For they have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind:
It hath no stalk: the bud shall yield no meal:
If so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up.

The reproofs and threatenings here are introduced with an order to the prophet to "set the trumpet to his mouth," ver. 1; thus to call a solemn assembly, that all might take notice of what he had to deliver, and take warning by it. He must sound an alarm; must in God's name proclaim war with this rebellious nation. An enemy is coming with speed and fury to seize their land, and he must awaken them to expect it. Thus the prophet must do the part of a watchman, that was by sound of trumpet to call the besieged to stand to their arms, when he saw the besiegers making their attack, Eze. xxxiii. 3. The prophet must "lift up his voice like a trumpet," Isa. lviii. 1, and the people must hearken to the sound of the trumpet, Jer. vi. 17. Now,

First. Here is a general charge drawn up against them as sinners, as rebels and traitors, against their sovereign Lord. 1. They have "transgressed my covenant," ver. 1. They have not only transgressed the command, (every sin doth that,) but they have transgressed the covenant; they have been guilty of such sins as break the original contract; they have revolted from their allegiance, and violated the marriage covenant, by their spiritual whoredom; have, in effect, declared they will be no longer God's people, nor take him for their God; that is transgressing the covenant. They have not only done foolishly, but have dealt deceitfully. 2. "They have trespassed against my law," in many particular instances. God's law is the rule by which we are to walk; and this is the malignity of sin, that it trespasseth upon the bounds set us by that law. 3. They have "cast off the thing that is good." They have put away and rejected good, that is, God himself, so some understand it, and very fitly. He is good, and doth good, and is our goodness; "There is none good but one, that is God," the fountain of all good. They have cast him off, as not desiring to have any thing more to do with him. God was abandoning them to ruin, and here gives the reason for it. Note, God never casts off any till they first cast him off; or, as we read it, they have cast off the thing that is good; they have cast off the service and worship of God, which is, in effect, casting God off. They had cast off that which denominates men good; they have cast off the fear of God, and the regard of man, and all sense of virtue and honesty. Observe, "They have transgressed my covenant." It is come to that at last; for they trespassed against my law, breaking the command, and made way for breaking the covenant. And they did that; for they cast off that which was good; there it began first. They left off to be wise, and to do good, and then they went all to nought, Ps. xxxvi. 3. See the method of apostasy; men first cast off that which is good; then those omissions make way for commissions; and frequent actual transgressions of God's law bring men at length to an habitual renouncing of his covenant. When men cast off praying, and hearing, and sabbath sanctification, and other things that are good, they are in the high road to a total forsaking of God.

Secondly. Here are general threatenings of wrath and ruin for their sin. The enemy shall "come as an eagle against the house of the Lord," and, ver. 3, "shall pursue him." If by "the house of the Lord" we understand the temple at Jerusalem, by the eagle that comes against it we must suppose to be meant either Sennacherib,—who had taken all the fenced cities of Judah, laid siege to Jerusalem, and no doubt aimed at the house of the Lord, to lay that waste, as he had done the temples of the gods of other nations,—or Nebuchadnezzar, who burnt the temple, and made a prey of the vessels of the temple; but if we make it to point at the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, we must reckon it is the body of that people, which, as Israelites to whom pertained the adoption, the glory, and the covenants, is here called the house of the Lord. They thought their being so would be their protection; but the prophet is bid to tell them, that now they had lost the life and spirit of their religion, though they still retained the name and form of it, they were but as a carcase to which the eagles, and other birds of prey, should be gathered together. The enemy shall pursue them as an eagle, so swiftly, so strongly, so furiously. Note, Those that break their covenant of friendship with God expose themselves to the enmity of all about them, to whom they make themselves a cheap and easy prey; and their having been the house of the Lord, and his living temples, will be no excuse or refuge to them: see Am. iii. 2.

Thirdly. Here is the people's hypocritical claim of relation to God when they were in trouble and distress; ver. 2, "Israel shall cry unto me;" that is, when either they are threatened with these judgments, and would plead an exemption; or when the judgments are inflicted on them, and they apply themselves to God for relief, pouring out a prayer when God's chastening is upon them, they will plead that among them God is known, and his name is great, Ps. lxxvi. 1; and in their distress will pretend to that knowledge of God's ways which in their prosperity they desired not, but despised. They will then cry unto God, will call him their God, and, as impudent beggars, will tell him they are well acquainted with him, and have known him long. Note, There are many who in works deny God, and disown him, yet to serve a turn will profess that they know him, they know more of him than some of their neighbours do. But what stead will it stand a man in to be able to say, "My God, I know thee," when he cannot say, My God, I love thee, and, My God, I serve thee, and cleave to thee only.

Fourthly. Here is the prophet's expostulation with them in God's name; ver. 5, "How long will it be ere they attain to innocency?" It is not meant of absolute innocency, that is what the guilty can never attain to; but how long will they be ere they repent and reform, ere they become innocent in this matter, and free from the sin of idolatry? They are wedded to their idols; how long will it be ere they are weaned from them? 'ere they are able to get clear of them?' so it might be rendered. This intimates that custom in sin makes it very difficult for men to part with it. It is hard to cleanse from that filthiness either of flesh or spirit which has been long wallowed in. But God speaks as if he thought the time long till sinners cast away their iniquities and come to live a new life. He complains of their obstinacy, that is it that keeps his anger against them burning, which would soon be turned away if they did but attain to innocency from those sins that kindled it. They in trouble cry, How long will it be ere God return to us in a way of mercy? but they do not hear him ask, How long will it be ere they return to God in a way of duty?

Fifthly. Here are some particular sins which they are charged with, are convicted of the folly of, and warned of the fatal consequences of, and for which God's anger is kindled against them.

1. In their civil affairs they set up kings without God and in contempt of him, ver. 4. So they did when they rejected Samuel, in whom the Lord was their king, and chose Saul, that they might be like the nations; so they did when they revolted from their allegiance to the house of David, and set up Jeroboam, wherein, though they fulfilled God's secret counsel, yet they neither aimed at his glory nor consulted his oracle, nor applied themselves to him by prayer for direction, nor had any regard to his providence, but were led by their own humour, and hurried on by the impetus of their own passions; so they did now about the time when Hosea prophesied, when it seems to have grown fashionable to set up kings and depose them again, according as the contenders for the crown could make an interest, 2 Kin. xv. 8, &c. Note, We cannot expect comfort and success in our affairs when we go about them, and go in them, without consulting God, and acknowledge not him in all our ways. "They set up kings, and I knew it not," that is, I did not know it from them, they did not ask counsel at my mouth, whether they might lawfully do it, or whether it would be best for them to do it, though they had prophets and oracles with whom they might have advised; they "look not to the Holy One of Israel," Isa. xxxi. 1. Nor did the princes do as Jephthah, who, before he took upon him the government, "uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh," Jud. xi. 11. Note, Those that are intrusted with public concerns, and particularly with the election and nomination of magistrates, ought to take God along with them therein, by desiring his direction and designing his honour.

2. In their religious matters they did much worse, for they set up calves against God, in competition with him, and contradiction to him. Of their silver and their gold which God gave them and multiplied to them, that they might serve and honour him with it, they have made them idols; they called them gods, 1 Kin. xii. 28, "Behold thy gods, O Israel!" but God calls them idols. The word signifies griefs or troubles, because they are offensive to God, and will be ruining to those that worship them. "Their silver and their gold they have made to them idols;" so the words are, referring primarily to the images of their gods, which they made of gold and silver, especially the golden calves at Dan and Bethel—idolaters spare no cost in worshipping their idols; but they are very applicable to the spiritual idolatry of the covetous; their silver and their gold are the gods they place their happiness in, set their hearts upon, to which they pay their homage, and in which they put their confidence. Now, to shew them the folly of their idolatry, he tells them.

1st. Whence their gods came. Trace them to their original, and they will be found the creatures of their own fancies, and the work of their own hands, ver. 6. The calf they worshipped is here called the calf of Samaria, because, it is probable, when Samaria, in Ahab's time, became the metropolis of the kingdom, a calf was set up there, to be near the court, besides those at Dan and Bethel, or perhaps one of those was removed thither; for those that are for new gods will still be for newer. Now, let them consider what this god of theirs owed its rise and being to. First. To their own invention and institution; "from Israel was it also." Not from the God of Israel, he expressly forbade it, but from Israel. It was a device of their own, some think not borrowed from any of their neighbours, no, not from the Egyptians; for, though they worshipped Apis in a living cow, they never worshipped a golden calf; that was from Israel, it was their own iniquity. Now, could that be worthy of their worship which was a contrivance of their own? It was from Israel, that is, the gold and silver of which it was made was collected from the people of Israel by a brief. It was a poor god that was framed by contribution. Secondly. It was owing to the skill and labour of the craftsman, Deu. xxvii. 15; "The workman made it; therefore it is not God," ver. 6. This is a very cogent, conclusive argument, and the inference so very plain, that one would think their own thoughts should have suggested it to them, so as to make them ashamed of their idolatry. What can be more absurd than for men to worship that as a god, giving being and good to them, which they themselves gave being to, (both matter and form,) but could not give life to? A made god is no god. This is a self-evident truth; and yet St. Paul was accused as a criminal for preaching that "they be no gods which are made with hands," Acts xix. 26; and this here, which should have turned them from their idols, comes in as a reason why they were inseparably wedded to them; therefore they could not attain to innocency, that is, because it was from themselves. They were willing to have gods of their own to do what they pleased with, that they themselves might do what they pleased.

2nd. What their gods would come to. If they are not gods they will not last; nay, if they pretend to be gods they will be reckoned with. "The calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces," and those that would not yield to the force of the former argument shall be convinced by this that "it is not God," but an 'unprofitable idol,' as the Chaldee calls it. It shall be broken to shivers, like a potter's vessel, though it be a golden calf. It shall be chips or saw-dust; it shall be a spider's web: so St. Jerome. It seems to allude to Moses' grinding the golden calf to powder that was in his time. This shall be served as that was. Sennacherib boasted what he had done to Samaria and her idols, Isa. x. 11. Note, Deifying any creature makes way for the destruction of it. If they had made vessels and ornaments for themselves of their silver and gold, they might have remained; but if they make gods of them they shall be broken to pieces.

3rd. What their gods would bring them to. The breaking of them to pieces would be a disappointment to those who trusted in them. But that was not all; they have made themselves idols that they may be cut off, ver. 4; that their gold and silver, which they so abused, may be cut off, so some take it; nay, that they may themselves be cut off from God, from their own land, from the land of the living. Their idolatry will as certainly end in their extirpation as if they had purposely designed it. And when this proves to be the effect of their sin, what relief will they have from the gods wherein they trusted? None at all; "Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off;" that is, it cannot give thee any help in thy distress, and the pleasure thou now takest in it will vanish, and be no pleasure to thee. Those that were justly sent to the gods whom they had chosen found them miserable comforters, Jud. x. 14. If men will not quit the love and service of sin, yet they shall certainly lose all the delights and profits of it. If Samaria had continued firm and faithful to the God of Israel, he would have been a present, powerful help to her; but the calf she preferred before him was a broken reed. The case will be the same with those that make their silver and their gold their god; it will "cast them off," and not "profit them in the day of wrath," Eze. vii. 19. Note, Those that suffer themselves to be deceived into any idolatries will certainly find themselves deceived in them. Cardinal Wolsey owned that if he had served his God as faithfully as he had served his prince, he would not have cast him off, as his prince did, in his old age.

Their disappointment in their idols is illustrated, ver. 7, by a similitude which speaks both that and the destruction which God brought upon them for their idolatry. First. They got no good to themselves by worshipping idols; "They have sown the wind." They have put themselves to a great deal of trouble and expense to make and worship their idols, have made a business of it as much as the husbandman doth of sowing his corn, in expectation of reaping some mighty advantage by it, and that they should be as prosperous and victorious as the neighbour nations were that worshipped idols; but it is all a cheat, it is like sowing the wind, which can yield no increase; they "labour in vain, labour for the wind," Eccl. v. 16. They take great pains to no purpose, and weary themselves for very vanity, Hab. ii. 13; they that make an idol of this world do so, they set their eyes on that which is not, which, like the wind, makes a great noise, but has nothing substantial in it. Secondly. They brought ruin upon themselves by it. They shall "reap the whirlwind," a great whirlwind, so the word signifies, which shall hurry them away and dash them to pieces. They not only have not their false gods for them, but they set the true God against them; their favour will stand them in no more stead than the wind, but his wrath will do them more mischief than a whirlwind. As a man sows so shall he reap; 'If it may be supposed that a man should sow the wind, and cover it with earth, or keep it there for awhile penned up, what could he expect but that it should be enforced, by its being shut up, and the accession of what might increase its strength, to break forth again in greater quantities with greater violence;' so Dr. Pocock. They promise themselves plenty, peace, and victory, by worshipping idols, but their expectations come to nothing; what they sow never comes up, it has no stalk, no blade. Or, if it have, "the bud shall yield no meal," it shall be as the thin ears in Pharaoh's dream, that were blasted with the east wind, and there was nothing in them. Or, if it yield, if they do prosper for awhile in their idolatrous courses, "the stranger shall swallow it up;" it shall be so far from doing them any service, that it shall be but as a bait to invite strangers to invade them, and as a spoil to enrich those strangers, and enable them to do so much the more mischief. Note, The service of idols is an unprofitable service, and the works of darkness unfruitful; nay, in the end they will be pernicious; Rom. vi. 21, "the end of those things is death." They that sow iniquity reap vanity. Nay, they that sow to the flesh reap corruption. The hopes of sinners will be cheats, and their gains will be snares.

8 Israel is swallowed up:
Now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure. [himself:
9 For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by Ephraim hath hired lovers.
10 Yea, though they have hired among the nations, now will
I gather them, [of princes.
And they shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king
11 Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin,
Altars shall be unto him to sin.
12 I have written to him the great things of my law,
But they were counted as a strange thing.
13 They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it;
But the LORD accepteth them not;
Now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins:
They shall return to Egypt.
14 For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples;
And Judah hath multiplied fenced cities:
But I will send a fire upon his cities,
And it shall devour the palaces thereof.

It was the honour and happiness of Israel that they had but one God to trust to, and he all-sufficient in every strait; and but one God to serve, and he well worthy of all their devotions; but it was their sin, and folly, and shame, that they knew not when they were well,—that they forsook their own mercies for lying vanities; for,

First. They multiplied their alliances; ver. 9, they have "hired lovers;" or, as the margin reads it, 'they have hired loves.' They were at great expense to purchase the friendship of the nations about them, that otherwise had no value or affection at all for them, nor cared to have any thing to do with them, but only upon the Shechemites' principle, Shall not their cattle and their substance be ours? Gen. xxxiv. 23. Had Israel maintained the honour of their peculiarity, the nations about would have continued to admire them as a wise, understanding people; but when they profaned their own crown their neighbours despised them, and they had no interest in them farther than they paid dear for it. But those sure have carried themselves ill among their neighbours who have no loves, no lovers but what they hire. See here,

1. The contempt that Israel lay under among the nations; ver. 8, "Israel is swallowed up," devoured by strangers, their land eaten up, ver. 7, and themselves too; and being impoverished they have quite lost their credit and reputation, like a merchant that is become a bankrupt, so that they are "among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure;" a vessel of dishonour, 2 Tim. ii. 20; "a despised, broken vessel," Jer. xxii. 28. None of their neighbours have any value for them, nor care to have any thing to do with them. Note, Those that have professed religion, if they degenerate and grow profane, are of all men the most contemptible. "If the salt have lost its savour" it is fit for nothing but to be "trodden under foot of men." Or, it notes their dispersion and captivity among the Gentiles; they shall be among the poor and prisoners, and who has pleasure in such?

2. The court that Israel made to the nations notwithstanding; ver. 9, they are gone to Assyria, to engage the king of Assyria to help them; and herein they are as "a wild ass alone by himself," foolish, and headstrong, and unruly; they will have their way, and nothing shall hold them in, no, not the bridle of God's laws; nothing shall turn them back, no, not the sword of God's wrath. They take a course by themselves, and the effect will be, that, like a wild ass by himself, they will be the easier and surer prey to the lion: see Job xi. 12; Jer. ii. 24. Note, Man is in nothing more like the wild ass's colt than in seeking for that succour and satisfaction in the creature that is to be had in God only.

3. The crosses that they were likely to meet with in their alliances with the neighbour nations; ver. 10, "Though they have hired among the nations," and hoped thereby to prevent their own ruin, yet "now will I gather them," as the sheaves in the floor, Mic. iv. 8; so that what they provided for their own safety shall but make them the easier prey to their enemies. Note, There is no fence against the judgments of God when they come with commission; nay, that which men hire for their own preservation often contributes to their own destruction: see Isa. vii. 20. The king of Assyria, whose friendship they courted, called himself a "king of princes;" Isa. x. 8, "Are not my princes altogether kings?" He laid burthens upon Israel, levied taxes upon them, 2 Kin. xv. 19, 20; and for these "they shall sorrow a little," that is, this shall be but a little burthen to them in comparison of what they may farther expect; or, they will be but little sensible of this grievance, will not lay it to heart, and therefore may expect heavier judgments. 'They have begun to be diminished' (so some read it) 'by the burthen of the king of princes:' but this is only the "beginning of sorrows," Mat. xxiv. 8; the "beginning of revenges," Deu. xxxii. 42. Note, God often comes gradually with his judgments upon a provoking people; that he may shew how slow he is to wrath, and may awaken them to repentance; but they that are made to sorrow a little, if they are not thereby brought to sorrow after a godly sort, will another day be made to sorrow a great deal, to sorrow everlastingly.

Secondly. They multiplied their altars and temples. Observe,

1. How they denied the power of godliness, and wholly cast that off; ver. 2, "I have written to him the great things of my law." That speaks the privilege they enjoyed, having God's statutes and judgments made known to them; and being intrusted with the living oracles. Note, 1st. The things of God's law are great things, they are magnalia Dei,—'the great things of God.' They are things that speak the greatness of the Law-maker, and things of great use and great importance to us; they are our life, and our eternal welfare depends upon our observance of them, and obedience to them. They will make us great if we make a right use of them; and they are things which God will magnify and make honourable. 2nd. It is a great privilege to have the things of God's law written; thus they are reduced to a greater certainty, spread the farther and last the longer, with much less danger of being embezzled and corrupted then if they were transmitted by word of mouth only. 3rd. The things of God's law are of his own writing, for Moses and the prophets were his amanuenses, and holy men wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. 4th. It is the advantage of those that are members of the visible church that these great things are written to them, are intended for their direction, and so they must receive them. What things were written in former ages were written for our learning, and are profitable for us. And if they were happy that had the great things of God's law written to them, how much happier are we that have the much greater things of his Gospel written to us! But see how this privilege was slighted, these great things of the law were "counted as a strange thing," as unintelligible and unreasonable, which might therefore be slighted because not to be fathomed, not to be accounted for; or as foreign, and things of no concernment to them; things that they had nothing to do with, nor were to be governed by. They used those things as strangers, which they were shy of, and knew not how to bid welcome. "We desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Note, First. God having written to us the great things of his law, we ought to make them familiar to us as our nearest relations, Pr. vii. 3, 4; for therefore we have them written that they may talk with us, Pr. vi. 22. Secondly. We make nothing of the things of God's law if we make strange of them, as if they did not affect us, and therefore we need not be affected with them.

2. How they kept up the form of godliness notwithstanding, and to what little purpose they did so.

1st. They multiplied their altars; ver. 11, "Ephraim made many altars to sin." God appointed that there should be but one altar for sacrifice, Deu. xii. 3, 5; but the ten tribes having forsaken that, yet would still be thought very devout and zealous for the honour of God, and, as if they would make amends for the affront they put on God's altar, they made many altars, dedicated to the God of Israel, whom hereby they intended, or at least pretended, to give glory to; but that would not justify their violation of God's express command, nor would the example of the patriarchs, who, before the law of Moses, had many altars. No, they "made many altars to sin;" that is, they did that which turned into sin to them, and therefore these altars shall be unto them to sin, that is, God will charge it upon them as a heinous sin, and put that upon the score of their crimes which they designed to be for the expiation of their crimes! Or, they shall be to them an occasion of farther sin. Their multiplying of altars dedicated to the God of Israel would introduce altars dedicated to other gods. Note, It is a great sin to corrupt the worship of God, and it will be charged as sin upon them that do it, how plausible soever their pretensions may be; and the way of this, as other sins, is down-hill. Those that once deviate from the fixed rule of God's commands will wander endlessly.

2nd. They multiplied their sacrifices, ver. 13. Their altars were smoking altars, and they sacrificed flesh for the sacrifices of God's offerings, and they celebrated their feasts upon their sacrifices. They were at a great expence upon their devotions, and (as those commonly are who set up their own inventions in the room of Divine institutions) were very zealous in their way, as if they hoped by their impositions on themselves to atone for the contempt of the great Atonement, and by their observing a ceremonial law of their own to excuse themselves from the obligation of all God's moral precepts. But how doth it speed? First. God makes no reckoning of their services. "The Lord accepteth them not;" how should he, when they did not offer their sacrifice upon that altar which alone sanctified the gift? and when they only sacrificed flesh, but not the spiritual sacrifice of a penitent, believing heart. Note, Those services only are acceptable to God which are performed according to the rule of his word, and through Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Secondly. He takes that occasion to reckon with them for their sins. Now will he, instead of pardoning their iniquity, and blotting out their sins, as they expected, remember their iniquity, and visit their sins. Such an abomination to the Lord are the sacrifices of the wicked, that they provoke him to call them to an account for all their other abominations. When they think by their sacrifices to bribe the Judge of heaven and earth into a connivance at their wickedness, he will resent that as the highest affront they can put upon him, and it shall be the measure-filling sin. Note, A petition for leave to sin amounts to an imprecation of the curse for sin, and so it shall be answered; According to the multitude of the idols, I will punish their sins, for "they shall return to Egypt;" that is, they shall be carried captive into Assyria, which shall be to them a house of bondage, as Egypt was to their fathers, Or, it refers to Deu. xxviii. 68, where returning to Egypt is made to close and complete the miseries of that sinful nation.

3rd. They multiplied their temples. And these also in honour of the true God, as they pretended, but really in contempt of the choice he had made of Jerusalem to put his name there. "Israel has forgotten his Maker," ver. 14. They pretended to know him, and yet forgot him; for they "liked not to retain God in their knowledge," when the remembrance of him would give check to their lust. It was an aggravation of their sin in forgetting God that he was their Maker, Deu. xxxii. 15, 18; Job xxxv. 10, as nothing is more obligatory to us to remember him than that he is our Creator, &c., Eccl. xii. 1; "He has forgotten his Maker, and builds temples." He seems, by the temples he builds, to be mindful of his Maker, and to be desirous still to keep him in mind, and yet really he has forgotten him, because he has cast off the fear of him. Some by temples here understand palaces, for so the word sometimes signifies. He "has forgotten his Maker," and yet is so secure and haughty that he sets his judgments at defiance, as Nebuchadnezzar did when he said, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built?" Judah is likewise charged with multiplying fenced cities, and trusting in them for safety, when the judgments of God were abroad. To fortify their cities in subjection and subordination to God was well enough; but to fortify them in opposition to God, and without any regard to him or his providence, Isa. xxii. 11, shews their hearts to be desperately hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. But none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered, nor shall they. God will "send a fire upon his cities," upon the cities both of Judah and Israel, not only the head cities of Jerusalem and Samaria, but all the other cities of those two kingdoms, and it shall devour not only the cottages, but the palaces thereof: though never so strong, the fire shall master them; though never so stately and sumptuous, the fire shall not spare them. This was fulfilled when all the cities of Israel were laid in ashes by the king of Assyria, and all the cities of Judah. The fires they both kindled were of his sending, and when he judgeth he will overcome.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter, I. God threatens to deprive this degenerate seed of Israel of all their worldly enjoyments, because by sin they had forfeited their title to them, so that they should have no comfort either in receiving them themselves or offering them to God, ver. 1—5. II. He dooms them to utter ruin for their own sins and the sins of their prophets, ver. 6—8. III. He upbraids them with the wickedness of their fathers before them, which they trod in the steps of, ver. 9, 10. IV. He threatens them with the destruction of their children, and the rooting out of their posterity, ver. 11—17.

REJOICE not, O Israel, for joy, as other people:
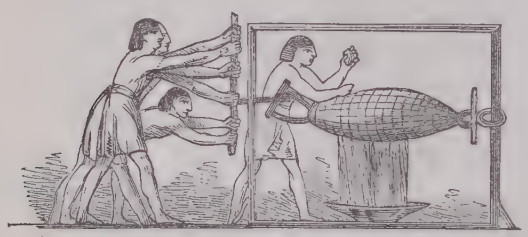
For thou hast gone a whoring from thy God,
Thou hast loved a reward upon every cornfloor.
2 The floor and the winepress shall not feed them,
And the new wine shall fail in her.



WINEPRESS.

3 They shall not dwell in the LORD's land;
But Ephraim shall return to Egypt,
And they shall eat unclean things in Assyria.
4 They shall not offer wine offerings to the LORD,
Neither shall they be pleasing unto him:
Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners;
All that eat thereof shall be polluted:
For their bread for their soul
Shall not come into the house of the LORD.
5 What will ye do in the solemn day,
And in the day of the feast of the LORD?
6 For, lo, they are gone because of destruction:
Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them:
The pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them:
Thorns shall be in their tabernacles.

Here, First. The people of Israel are charged with spiritual adultery. "O Israel, thou hast gone a whoring from thy God," ver. 1. Their covenant with God was a marriage covenant, by which they were joined to him as their God, renouncing all others. But when they set up idols, and worshipped them, when they fled to creatures for succour, and put a confidence in them, they went a whoring from God as their God, and honoured the pretenders and rivals with that affection, adoration, and confidence, which was due to God only. Other people were idolaters, but that sin was not in them, going a whoring from God, as it was in Israel, that had been married to him. Note, The sins of those who have made a profession of religion and relation to God are more provoking to him than the sins of others. As a proof of their going a whoring from God, it is charged upon them that they "loved a reward from every cornfloor." 1. They loved to give rewards to their idols in the offerings and first-fruits they presented to them out of every cornfloor. They took a strange pleasure in serving their idols with that which they would have grudged to consecrate to God, and employ in his service. Note, It is common for those that are niggardly in the expenses of their religion to be very prodigal in spending upon their lusts. Or, 2. They loved to receive rewards from their idols, and such they reckoned the fruits of the earth to be. "These are my rewards which my lovers have given me," ch. ii. 12. Note, Those are directly disposed to spiritual idolatry that love a reward in the cornfloor better than a reward in the favour of God and eternal life.

Secondly. They are forbidden to rejoice as other people do. Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy. Do not expect to rejoice. What peace, what joy, what hast thou to do with either, while thy whoredoms and witchcrafts are so many? 2 Kin. ix. 19—22. Be not disposed to rejoice, for it doth not become thee, but rather to "be afflicted, and mourn, and weep," Jas. iv. 9. Judah, that keeps close to the true God; nay, and other people that never knew him, nor could ever be charged with revolting from him, may be allowed to rejoice, as not having so much cause to be ashamed as Israel hath, that has gone a whoring from him. Some think they had at this time particular occasions for joy, upon the account either of some losses recovered, or some advantages gained, or some league made with a potent ally, for which they had public rejoicings, as other people used to have upon such occasions; but God sends to them not to rejoice. Note, Joy is forbidden fruit to wicked people. They must not rejoice, because they have "gone a whoring from their God." And therefore, 1st. That whatever it was which they rejoiced in, it would be no security or advantage to them, so long as they were at a distance from God, and at war with him. Note, We are likely to have small joy of any of our creature comforts if we make not God our chief joy. 2nd. The sense of sin and dread of wrath ought to be a damp upon their joy, and a strong alloy to all their comforts. Note, Those that, by departing from God, have made work for repentance, have thereby marred their own mirth, till they return and make their peace with God.

Thirdly. They are threatened with destroying judgments for their spiritual whoredoms, according to what was said long before, Ps. lxxiii. 27, "Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee." It is here threatened,

1. That their land shall not yield its wonted increase. Canaan, that fruitful land, shall be "turned into barrenness for the wickedness of them that dwell therein." They love the reward in the cornfloor, and are so full of the joy of harvest, that they have no disposition at all to mourn for their sins, and therefore God will, for their effectual humiliation, take away from them, not only their delights and dainties, but even their necessary food; ver. 2, "The floor and the winepress shall not feed them," much less feast them; it shall either be blasted by the hand of God, or plundered by the hand of man; the new wine with which they used to make merry shall fail in her. Note, When we make the world and the things of it our idol and portion, above what they were designed for, it is just with God to deny us even support and nourishment from them, according to that which they were designed for, to shew us our folly, and correct us for it. Let them miss of their food in the cornfloor that look for their reward in the cornfloor. We forfeit the good things of this world if we love them as the best things.

2. That their land shall not only cease to feed them, but cease to lodge them, and to be a habitation for them. It shall spew them out, as it had done the Canaanites before them; ver. 3, "They shall not dwell any longer in the Lord's land." The land of Canaan was in a peculiar manner 'the Lord's land, the land of the Shechinah,' so the Chaldee; 'the land of the Lord of the worlds,' so the Arabic: he whose all the earth is, Ps. xxiv. 1, took that for his demesne. "The land is mine," saith God, Lev. xxv. 23. They had used it, or abused it rather, as if it had been their own, had not paid the rent, nor done the services due to God as their landlord, and therefore God justly enters and takes possession of it, they having forfeited their lease. It is my land, saith God, and I will make it appear, for they shall be turned off as bad tenants, and be made to know that, though they thought themselves freeholders, they were but tenants at will. Note, It is for the honour of God's justice and holiness that those who go a whoring from God should not be suffered to dwell upon his land; and therefore, sooner or later, the wicked shall be chased out of the world. Or, it is called the Lord's land, because it was the holy land, Immanuel's land, that had peculiar tokens of God's favour to it, and presence in it, where God was known and his name was great, where God's prophets and oracles were; it was a kind of copy of the earthly paradise, and a type of the heavenly one. It was a great privilege to have a lot in such a land as this. It was a great sin and folly to rebel against God, and go a whoring from him in such a land as this; to "deal unjustly in a land of uprightness," Isa. xxvi. 10. And it was a sad and sore judgment to be driven out from such a land as this; it was like driving our first parents out of the garden of Eden, and almost amounted to an exclusion out of the heavenly Canaan. Note, Those cannot expect to dwell in the Lord's land that will not be subject to the Lord's laws, nor be influenced by his love. Those have forfeited the privileges of the church that conform not to the rules of it.

3. That when they are turned out from the Lord's land they shall have no rest or satisfaction in any other land. When Cain was driven out from the presence of the Lord he was a fugitive and a vagabond ever after, and dwelt in the land of trembling. So Israel here; some shall return into Egypt, the old house of bondage. Thither they shall flee from the Assyrians, ch. viii. 13, and they shall lose and ruin themselves there where they thought to hide and help themselves. Others shall be carried captives to Assyria, and there shall be forced to eat unclean things; either, 1st. Such things as were not fit for men to eat, that which is rotten and putrefied; intimating that they shall be reduced to the utmost poverty, as the prodigal, that would fain have filled his belly with the husks. Or, 2nd. Such things as were not fit for Jews to eat, being prohibited by their law. It is probable that while they were in their own land, however disobedient in other things, yet they kept up the distinction of meats, and prided themselves in that; but since they would not keep the law of God in other things, they should not be suffered to keep it in that; and it was a just punishment of their sin in eating things offered to idols. Note, When at any time we suffer in our food, and either through want or for our health are forced to eat or drink that which is unpleasing, we must acknowledge that God is righteous, because we have sinned about our food, and have indulged ourselves too much in that which is pleasing.

4. That in the land of their enemies, to which they shall be driven, they shall have no opportunity either of giving honour to God or obtaining favour with God, by offering any acceptable sacrifice to him. They should not be in a capacity of keeping up any face or show of religion among them. 'And so,' as Dr. Pocock expresseth it, 'it should as it were quite cut off from any expression of relation to him, from all signs of grace and means of reconciliation with him, which would be to them a token of their being rejected of God, estranged from him, and no more owned by him as his people.' 1st. They shall have no sacrifices to offer, nor any altar to offer them on, or priests to offer them. They shall not so much as offer drink offerings to the Lord, much less any other sacrifices. 2nd. If they should offer them, neither they nor their sacrifices shall be pleasing to him, for they cannot have any legal offerings, nor are their hearts humbled. 3rd. Instead of their sacrifices of joy and praise, they shall "eat the bread of mourners;" that is, they shall live desolate and disconsolate, mourning for the death of their relations and their own miseries; so that, if they had opportunity of sacrificing, they should never be themselves in a frame fit for it, for they were forbidden to eat of the holy things in their mourning, Deu. xxvi. 15. All that eat of the bread of mourners are polluted, and incapacitated to partake of the altar. 4th. Their bread for their soul, the bread which they must either eat or starve, the bread that they shall have for the support of their lives, "shall not come into the house of the Lord;" that is, they shall have no house of the Lord to bring it to; or, if they had, it is such as is not fit to be brought, nor are they rightly disposed to bring it. 5th. The return of the days of their sacred and solemn feasts would therefore be very melancholy and uncomfortable to them; ver. 5, "What will ye do in the solemn day;" in the sabbath, the solemn day of every week; in the new moons, the solemn days of every month; at the return of the times for keeping the passover, pentecost and feast of tabernacles, the solemn days of every year, the days of the feast of the Lord. Note, The feasts of the Lord are solemn days, and when we are invited to those feasts we ought to consider seriously what we shall do. But the question is here put to those who were to be deprived of the benefit and comfort of those solemn feasts, What will you do then? You will then spend those days in sorrow and lamentation which, if it had not been your fault, you might have been spending in joy and praise. You will then be made to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and to prize spiritual bread by being made to feel a famine of it. Note, When we enjoy the means of grace we ought to consider what we shall do if ever we should know the want of them; if either they should be taken from us or we be disabled to attend upon them.

5. That they should perish in the land of their dispersion; ver. 6, "For, lo, they are gone out" of the Lord's land, where they might have spent both their sabbath days and other days with comfort; "gone, because of destruction;" gone to Egypt because of the destruction of their own country by the Assyrians, flattering themselves with hopes that they shall return when the storm is over. But those hopes also shall fail them, they shall find there are graves in Egypt, as their murmuring ancestors said, Ex. xiv. 11; graves for them, for "Egypt shall gather them up," as dead men are gathered up and carried forth to the grave; and "Memphis" (one of the chief cities of Egypt) "shall bury them." Gathering and burying are put together, Jer. viii. 2; Job xxvii. 19. Note, Those that think presumptuously to outrun the judgments of God are likely enough to meet their deaths there where they hoped to save their lives.

6. That their land which they left behind, and to which they hoped to return, should become a desolation. As for "their tabernacles," where they formerly dwelt, and where they kept their stores, "the pleasant places for their silver," they shall be demolished and laid in ruins, to that degree that they shall be overgrown with nettles; so that if they should survive the trouble, and return to their own land again, they would find it neither fruitful nor habitable; it would afford them neither food nor lodging. Note, Those that make their money their god reckon the places of their silver their pleasant places, as those that make the Lord their God reckon his tabernacles amiable, and his ordinances their pleasant things, Isa. lxiv. 11. But while the pleasures of communion with God are out of the reach of chance and change, the pleasant places of men's silver which were purchased with silver, or in which they deposited their silver, or which were beautified and adorned with silver, are liable to be laid in ruins, in nettles, and therewith all the pleasure men took in them.

7 The days of visitation are come,
The days of recompence are come;
Israel shall know it:
The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad,
For the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred.
8 The watchman of Ephraim was with my God:
But the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways,
And hatred in the house of his God. [Gibeah:
9 They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Therefore he will remember their iniquity,
He will visit their sins.
10 I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness;
I saw your fathers as the firstripe in the fig tree at her
But they went to Baal-peor, [first time:
And separated themselves unto that shame;
And their abominations were according as they loved.

For their farther awakening it is here threatened,

First. That the destruction spoken of shall come speedily. They shall have no reason to hope for a long reprieve, for the judgment slumbers not, it is at the door; ver. 7, "The days of visitation are come," and there shall be no more delay; "the days of recompence are come," which they have been so often warned to expect. Their prophets have told them destruction would come, and now it is come, and the time of the Divine patience is expired. Note, 1. The day of God's judgment is both a day of visitation, in which men's sins are inquired into and brought to light, and a day of recompence, in which men's doom will be passed, and a reward given to every man according to his work. The strict visitation is in order to a just retribution. 2. This day of visitation and recompence is hasting on apace; it is sure, it is near, as if it were already come.

Secondly. That hereby they should be made ashamed of their sentiments concerning their prophets. When the day of visitation comes, Israel shall know it, shall be made to know that by sad experience which they would not by instruction. Israel shall know then what an evil and bitter thing it is to depart from God, and what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands; "When my hand is lifted up they will not see, but they shall see." Israel shall know the difference between true prophets and false.

1. They shall know then that the pretenders to prophecy, who flattered them in their sins, and rocked them asleep in their security, and told them they should have peace though they went on, however they pretended to be spiritual men, as Ahab's prophets did, 1 Kin. xxii. 24, were fools and madmen, and not true prophets; they deceived themselves, and those to whom they prophesied. But why would God suffer his people Israel to be imposed upon by those false prophets? He answers, It is "for the multitude of thine iniquity," which in contempt of the Divine law thou hast persisted in, and for the great hatred of the true prophets that reproved thee in God's name for it. Note, Because men receive not the love of the truth, but conceive a hatred of it, and by the multitude of their iniquity bid defiance to it, therefore God shall "send them strong delusions to believe a lie," so strong, as that they shall not be undeceived till the day of visitation and recompence comes, which will convince them of the folly and madness of those that seduced them, and of their own folly and madness in suffering themselves to be seduced by them.

2. They shall know then, whether the true prophets, that were really spiritual men, guided by the Spirit of God, were such as they called and counted them, fools and madmen, and shall be convinced they were so far from being so, that they were the wise men of their times, and God's faithful ambassadors to them. When Israel saw that none of Samuel's words fell to the ground, they knew he was "established to be a prophet," 1 Sam. iii. 20; and so here, when God fulfils the word of his messengers by bringing the days of recompence they foretold, then those that despised and ridiculed them, and thought Bedlam the fittest place for them, will be ashamed of the multitude of their iniquities of that kind, and of their great hatred, for which God brings upon them this swift destruction. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was the sin they were punished for, and so made ashamed of.

Thirdly. That hereby the wickedness of the false prophets themselves should be manifested to their shame; ver. 8, "The watchman of Ephraim was with my God;" he had been formerly. They had a set of worthy good ministers that kept close to God, and maintained communion with him, but now they have a race of corrupt, malignant, persecuting prophets, that are the ringleaders of all mischief. Or, the watchman of Ephraim now pretends to have been with my God, and prefaceth his lies with "Thus saith the Lord," but he is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and is cunning to draw the simple into sin, and the upright into trouble; and he is so full of hatred and enmity to goodness and good men that he is become hatred itself "in the house of his God," or, against the house of his God. Note, Wicked prophets are of all other the worst of men; their sins against God are most heinous, and their plots against religion most dangerous. They may boast they are 'watchmen,—speculatores, and as far as speculation goes they may be right, and "with my God," may have their heads full of good notions; but look into their lives, and they are the "snare of a fowler in all their ways," catching for themselves, and making a prey of others; look into their hearts, and they are "hatred in the house of my God," very malicious and spiteful against good ministers and good people. Woe unto thee, O land! unto thee, O church! that hast such watchmen, such prophets; that are seers, but not doers. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'the best things, when corrupted, become the worst.'

Fourthly. That God would now reckon with them for the sins of their fathers, which they had trod in the steps of, ver 9, 10.

1. They were as bad as their fathers. "They have deeply corrupted themselves;" they are rooted and riveted in sin. They are far gone in the depths of Satan, Isa. xxxi. 6, so that it is next to impossible they should be recovered; the stain of their corruption is deep, not to be got out, it is as scarlet and crimson, or as the spots of the leopard; and it is their own fault. They have corrupted themselves, have polluted and hardened their own hearts; as in the days of Gibeah, when the Levite's concubine was abused to death by the men of Gibeah, and the whole tribe of Benjamin patronized the villany; that was a time of deep corruption indeed, and such were the present days. Lewdness and wickedness were as impudent and daring now as in the days of Gibeah; and, therefore, what can be expected but such a vengeance as was then taken on Gibeah. Every tribe is now as bad as the tribe of Benjamin then was, and therefore may expect to be brought as low as that tribe then was.

2. They shall therefore be reckoned with for their fathers' sins; "He will remember their iniquity, and visit their sins;" the iniquity they have by kind and by entail, the sin that runs in the blood. The sin of the fathers shall now be visited upon the children. From hence God takes occasion to upbraid them with the degeneracy and apostacy of their ancestors, their perfidiousness and base ingratitude, ver. 10. Whence observe, 1st. The great honour God put upon Israel when he first formed them into a people. "I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness;" that is, he took as much delight and pleasure in them as a poor traveller would do if he found grapes in a wilderness, where he most needed them, and least expected them. Or, when they were in the wilderness he found them as grapes, not precious in themselves, but precious to him, and pleasant as the first ripe grapes to the lord of the vineyard. They were "precious in his sight and honourable," Isa. xliii. 4; he planted them a "choice vine, a right seed," Jer. ii. 21, and found them no better than he himself made them, good grapes at first. I saw them with pleasure, "as the first ripe in the fig tree at the first time." Good people are compared to the "good things that are first ripe," Jer. xxiv. 2; one then is worth more than many after. This speaks the delight God took in them, and in doing them good, not for their sakes, but because he loved their fathers. He preserved them carefully, as a man doth the first and choicest fruits of his vineyard. Now when he put all this honour upon them, and they stood so fair for preferment, one would think they should have maintained their excellency. But, 2nd. See the great disgrace they put upon themselves. God set them apart for himself as a peculiar people, but they went to Baal-peor, joined with the Moabites in sacrificing to that dirty dunghill deity, Num. xxv. 2, 3, and they "separated themselves unto that shame," that shameful idol,—so Baal-peor was in a particular manner, if, as should seem, the whoredom which the people committed with the daughters of Moab was a part of the service done to Baal-peor. Note, Whatever those separate themselves to that forsake God, it will certainly be a shame to them, first or last. Their abominations are here said to be as they loved, that is, their practices, which are an abomination to God, were as the best beloved of their souls; or, when they had once forsaken God, they multiplied their abominations, their idols, and abominable idolatries, at their pleasure. This was the way of their fathers, God had done well for them, but they had carried it ungratefully towards him; and in the same manner had the present generation deeply corrupted themselves.

17 My God will cast them away,

And they shall be wanderers among the nations.

In the foregoing verses we saw the sin of Israel derived from their fathers, here we see the punishment of Israel derived to their children; for, as death entered by sin at first, so it is still entailed with it. We may observe in these verses.

First. The sin of Ephraim. Some expressions are here which speak that, 1. They did not hearken to God, ver. 17; they did not give attention to the voice either of his word or of his rod; they did not believe what he said, nor would they be ruled by him. He told them their duty, their interest, their danger, but they regarded him not: all he said to them by his words, and by his prophets, was to them as a tale that is told. And then no wonder that we hear, 2. Of "the wickedness of their doings," ver. 15, the downright malice that was in their sins. They were not infirmities, but daring presumptions. How can they but do wickedly who will not hearken to the word of God that would teach and persuade them to do well? And no wonder that there were wicked doings among them, when, 3. Their worship is corrupt; ver. 15, "All their wickedness is in Gilgal," which was a place infamous for idolatry, as appears, ch. iv. 15; xii. 11; Am. iv. 4; v. 5; and it is probable the idolaters chose that place for their head-quarters because it had been famous in other ages for solemn transactions between God and Israel, as Jos. v. 2, 10; 1 Sam. x. 8; xi. 15. There where the source of idolatry was, whence it spread through the kingdom, there it might be said that "all their wickedness" was, for all other wickedness owed its original to that: corruptions in worship make way for corruptions in morals; the mother of harlots is the mother of all other abominations, Rev. xvii. 5. The learned Grotius conjectures that there is a mystical sense here: Golgotha in Syriac is the same with Gilgal in Hebrew, and therefore he thinks this may have reference to the putting of Christ to death at Golgotha, which was the great sin of the Jewish nation, and of which it might truly be said, all their wickedness was summed up in that. And no wonder the people did wickedly, both in worship and conversation, when, 4. "All their princes were revolters;" the whole succession of the kings of the ten tribes did evil in the sight of the Lord; or, all the set of judges and magistrates at this time were wicked,—they turned aside to sinful ways, and persisted in those ways.

Secondly. The displeasure of God against Ephraim for sin. This is variously expressed here, to shew what a provocation sin is to the pure eyes of his glory, and how odious it makes the sinner to him. 1. He departs from them, ver. 12. When they revolt from him, and withdraw from their allegiance to him, how can they expect but that he should depart from them, and withdraw both his protection and his bounty; and well may this threatening be enforced as it is, and made terrible, "Woe also unto them when I depart from them." Note, Those are in a woful condition indeed whom God hath forsaken. Our weal or woe depends upon the gracious presence of God with us, and if he goes all weal goes with him, and all woes come upon us. "God has forsaken him, persecute and take him." Saul knew this when he laid such an accent upon this part of his complaint, "The Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me." Nay, he doth not only depart from them, but, 2. He hates them; In Gilgal, where all their wickedness is, there I hated them. There where the abominations of sin are committed, there God abominates the sinners. In Gilgal he had bestowed many tokens of his favour upon their ancestors, but now that is the place where he hates them for their base ingratitude. Nay, he not only hates them, but, 3. He will love them no more, will never take them into his favour again. The breach between God and Israel is wide as the sea, which cannot be healed. This agrees with what he had said, ch. i. 6, 7, "I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel," the ten tribes. 4. He will discard them, and have no more to do with them; "For the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of my house;" that is, he will no longer own them as his, or as belonging to his family in the world; he will turn them out of doors as unfaithful tenants that pay him no rent, as unprofitable servants that do him neither credit nor work. Note, Those that profane God's house can expect no other but to be expelled his house, and no longer suffered to be either lodgers in it or retainers to it. Nay, he will not only drive them out of his house, but, 5. He will drive them far enough; ver. 17, "My God will cast them away," not only out of his house, but out of his sight; he will quite abandon and reject them, they shall be cast away. God said he would drive them out of his house, and here the prophet seconds it, as one that knew his master's mind very well, "My God will cast them away." See with what comfort and pleasure he calls God his God. Note, When others disown God, and are disowned by him, it is a very great satisfaction to good people that they can call God their God, can cheerfully own him, and see themselves owned by him. All revolters, all ruined, yet God is my God.

Thirdly. The fruit of this displeasure, in the cutting off and abandoning of their posterity, which is the judgment here threatened again and again. Observe here,

1. How numerous Ephraim was likely to be. The name Ephraim is derived from 'fruitfulness,' Gen. xli. 52. Joseph is a 'fruitful bough,' Gen. xlix. 22. And Moses' blessing foretold the "ten thousands of Ephraim," Deut. xxxiii. 17. This was his glory, ver. 11, for this he seemed designed by him that appointed the bounds of men's habitation; "For Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place," to encourage his increase, which one may expect, as from a tree planted by the river's side. Ephraim is as strong and rich as ever Tyre was, and as proud and secure. The Chaldee paraphrase gives this sense of it, 'The congregation of Israel, while they observed the law, was like to Tyrus in prosperity and security.'

2. How few Ephraim should be; ver. 11, "Their glory shall fly away like a bird;" that is, their children shall be taken away, and the hopes of their families cut off. All their glory shall fly "as an eagle towards heaven," swiftly and irrecoverably. Note, Worldly glory is glory that will fly away; but they that have their God their glory have in him an unfading, everlasting glory. Ephraim has been a fruitful tree, but now "Ephraim is smitten," is blasted; "their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit," ver. 16. If the root be dried, the branch must wither of course. Observe,

1st. God's threatening of this judgment of the destroying of their children. First. They shall perish of themselves by the immediate hand of God, ver. 11; they shall fly away, "from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception." Some of their children shall die as soon as they are born, the cradle shall be presently turned into a coffin; others of them shall be still-born, or the womb shall be their grave, and their death there their mothers' too; of others, their mothers shall miscarry almost as soon as they have conceived, and they shall be as untimely fruit. See how easily God can, and how justly we are sure he might, root out the whole race of mankind, that degenerate, guilty, obnoxious race, and blot out the name of it from under heaven; it is but doing as he doth by Ephraim here, writing them all childless, making all their glory to fly away from the birth, the womb, and the conception, drying up their root that they bear no fruit, and their business is done in a few years. Secondly. They shall perish by the hand of their enemies, they shall die violent deaths; ver. 12, "Though they bring up their children" to some maturity, though they escape diseases and deaths, which the infant age is liable to, and are thought to be reared past danger, yet I will bereave them, ver. 12, by one judgment or other, so that there shall not be a man left to build up their families, and bear up their name. Again, ver. 13, "Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer." The mothers shall travail with pain to bear their children, and a deal of care, and pains, and cost, be bestowed upon the nursing of them, and when a cruel enemy comes and puts all to the sword, young and old, without mercy, then they seem but as lambs that were all this while fed for the slaughter. Note, It is a great alloy to the comfort parents have in their children, that they know not what they have brought them forth and brought them up for, perhaps for the murderer, or, which is worse, to be themselves plagues of their generation. It is threatened again, ver. 16, "Though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb," those children that they are most fond of. Note, The parents' love is no security to the children's lives; nay, sometimes death is commissioned to take the darlings of the family, and leave the burthens of it. When sentence was passed upon Israel in the wilderness, that they should all perish there, this mercy was mixed with the wrath, that their children should nevertheless enter into that rest, which they, through unbelief, could not enter into. But this here is a total and final rejection, even their children shall all be cut off, and the land shall escheat to the crown, ob defectum sanguinis,—'shall be lost for want of heirs.' The Chaldee paraphrase, and many of the rabbins, by the murderers to which the children were brought forth, understand those that sacrificed their children to Moloch, a sin which was its own punishment, which shewed the parents void of bowels, and justly left them void of blessings. Thirdly. Those few that escape and remain shall be dispersed, ver. 17, they shall be wanderers among the nations. So the remains of the Jews are at this day, and there is no place in the world where they are a distinct nation.

2nd. The prophet's prayer relating to it; ver. 14, "Give them, O Lord." What shall I give? What shall I ask for a people thus doomed to destruction? It is this: since the decree is gone forth that they must either die from the womb or be brought forth for the murderer, of the two, let them rather die from the womb; rather let them have no children than have them to be made miserable. For the same reason, when a total ruin was coming on the Jewish nation, Christ said, "Blessed is the womb that never bare, and the paps that never gave suck," Lu. xxiii. 29. Give therefore "a miscarrying womb and dry breasts," for it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, whose mercies are great, than into the hands of men. Note, Those that are childless may with this reconcile themselves to the will of God herein, that the time may come when, if they were not so, they would wish they had been so.

CHAPTER X.

In this chapter, I. The people of Israel are charged with gross corruption in the worship of God, and are threatened with the destruction of their images and altars, ver. 1, 2, 5, 6, 8. II. They are charged with corruptions in the administration of the civil government, and are threatened with the ruin of that, ver. 3, 4, 7. III. They are charged with imitating the sins of their fathers, and with security in their own sins, and are threatened with smarting, humbling judgments, ver. 9, 11. IV. They are earnestly invited to repent and reform, and are threatened with ruin if they did not, ver. 12—15.

1 ISRAEL is an empty vine,
He bringeth forth fruit unto himself:
According to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the altars;
According to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images.
2 Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty:
He shall break down their altars,
He shall spoil their images.
3 For now they shall say,
We have no king, because we feared not the LORD;
What then should a king do to us?
4 They have spoken words,
Swearing falsely in making a covenant:
Thus judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field.

HEMLOCK.

5 The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven:
For the people thereof shall mourn over it,
And the priests thereof that rejoiced on it,
For the glory thereof, because it is departed from it.
6 It shall be also carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb:
Ephraim shall receive shame,
And Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel.
7 As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water.
8 The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed:
The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars;
And they shall say to the mountains, Cover us;
And to the hills, Fall on us.

Observe, First. What the sins are which are here laid to Israel's charge, the national sins which bring down national judgments. The prophet deals plainly with them, for what good would it do them to be flattered?

1. They were not fruitful in the fruits of righteousness to the glory of God. Here all their other wickedness began; ver. 1, "Israel is an empty vine." The church of God is fitly compared to a vine, weak, and of an unpromising outside, yet spreading and fruitful. Believers are branches of that vine, and partake of its root and fatness. But this was the character of Israel; they were as an empty vine, a vine that had no sap nor virtue in it, and therefore none of those good fruits produced by it that were expected from it, with which God and man should be honoured. Note, There are many who, though they are not become degenerate vines, yet are empty vines, have no good in them. A vine is, of all trees, least serviceable if it do not bear fruit; it is henceforth good for nothing, Eze. xv. 3, 5. And they that bring forth no grapes will soon come to bring forth wild grapes; they that do no good will do hurt. He is an empty vine, for "he bringeth forth fruit to himself." What good there is in him is not directed to the glory of God, but he takes the praise of it to himself, and prides himself in it. Christians live not to themselves, Rom. xiv. 6, but hypocrites make self their centre; they "eat and drink to themselves," Zec. vii. 5, 6. Or, Israel is by the judgments of God emptied and spoiled of all his wealth, because he made use of it in the service of his lust, and not to the honour of God who gave it him. Note, What we do not rightly employ we may justly expect to be emptied of.

2. They multiplied their altars and images, and the more bountiful God's providence was to them the more prodigal they were in serving their idols; "According to the multitude of his fruit" which his land brought forth "he hath increased the altars, and according to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images." Note, It is a great affront to God, and an abuse of his goodness, when the more mercies we receive from him the more sins we commit against him; and when the more wealth men have the more mischief they do. Should not we be thus abundant in the service of our God, as they were in the service of their idols? As we find our estates increasing we should proportionably abound the more in works of piety and charity.

3. Their hearts were divided, ver. 2. 1st. They were divided among themselves: they were at variance about their idols, some for one, some for another; at variance about their kings, whose separate interests made parties in the kingdom, and in them their very hearts were divided and alienated one from another; and there was no such thing as cordial friendship to be found among them. It follows, therefore, "Now shall they be found faulty." Note, The divisions and animosities of a people are the causes of much sin and the presages of ruin. 2nd. They were divided between God and their idols. They had a remaining affection in their hearts for God, but a reigning affection for their idols; they halted between God and Baal, that was the dividing of their heart. But God is the sovereign of the heart, and he will by no means endure a rival; he will either have all or none. Satan, like the pretended mother, saith, "Let it be neither thine nor mine, but divide it;" but if that be yielded to, God saith, Nay, let him take all. A heart thus divided will be found faulty, and be rejected as treacherous in its covenanting with God. Note, A heart divided between God and mammon, though it may trim the matter so as to appear plausible, yet in the day of discovery it will be found faulty.

4. They made no conscience of what they said and what they did in the most solemn manner, ver. 4. 1st. Not of what they said in swearing, which is the most solemn speaking. "They have spoken words," and words only, for they meant not as they said; they did verba dare,—'give words;' they "swore falsely in making a covenant." They were deceitful in their covenanting with God, the covenant of circumcision, the fair promises they made of reformation, when they were in distress; and no marvel if those that were false to their God were false to all mankind. They contracted such a habit of treachery that they broke through the most sacred bonds, and made nothing of them. Subjects violated their oaths of allegiance, and their kings their coronation oaths; they broke their leagues with the nations they were in alliance with, nor was any conscience made of contracts between private persons. 2nd. Nor of what they did in judgment, which is the most solemn acting. Justice could not take place when men made nothing of forswearing themselves; for thus judgment, which should have been a healing medicinal plant, and of a sweet smell, sprung up as hemlock, which is both nauseous and noxious in the furrows of the field, in the field that was ploughed and furrowed for good corn. Note, God is greatly offended with corruptions, not only in his own worship, but in the administration of justice between man and man; and the dishonesty of a people shall be the ground of his controversy with them, as well as their idolatry and impiety; for God's laws are intended for man's benefit and the good of the community, as well as for God's honour; and the profanation of courts of justice shall be avenged as surely as the profanation of temples.

Secondly. What the judgments are with which Israel should be punished for these sins; they sinned both in civil and religious matters, and in both they shall be punished.

1. They shall have no joy of their kings and of their government. Because justice is turned into oppression, therefore those who are intrusted with the administration of it, and should be blessings to the state, shall be complained of as the burthens of it, ver. 3; and they that would not rule their people well should not be able to protect them. "Now they should say, We have no king," that is, We are as if we had none, we have none to do us any good, or stand us in any stead; none to keep us from destroying ourselves, or being destroyed by our enemies; none to preserve the public peace, or to fight our battles. And justly is this come to us; "Because we feared not the Lord" when we were safe under the protection of our kings, therefore we are rejected by him, and then "what shall a king do for us?" What good can we expect from a king, when we have forfeited the favour of our God? Note, Those that cast off the fear of God are not likely to have joy of any of their creature comforts; nor will men's loyalty to their prince befriend them without religion; for, though that may engage him to be for them, what good will that do them if God be against them? Those that keep themselves in the fear and favour of God may say with triumph, What can the greatest of men do against us? But those that throw themselves out of his protection must say with despair, What can the greatest of men do for us? He was a king that said, "If the Lord do not help thee, whence should I help thee?" Yet he is a fool that saith, If a king cannot help us we must perish, as these intimate here, for God can do that for us which kings cannot. Time was when they doted upon having a king, but now what can a king do for them, who they thought could do any thing? God can make people sick of those creature confidences which they were most fond of. This is their complaint when their king is disabled to help them; yet this is not the worst. Their civil government shall not only be weakened, but quite destroyed; ver. 7, "As for Samaria," the royal city, which is now almost all that is left, "her king is cut off as the foam from the water." The foam swims uppermost, and makes a great show upon the face of the water, yet it is but a heap of bubbles, raised by the troubling of the water. Such were the kings of Israel, after their revolt from the house of David—a mere scum; their government had no foundation. No better are the greatest of kings when they set up in opposition to God. When God comes to contend with them by his judgments, he can as easily disperse and dissolve them, and bring them to nothing, as the froth upon the water.

2. They shall have no joy of their idols, and of their worship of them. And miserable is the case of that people whose gods fail them when their kings do.

1st. The idols they had made, and the altars they had set up in honour of them, should be broken down, and spoiled, and carried away, as common plunder, by the victorious enemy. "He shall break down their altars," God shall do it by the hand of the Assyrian; the Assyrian shall do it by order from God. "He shall spoil their images," ver. 2. Note, What men make idols of it is just with God to break down and spoil. But the calf at Bethel was the sovereign idol; that was it which the inhabitants of Samaria most doted upon. Now it is here foretold that that should be destroyed; "The glory of it is departed from it," ver. 5, when it is thrown down and defaced, no more to be worshipped. But that is not all; "It shall also be carried to Assyria," as some think the calf at Dan was some time before, "for a present to king Jareb." It was carried to him as a rich booty, for it was a golden calf, and probably adorned with the gifts and offerings of its worshippers, and as a trophy of victory over their enemies. And what more glorious trophy could they bring than this, or more incontestable proof of an absolute conquest? Thus it is said, "The sin of Israel shall be destroyed," ver. 8, that is, the idols which they made the matter of their sin; it is said of them, "They became a sin to Israel," 1 Kin. xii. 30. Note, If the grace of God prevail not to destroy the love of sin in us, it is just that the providence of God should destroy the food and fuel of sin about us. With the idols the high places shall be destroyed, the "high places of Aven," that is, Bethaven, ver. 5, or Bethel; it was called the house of God, so Bethel signifies, but now it is called the house of iniquity, nay, iniquity itself. The kings did not, as they ought to have done, take away the high places by the sword of justice, and therefore God will take them away by the sword of war; so that "the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars," that is, they shall lie in ruins. Their altars, while they stood, were as thorns and thistles, offensive to God and good men, and fruits of sin and the curse; justly, therefore, are they buried in thorns and thistles.

2nd. The destruction of their idols, their altars, and their high places shall be the occasion of sorrow and shame and terror to them. First. It shall be an occasion of sorrow to them. When the calf at Bethel is broken the people thereof shall mourn over it. They looked upon the calf to be the protector of their nation, and, when that was gone, thought they must all be undone, which made the poor ignorant people that were deluded into the love of it take on bitterly, as Micah did, Jud. xviii. 25, "Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more?" The priests that had rejoiced in it shall now mourn for it with the people. Note, Whatever men make a god of, they will mourn for the loss of; and inordinate sorrow for the loss of any worldly good is a sign we made an idol of it. They used to be very merry in the worship of their idols, but now they shall mourn over them, for sinful mirth shall sooner or later be turned into mourning. Secondly. It shall be an occasion of shame to them; ver. 6, "Ephraim shall receive shame," when he sees the gods he trusted to carried into captivity; and "Israel shall be ashamed of his counsel," in putting such confidence in them, and paying such adoration to them. God's ark and altars were never thrown down till the people rejected them; but the idolatrous altars were thrown down when the people were doting on them, which shews that the contempt of the former, and the veneration for the latter, were the sins for which God visited. Thirdly. It shall be an occasion of fear to them; ver. 5, "The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear;" they shall be in pain for their gods, and afraid of losing them; or, rather, they shall be in pain for themselves, and their children, and families, when they see the judgment of God breaking in upon them, and beginning with their idols, as he "executed judgment against the gods of Egypt," Ex. xii. 12. Thus idolaters are brought in trembling when God ariseth to shake terribly the earth, Isa. ii. 21. And here, ver. 8, "They shall say to the mountains, Cover us, and to the hills, Fall on us;" the supporters of idolatry, Rev. vi. 15, 16, are brought in calling thus in vain to rocks and mountains to shelter them from God's wrath.

9 O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah:
There they stood:
The battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them.
10 It is in my desire that I should chastise them;
And the people shall be gathered against them,
When they shall bind themselves in their two furrows.
11 And Ephraim is as an heifer that is taught,
And loveth to tread out the corn;
But I passed over upon her fair neck:
I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plow,
And Jacob shall break his clods.
12 Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy;
Break up your fallow ground:
For it is time to seek the LORD,
Till he come and rain righteousness upon you.
13 Ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity;
Ye have eaten the fruit of lies:
Because thou didst trust in thy way,
In the multitude of thy mighty men.
14 Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people,
And all thy fortresses shall be spoiled,
As Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle:
The mother was dashed in pieces upon her children.
15 So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness:
In a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off.

Here, First. They are put in mind of the sins of their fathers and predecessors, for which God would now reckon with them. It was told them, ch. ix. 9, that they had "corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah;" and here, ver. 9, "O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah." Not only the wickedness that was committed in that age is revived in this, and reacted, a copy from that original, but the wickedness that was committed in that age hath been continued in a constant series and succession through all the intervening ages down to this; so that the measure of iniquity hath been long in filling, and still there had been made additions to it. Or, 'Thou hast sinned more than in the days of Gibeah,' so it may be read; the sins of this age exceed those of the worst of former ages. The case was bad then, for there they stood, the criminals stood in their own defence, and the tribes of Israel, who undertook to chastise them for their wickedness, were at a stand, when both in the first and in the second battle the malefactors were the victors; and "the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them" till the third engagement, and then did not overtake them all, for six hundred made their escape. But thy sin is worse than theirs, and therefore thou canst not expect but that the "battle against the children of iniquity" should overtake thee and overcome thee.

Secondly. They have warning given them, fair warning, of the judgments of God that were coming upon them, ver. 10. God had hitherto pitied and spared them; though they had been very provoking, he had a mind to try whether they would be wrought upon by patience and forbearance; but now "it is in my desire that I should chastise them," that is, It is what I have a purpose of, and will take pleasure in. He will "rejoice over them to do them hurt," Deu. xxviii. 63. Note, Because God doth not desire the death and ruin of sinners, therefore he doth desire their chastisement. And see what the chastisement is, "The people shall be gathered against them," as all the other tribes were against Benjamin in the battle of Gibeah. One of the rabbins thus descants upon it, 'Because they receive not chastisement from me by my prophets, who in my name rebuke them, I will chastise them by the hands of the people which shall be gathered against them,' "when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows," that is, when they shall think to fortify themselves as it were within a double intrenchment. Or, 'When I shall bind them for their two transgressions,' so the margin reads it, meaning their corporal and spiritual whoredom, which they are often charged with, or the two calves at Dan and Bethel, or those two great evils mentioned Jer. ii. 13. Or, 'When I shall bind them to their two furrows;" that is, bring them into servitude to the Assyrians, who shall keep them under the yoke, as oxen in the plough, who are bound to the two furrows, up the field and down it, and dare not, for fear of the goad, stir a step out of them. The Chaldee saith, 'Those that are gathered against them shall exercise dominion over them, in like manner as a pair of heifers are tied to their two furrows.' Thus, they that would not be God's freemen shall be their enemies' slaves, and shall be made to know the difference between God's service and the service of the kingdoms of the countries, 2 Chr. xii. 8.

Thirdly. They are made to know that their unacquaintedness with sufferings and hardships should not excuse them from a very miserable captivity, ver. 11. See how nice and tender and delicate Ephraim is; he is "as an heifer that is taught to tread out the corn," and loves that work, because, being not to be muzzled, she has liberty to eat at pleasure; and the work itself was dry and easy, and both its own diversion and its own wages. But, saith God, I have a yoke to put upon her fair neck, as fair as it is; "I will make Ephraim to ride," that is, I will tame them, or cause them to be ridden by the Assyrians and other conquerors that shall rule them with rigour, as men do the beasts they ride upon, Ps. lxvi. 12; and Judah too shall be made to plough, and Jacob "to break the clods," that is, they shall be used hardly, but not so hardly as Ephraim. Note, It is just with God to make those know what hardship means that indulge themselves too much in their own ease and pleasure. The learned Dr. Pocock inclines to another sense of these words, as speaking the tender gentle methods God took with this people to bring them into obedience to his law, as a reason why they should return to that obedience. He had managed them as the husbandman doth his cattle that he trains up for service. Ephraim being a docible heifer, fit to be employed, God took hold of "her fair neck," to accustom her to hand; harnessed her, or put the yoke of his commandments upon her; gave his people Israel a law, that being trained up in his institutions they might not be tempted by the usages of the heathen. He had used all fair and likely means with them to keep them in their obedience, and set Judah to plough, and Jacob to break the clods, and employed them in the observance of precepts proper for them; and yet they would not be retained in their obedience, but started aside.

Fourthly. They are invited and encouraged to return to God by prayer, repentance, and reformation, ver. 12, 13. See here,

1. The duties they are called to. They are God's husbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9; and the duties are expressed in language borrowed from the husbandman's calling. If they would not be brought into bondage by their oppressors, let them return to God's service. 1st. Let them break up the fallow ground; let them cleanse their hearts from all corrupt affections and lusts, which are as weeds and thorns, and let them be humbled for their sins, and be of a broken and contrite spirit in the sense of them; let them be full of sorrow and shame at the remembrance of them, and prepare to receive the Divine precepts, as the ground that is ploughed is to receive the seed, that it may take root: see Jer. iv. 3. 2nd. Let them sow to themselves in righteousness, that is, let them return to the practice of good works according to the law of God, which is the rule of righteousness. Let them abound in works of piety towards God, and of justice and charity towards one another, and herein let them sow to the spirit, as the apostle speaks, Gal. vi. 7, 8. Every action is seed sown; let them sow in righteousness, that is, let them sow what they should sow, do what they should do, and they themselves shall have the benefit of it. 3rd. Let them seek the Lord, that is, let them look up to him for his grace, and beg of him to bless the seed sown. The husbandman must plough and sow with an eye to God, asking of him rain in the season thereof.

2. The argument used for the pressing of these duties. Consider, 1st. It is time to do it,—it is high time. The husbandman sows in seed time, and if that time be far spent he applies himself to it with the more diligence. Note, Seeking the Lord is to be every day's work; but there are some special occasions given by the providence and grace of God, when it is in a particular manner time to seek him. 2nd. If we do our part, God will do his. If we sow to ourselves in righteousness, that is, if we be careful and diligent to do our duty in a dependence upon his grace, he will shower down his grace upon us, will rain righteousness, the very thing that they need most who are to sow in righteousness; for by the grace of God we are what we are. Some apply it to Christ, who should come in the fulness of time, and for whose coming they must prepare themselves. He shall come as the Lord our righteousness, and shall rain righteousness upon us, that everlasting righteousness which he had brought in; he will grant us of it abundantly. It is foretold, Ps. lxxii. 6, that "he shall come down like rain." 3rd. If we sow in righteousness, we shall reap in mercy, which agrees with that promise, if we "sow to the Spirit," we shall "of the Spirit reap life everlasting." We shall reap according to the measure of mercy, so the word is; it shall be a great reward, according to the riches of mercy; such a reward, not as becomes such mean creatures as we are to receive, but as becomes a God of infinite mercy to give; a reward, not of debt, but of grace. We reap not in merit, but in mercy; it is what is sown. God giveth a body as it has pleased him. 4th. We have "ploughed wickedness, and reaped iniquity," and the time passed of our life may suffice that we have done so, ver. 13. You have taken a great deal of pains in the service of sin, have laboured at it in the very fire; and will you grudge to bear the burthen and heat of the day in God's service, and in doing that which will be for your own advantage? You have done much to damn your souls,—will you not undo it again, and do something to save them? 5th. We never got any thing in the service of sin. They have ploughed wickedness, that is, they have done the drudgery of sin, and they have reaped iniquity, that is, they have got all that is to be got by it; they have carried it on to the harvest; and what the better? It is all a cheat, they have "eaten the fruit of lies;" that is, fruit that is but a lie, which looks fair, but is rotten within. The works of darkness are "unfruitful works," Eph. v. 11; Rom. vi. 21. Even the gains of sin yield the sinner no satisfaction. 6th. As our comforts, so our confidences, in the service of sin will certainly fail us. "Thou didst trust in thy ways, in the multitude of thy mighty men;" that is, Thou hast stayed thyself upon creatures, thy own power and policy, and therefore hast ventured to plough wickedness, and thy hopes have deceived thee. Come therefore and seek the Lord, and thy hope in him shall not deceive thee.

Fifthly. They are threatened with utter destruction, both for their carnal practices and for their carnal confidences; ver. 14, 15, Therefore because thou hast sown wickedness, and trusted in thy own way, "a tumult shall arise among thy people," either by insurrections at home or invasions from abroad, either of which will put a kingdom into confusion and make a noise, much more both together.

1. Their cities and strongholds shall be a prey to the enemy. The fortresses which they confided in, and in which they had laid up their effects, shall be seized and rifled, "as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle." This refers to some event that had lately happened, not elsewhere recorded. And probably Shalman is the same with Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, who had lately put some town, or castle, or house, (Beth-arbel is 'the house of Arbel,') under military execution, which perhaps he used with severity in the beginning of his conquests, to terrify other garrisons into a speedy surrender at the first summons. God tells them that thus Samaria should be spoiled.

2. The inhabitants shall be put to the sword, as it was at Beth-arbel, when it was taken; "The mother was dashed in pieces upon her children," that is, they were both dashed in pieces together by the fury of the soldiers. See what cruel work war makes; jusque datum sceleri,—'wickedness has free course.' It is strange that any of the human race could be so inhuman; but see what comes of sin, homo homini lupus,—'man is a wolf to man;" and then, homo homini agnus,—'man is a lamb to man.'

3. Even royal blood shall be mingled with common gore. "In a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off," ver. 15. Hoshea was the last king of Israel, in him the whole kingdom was cut off, and came to a period; it may refer either to him, or to some of his predecessors that were cut off by treachery. It shall be done "in a morning," in a very little time, as suddenly as the dawning of the morning. Or, 'at the time appointed,' for the morning comes punctually at its time. Or, 'in the morning,' when they think the night of calamity is over, and expect a returning day, then shall all their hopes be dashed by the sudden cutting off of their king, ver. 7. Kings, though gods to us, are men to God, and shall die like men. And, lastly, What doth all this desolation owe its rise to? What is the spring of this bloodshed? He tells us, ver. 15, "So shall Bethel do unto you." Bethel was the place where one of the calves was; Gilgal, where all their wickedness is said to have been, was hard by. There was their great wickedness, the evil of their evil, so the word is; the sum and quintessence of their sin, and that was it that did this to them, that made all this havoc, for that was it that provoked God to bring it upon them. He doth not say, So shall the king of Assyria do to you, but so shall Bethel do to you. Note, Whatever mischief is done to us, it is sin that doth it. Are the fortresses spoiled? are the women and children murdered? is the king cut off? it is sin that doth all this. It is sin that ruins soul, body, estate, all; "So shall Bethel do unto you." It is thy own wickedness that corrects thee, and thy backslidings that reprove thee.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter we have, I. The great goodness of God towards his people Israel, and the great things he had done for them, ver. 1, 3, 4. II. Their ungrateful carriage towards him, notwithstanding his favours toward them, ver. 2—4, 7, 12. III. Threatenings of wrath against them for their ingratitude and treachery, ver. 5, 6. IV. Mercy remembered in the midst of wrath, ver. 8, 9. V. Promises of what God would do for them, ver. 10 11. VI. An honourable character given of Judah, ver. 12.

WHEN Israel was a child, then I loved him,
And called my son out of Egypt.
2 As they called them, so they went from them:
They sacrificed unto Baalim,
And burned incense to graven images.
3 I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms;
But they knew not that I healed them.
4 I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love:
And I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws,
And I laid meat unto them.
5 He shall not return into the land of Egypt,
But the Assyrian shall be his king,
Because they refused to return.
6 And the sword shall abide on his cities,
And shall consume his branches, and devour them,
Because of their own counsels.
7 And my people are bent to backsliding from me:
Though they called them to the most High,
None at all would exalt him.

Here we find,

First. God very gracious to Israel. They were a people for whom he had done more than for any people under heaven, and to whom he had given more; which they are here, I will not say upbraided with, (for God gives and upbraids not,) but put in mind of as an aggravation of their sin, and an encouragement to repentance.

1. He had a kindness for them when they were young; ver. 1, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him." When they first began to multiply into a nation in Egypt, God then "set his love upon them," and "chose them, because he loved them," because he would love them, Deu. vii. 7, 8. When they were weak and helpless as children, foolish and froward as children, when they were outcasts, and children exposed, then God loved them, that is, he pitied them, and testified his goodwill to them. He bore them as the nurse doth the sucking child, nourished them, and suffered their manners. Note, Those that are grown up, nay, those that are grown old, ought often to reflect upon the goodness of God to them in their childhood.

2. He delivered them out of the house of bondage; "I called my son out of Egypt," because a son, because a beloved son. When God demanded Israel's discharge from Pharaoh, he called them his son, firstborn. Note, Those whom God loves he calls out of the bondage of sin and Satan into the glorious liberty of his children. These words are said to have been fulfilled in Christ, when upon the death of Herod he and his parents were called out of Egypt, Mat. ii. 15; so that the words have a double aspect, speaking historically of the calling of Israel out of Egypt, and prophetically of the bringing of Christ thence; and the former was a type of the latter, and a pledge and earnest of the many and great favours God had in reserve for that people, especially the sending of his son into the world, and bringing him again into the land of Israel, when they had unkindly driven him out, and he might justly never have returned. The calling of Christ out of Egypt was a figure of the calling of all that are his, through him, out of spiritual slavery.

3. He gave them a good education, took care of them, took pains with them, not only as a father or tutor, but, such is the condescension of Divine grace, as a mother or nurse; ver. 3, "I taught Ephraim also to go," as a child in leading-strings is taught. When they were in the wilderness, God led them by the pillar of cloud and fire, shewed them the way in which they should go, and bore them up, "taking them by the arms;" he taught them to go in the way of his commandments, by the institutions of the ceremonial law, which were as tutors and governors to that people under age. He took them by the arms to guide them that they might not stray, and to hold them up that they might not stumble and fall. God's spiritual Israel are thus supported; "Thou hast holden me by my right hand," Ps. lxxiii. 23.

4. When any thing was amiss with them, or they were never so little out of order, he was their physician; "I healed them." Not only took a tender care of them,—a friend may do that; but wrought an effectual cure,—it is God only that can do that: "I am the Lord that healeth thee," Ex. xv. 26, that redress all thy grievances.

5. He brought them into his service by mild and gentle methods; ver. 4, "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love." Note, It is God's work to draw poor souls to himself; and none can come to him except he draw them, Jno. vi. 44. He draws, 1st. With "the cords of a man," with such cords as men draw with that have a principle of humanity; or such cords as men are drawn with. He dealt with them as men, in an equitable rational way, in an easy gentle way, with the cords of Adam. He dealt with them as with Adam in innocency, bringing them at once into paradise, and into covenant with himself. 2nd. "With bands of love," or, 'cart-ropes of love;' this word signifies stronger cords than the former. He did not drive them by force into his service, whether they would or no, nor rule them with rigour, or detain them by violence; but his attractives were all loving and endearing, all sweet and gentle, that he might overcome them with kindness. Moses, whom he made their guide, was the meekest man in the world. Kindnesses among men we commonly call obligations, or bonds, bonds of love. Thus God "draws with the savour of his good ointments," Cant. i. 4; draws "with lovingkindness," Jer. xxxi. 3. Thus God deals with us, and we must deal in like manner with those that are under our instruction and government; deal rationally, and deal mildly with them.

6. He eased them of the burthens they had been long groaning under. "I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws," alluding to the care of the good husbandman that is merciful to his beast, and will not tire him with hard and constant labour. Probably in those times the yoke on the neck of the oxen was fastened with some bridle or headstall over the jaws, which muzzled the mouth of the ox. Israel in Egypt were thus restrained from the enjoyment of their comforts, and constrained to hard labour; but God eased them, "removed their shoulder from the burthen," Ps. lxxxi. 6. Note, Liberty is a great mercy, especially out of bondage.

7. He supplied them with food convenient. In Egypt they fared hard; but, when God brought them out, he laid meat unto them, as the husbandman, when he has unyoked his cattle, fodders them. God rained manna about their camp, bread from heaven, angels' food. Other creatures seek their meat, but God laid meat to his own people, as we do to our children; was himself their caterer and carver, prevented them with the blessings of goodness.

Secondly. Here is Israel very ungrateful to God:

1. They were deaf and disobedient to his voice. He spake to them by his messengers, Moses and his other prophets, called them from their sins, called them to himself, to their work and duty, but, as they called them, so they went from them; they rebelled in those particular instances wherein they were admonished. The more pressing and importunate the prophets were with them, to persuade them to that which was good, the more refractory they were, and the more resolute in their evil ways, disobeying for disobedience sake. This foolishness is bound in the hearts of children, who, as soon as they are taught to go, will go from those that call them.

2. They were fond of idols, and worshipped them. They sacrificed to Baalim; first one Baal, and then another, and burnt incense to graven images, though they were called to by the prophets of the Lord again and again not to do this abominable thing which he hated. Idolatry was the sin which from the beginning, and all along, had most easily beset them.

3. They were regardless of God, and of his favour to them. "They knew not that I healed them." They looked only at Moses and Aaron, the instruments of their relief, and, when any thing was amiss, quarrelled with them; but looked not through them to God who employed them. Or, when God corrected them, and kept them under a severe discipline, they understood not that it was for their good, and that God thereby healed them, and it was necessary for the perfecting of their cure; else they would have been better reconciled to the methods God took. Note, Ignorance is at the bottom of ingratitude, ch. ii. 8.

4. They were strongly inclined to apostasy. This is the blackest article in the charge; ver. 7, "My people are bent to backsliding from me." Every word here is aggravating, 1st. They backslide. There is no hold of them, no stedfastness in them; they seem to come forwards towards God, but presently they slide back again, and are as a deceitful bow. 2nd. They backslide from me, from God, the chief good, the fountain of life and living waters; from their God, their owner, ruler and benefactor; from God, who never turned from them, nor was a wilderness to them. 3rd. They are "bent to backslide." They are ready to sin, there is in their natures a propensity to that which is evil. At the best they hang in suspense between God and the world, so that a little thing serves to draw them the wrong way; they are forward to close with every temptation. It also intimates that they are resolute in sin, their hearts are fully set in them to do evil. The bias is strong that way, and they persist in their backslidings, whatever is said or done to stop them. And yet, 4th. They are in profession my people; they are called by my name, and profess relation to me. They are mine whom I have done much for, and expect much from, whom I have nourished and brought up as children, and yet they backslide from me. Note, In our repentance we ought to lament not only our backslidings, but our bent to backslide; not only our actual transgressions, but our original corruption, the sin that dwells in us, the carnal mind.

5. They were strangely averse to repentance and reformation. Here are two expressions for that, 1st. "They refused to return," ver. 5. So much were they bent to backslide, that, though they could not but find upon trial the folly of their backslidings, and that when they forsook God they changed for the worse, yet they went on frowardly; "I have loved strangers, and after them I will go." They were commanded to return, were courted and entreated to return, were promised that if they would they should be kindly received, but they refused.

2nd. Though "they called them to the Most High." God's prophets and ministers called them to return to the God from whom they had revolted, to the most high God, from whom they had sunk into this wretched degeneracy. They called them from the worship of the idols that were so much below them, and the worship of whom was therefore their disparagement, to the true God, that was so much above them, and the worship of whom was therefore their preferment. They called them from this earth to high and heavenly things; but they called in vain; none at all would exalt him. Though he be the most high God, they would not acknowledge him to be so, would do nothing to honour him, nor give him the glory due to his name. Or, they would not exalt themselves, would not rise out of that state of apostasy and misery into which they had precipitated themselves; but there contentedly lay still, would not lift up their heads nor lift up their souls. Note, God's faithful ministers have taken a great deal of pains to no purpose with backsliding children, have called them to the Most High, but none would stir, none at all would exalt him.

Thirdly. Here is God very angry, and justly so, with Israel. See what are the tokens of God's displeasure with which they are here threatened.

1. God, that brought them out of Egypt to take them for a people to himself, since they would not be faithful to him, shall bring them into a worse condition than he at first found them in; ver. 5, "He shall not return unto the land of Egypt," though that was a house of bondage, grievous enough; but he shall go into a harder service, for the Assyrian shall be his king, who will use them worse than ever Pharaoh did. They shall not return into Egypt, which lies near, where they may hear often from their own country, and whence they may hope shortly to return to it again; but they shall be carried into Assyria, that lies much more remote, and where they shall be cut off from all correspondence with their own land and from all hopes of returning to it, and justly, because they refused to return. Note, Those that will not return to the duties they have left cannot expect to return to the comforts they have lost.

2. God, that gave them Canaan, that good land, and a very safe and comfortable settlement in it, shall bring his judgments upon them there, which shall make their habitation unsafe and uncomfortable, ver. 6. The sword shall come upon him, the sword of war, the sword of a foreign enemy, prevailing against them, and triumphing over them. 1st. This judgment shall spread far. The sword shall fasten upon his cities, those nests of people and storehouses of wealth. It shall likewise reach to his branches, the country villages, so some; the citizens themselves, so others; or the bars (so the word signifies) and gates of their city; or, all the branches of their revenue and wealth; or their children, the branches of their families. 2nd. It shall last long. It shall abide on their cities. David thought three months' flying before his enemies was the only judgment of the three that was to be excepted against; but this sword here shall abide much longer than that on the cities of Israel. They continued their rebellions against God, and therefore God continued his judgments on them. 3rd. It shall make a full end. It shall "consume his branches," and devour them, and lay all waste, and this "because of their own counsels," that is, because they would have their own way, both in worship and conversation; would do as they list, and pursue their own projects, which God, therefore, in a way of righteous judgment, gave them up to. Note, The confusion of sinners is owing to their contrivance. God's counsels would have saved them, but their own counsels ruin them.

8 How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?
How shall I deliver thee, Israel?
How shall I make thee as Admah?
How shall I set thee as Zeboim?
Mine heart is turned within me,
My repentings are kindled together.
9 I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger,
I will not return to destroy Ephraim:
For I am God, and not man;
The Holy One in the midst of thee:
And I will not enter into the city.
10 They shall walk after the LORD:
He shall roar like a lion:
When he shall roar, [west.

11 They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt,
And as a dove out of the land of Assyria:
And I will place them in their houses,
saith the LORD.
12 Ephraim compasseth me about with lies,
And the house of Israel with deceit:
But Judah yet ruleth with God,
And is faithful with the saints.

DOVES.

In these verses we have,

First. God's wonderful backwardness to destroy Israel; ver. 8, 9, "How shall I give thee up?" Here observe,

1. God's gracious debate within himself concerning Israel's case; a debate between justice and mercy, in which victory plainly inclines to mercy's side. Be astonished, O heavens! at this, and wonder, O earth! at the glory of God's goodness. Not that there are any such struggles in God as there are in us, or that he is ever fluctuating or unresolved; no, he is in one mind, and knows it. But they are expressions after the manner of men, designed to shew what severity the sin of Israel had deserved, and yet how Divine grace would be glorified in sparing them notwithstanding. The connexion of this with what goes before is very surprising. It was said of Israel, ver. 7, that they were bent to backslide from God; that though they were called to him yet they would not exalt him. Upon which one would think it should have followed, Now I am determined to destroy them, and never shew them mercy more. No, such is the sovereignty of mercy, such the freeness, the fulness of Divine grace, that it follows immediately, "How shall I give them up?" See here, 1st. The proposals that justice makes concerning Israel, the suggestion of which is here implied. Let Ephraim be given up, as an incorrigible son is given up to be disinherited, as an incurable patient is given over by his physician. Let him be given up to ruin, let Israel be delivered into the enemy's hand, as a lamb to the lion to be torn in pieces. Let them be made as Admah, and set as Zeboim, the two cities that with Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by fire and brimstone, rained from heaven upon them. Let them be utterly and irreparably ruined, and be made as like these cities in desolation as they have been in sin. Let that curse which is written in the law be executed upon them, that the whole land shall be "brimstone and salt, like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim," Deu. xxix. 23. Ephraim and Israel deserve to be thus abandoned, and God doth them no wrong if he deal thus with them. 2nd. The opposition that mercy makes to these proposals. How shall I do so? As the tender father reasons with himself, How can I cast off my untoward son? for he is my son, though he be untoward; how can I find in my heart to do it? Thus Ephraim has been a dear son, a pleasant child, how can I do it? He is ripe for ruin, judgments stand ready to seize him, there wants nothing but giving him up, but I cannot do it. They have been a people near unto me; there are yet some good among them; they are the children of the covenant: if they be ruined, the enemy will triumph. It may be they will yet repent and reform, and therefore how can I do it? Note, The God of heaven is slow to anger, and is especially loth to abandon a people to utter ruin that have been in special relation to him. See how mercy works upon the mention of those severe proceedings; "Mine heart is turned within me," as we say our heart fails us when we come to do a thing that is against the grain with us. God speaks as if he were conscious to himself of a strange striving of affections in compassion to Israel, as Lam. i. 20, "My bowels are troubled, my heart is turned within me." As it follows here, "My repentings are kindled together;" that is, his bowels yearned towards them, and his soul was grieved for their sin and misery, Jud. x. 16: compare Jer. xxxi. 20, "Since I spake against him my bowels are troubled for him." When God was to give up his Son to be a sacrifice for sin, and a Saviour for sinners, he did not say, How shall I give him up? No, he spared not his own Son; it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and therefore God spared not him, that he might spare us. But this is only the language of the day of his patience; but when men have sinned that away, and the great day of his wrath comes, then no difficulty is made of it; nay, "I will laugh at their calamity."

2. His gracious determination of this debate. After a long contest, mercy in the issue rejoiceth against judgment, has the last word, and carries the day, ver. 9. It is decreed the reprieve shall be lengthened out yet longer, and "I will not" now "execute the fierceness of mine anger," though I am angry. Though they shall not go altogether unpunished, yet he will mitigate the sentence, and abate the rigour of it. He will shew himself to be justly angry, but not implacably so; they shall be corrected, but not consumed. "I will not return to destroy Ephraim;" that is, the judgments that have been inflicted shall not be repeated, shall not go so deep as they have deserved. He will not return to destroy, as soldiers, when they have pillaged a town once, return a second time to take more, as when "what the palmerworm has left the locust has eaten." It is added in the close of the verse, "I will not enter into the city," into Samaria, or any other of their cities; I will not enter into them as an enemy, utterly to destroy them and lay them waste, as Admah and Zeboim were.

3. The ground and reason of this determination; "For I am God, and not man," the Holy One of Israel. To encourage them to hope that they shall find mercy, consider, 1st. What he is in himself. He is God, and not man; as in other things, so in pardoning sin, and sparing sinners. If they had offended a man like themselves, he would not, he could not, have borne it; his passion would have overpowered his compassion, and he would have executed the fierceness of his anger. But "I am God, and not man." He is Lord of his anger, whereas man's anger commonly lords it over them. If an earthly prince were in such a strait between justice and mercy, he would be at a loss how to compromise the matter between them; but he who is God, and not man, knows how to find out an expedient to secure the honour of his justice, and yet advance the honour of his mercy. Man's compassions are nothing in comparison with the tender mercies of our God, whose thoughts and ways in receiving returning sinners are as much above ours as heaven is above the earth, Isa. lv. 9. Note, It is a great encouragement to our hope in God's mercies to remember that he is God, and not man. He is the Holy One. One would think this were a reason why he should reject such a provoking people. No, God knows how to spare and pardon poor sinners, not only without any reproach to his holiness, but very much to the honour of it; as he is "faithful and just to forgive us our sins," and therein declares his righteousness, now Christ has purchased the pardon and he hath promised it. 2nd. What he is to them. He is the Holy One in the midst of thee; that is, his holiness is engaged for the good of his church; and even in this corrupt, degenerate land and age there were some that gave thanks at the remembrance of his holiness, and he required of them all to be "holy as he is," Lev. xix. 2. As long as we have the Holy One in the midst of us, we are safe and well; but woe to us when he leaves us. Note, Those who submit to the influence may take the comfort of God's holiness.

Secondly. Here is his wonderful forwardness to do good for Israel, which appears in this, that he will qualify them to receive the good he designs for them; ver. 10, 11, "They shall walk after the Lord." This respects the same favour with that, ch. iii. 5, "They shall return, and seek the Lord their God." It is spoken of the ten tribes, and had its accomplishment in part in the return of some of them with those of the two tribes in Ezra's time; but it had its more full accomplishment in God's spiritual Israel, the gospel church, brought together and incorporated by the Gospel of Christ. The ancient Jews referred it to the time of the Messiah. The learned Dr. Pocock looks upon it as a prophecy of Christ's coming to preach the Gospel to the dispersed remnant of Israel, the children of God that were scattered abroad. And then observe,

1. How they were to be called and brought together. The Lord "shall roar like a lion." The word of the Lord, (so saith the Chaldee,) shall be as a lion that roars. Christ is called "The word of the Lion of the tribe of Judah;" and his Gospel, in the beginning of it, was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness." When Christ cried with a loud voice, it was as "when a lion roared," Rev. x. 3. The voice of the Gospel was heard afar, as the roaring of a lion, and it was a mighty voice: see Joel iii. 16.

2. What impression this call should make upon them. Such an impression as the roaring of a lion makes upon all beasts of the forest. "When he shall roar, then the children shall tremble:" see Am. iii. 8, "The lion has roared;" that is, the Lord hath spoken, and then "who will not fear?" When they whose hearts the Gospel reached trembled and were astonished, and cried out, What shall we do? when they were by it put upon working out their salvation, and worshipping God with fear and trembling, then this promise was fulfilled, "The children shall tremble from the west." The dispersed Jews were carried eastward to Assyria and Babylon, and those that returned came from the East; therefore this seems to have reference to the calling of the Gentiles, that lay westward from Canaan, for that way especially the Gospel spread. They shall tremble; that is, they shall move and come with trembling, with care and haste, from the west, from the nations that lay that way, to the mountain of the Lord, Isa. ii. 3, to the gospel Jerusalem, upon hearing the alarm of the Gospel. The apostle speaks of "mighty signs and wonders" that were wrought by the preaching of the Gospel from "Jerusalem round about to Illyricum," Rom. xv. 19. Then the children trembled from the west. And whereas Israel after the flesh was dispersed in Egypt and Assyria, it is promised that they shall be effectually summoned from thence; ver. 11, "They shall tremble;" that is, they shall come trembling, and with all haste, as a bird upon the wing out of Egypt, and "as a dove out of the land of Assyria." A dove is noted for swift and constant flight, especially when she flies to her windows, which the flocking of Jews and Gentiles to the church is here compared to, as it is Isa. lx. 8. Wherever they are that belong to the election of grace, east, west, north, or south, they shall hear the joyful sound, and be wrought upon by it. They of Egypt and Assyria shall come together, those that lie most remote from each other shall meet in Christ, and be incorporated in the church. Of the uniting of Egypt and Assyria, it was prophesied, Isa. xix. 23.

3. What effect these impressions should have upon them. Being moved with fear, they shall flee to the ark; they "shall walk after the Lord," after 'the service of the Lord,' so the Chaldee. They shall take the Lord Christ for their leader and commander, they shall lift themselves under him as the Captain of their salvation, and give up themselves to the conduct of the Spirit as their guide by the word. They shall leave all to follow Christ, as becomes disciples. Note, Our holy trembling at the word of Christ will drive us to him, not drive us from him. When he roars like a lion, the slaves tremble and flee from him, the children tremble and flee to him.

4. What entertainment they shall meet with at their return; ver. 11, "I will place them in their houses;" that is, all those that come at the gospel call shall have a place and a name in the gospel church; in the particular churches, which are their houses to which they pertain. They shall dwell in God, and be at home in him; both easy and safe, as a man in his own house. They shall have mansions, for there are many in our Father's house, in his tabernacle on earth and his temple in heaven, in everlasting habitations, which may be called their houses; for they are the lot they shall stand in at the end of the days.

Thirdly. Here is a sad complaint of the treachery of Ephraim and Israel, which may be an intimation that it is not Israel after the flesh, but the spiritual Israel, to whom the foregoing promises belong; for as for this Ephraim, this Israel, they compass God about with lies and deceit; that is, all their services of him, when they pretended to compass his altar, were feigned and hypocritical. When they surrounded him with their prayers and praises, every one having a petition to present to him, they lied to him with their mouth, and flattered him with their tongue; their pretensions were so fair, and yet their intentions so foul, that they would, if possible, have imposed upon God himself. Their professions and promises were all a cheat, and yet with these they thought to compass God about, to inclose him in as it were, to keep him among them, and prevent his leaving them.

Fourthly. Here is a pleasant commendation of the integrity of the two tribes, which they yet held fast; and which comes in as an aggravation of the perfidiousness of the ten tribes, and a reason why God had that mercy in store for Judah which he had not for Israel, ch. i. 6, 7; for "Judah yet rules with God, and is faithful with the saints," or, with the Most Holy. 1. Judah rules with God, that is, he serves God; and the service of God is not only true liberty and freedom, but it is dignity and dominion. Judah rules, that is, the princes and governors of Judah rule with God; that is, they use their power for him, for his honour, and the support of his interest. Those rule with God that rule in the fear of God, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3; and it is their honour to do so, and their praise shall be of God, as Judah's here is. Judah is Israel, a prince with God. 2. He is faithful with the holy God, keeps close to his worship and to his saints, to his priests, to his people. "Faithful with the saints;" that is, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whose steps they faithfully tread in. They walk in the way of good men, and those that do so rule with God; they have a mighty interest in heaven. Judah yet doth thus, which intimates that the time would come when Judah also would revolt and degenerate. Note, When we see how many there are that compass God about with lies and deceit, yet it may be a comfort to us to think that God has his remnant, that cleave to him with purpose of heart, and are faithful to his saints; and for those who are thus faithful unto death is reserved a crown of life, when hypocrites and all liars shall have their portion without.

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter we have, I. A high charge drawn up both against Israel and Judah for their sins, which were the ground of God's controversy with them, ver. 1, 2; particularly the sin of fraud and injustice which Ephraim is charged with, ver. 7; and justifies himself in, ver. 8; and the sin of idolatry, ver. 11, by which God is provoked to contend with them, ver. 14. II. The aggravations of the sins they are charged with, taken from the honour God put upon their father Jacob, ver. 3—5; the advancement of them into a people from low and mean beginnings, ver. 12, 13; and the provision he had made them of helps for their souls by the prophets he sent them, ver. 10. III. A call to the unconverted to turn to God, ver. 6. IV. An intimation of mercy that God had in store for them, ver. 9.

EPHRAIM feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east
He daily increaseth lies and desolation; [wind:
And they do make a covenant with the Assyrians,
And oil is carried into Egypt.
2 The LORD hath also a controversy with Judah,
And will punish Jacob according to his ways;
According to his doings will he recompense him.
3 He took his brother by the heel in the womb,
And by his strength he had power with God:
4 Yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed:
He wept, and made supplication unto him:
He found him in Beth-el, and there he spake with us;
5 Even the Lord GOD of hosts;
The LORD is his memorial.
6 Therefore turn thou to thy God:
Keep mercy and judgment,
And wait on thy God continually.

In these verses,

First. Ephraim is convicted of folly in staying himself upon Egypt and Assyria when he was in straits; ver. 1, "Ephraim feedeth on wind," that is, feeds himself with vain hopes of assistance from man, when he is at variance with God. And when he meets with disappointments, yet he pursues the same game, and greedily pants and "follows after the east wind," which he cannot catch hold of; nor if he could would it be nourishing, nay, it would be noxious. We say of the wind in the east, it is good neither for man nor beast; it was said, ch. viii. 7, "he sows the wind;" and as he sows, so he "reaps the whirlwind;" and as he reaps, so he feeds on the wind, the east wind. Note, Those that make creatures their confidence make fools of themselves; and take a great deal of pains to put a cheat upon their own souls, and to prepare vexation for themselves. He daily increaseth lies, that is, multiplies his correspondences and leagues with his neighbours, which will all prove deceitful to him; nay, they will prove desolation to him. Those very nations that he makes his refuge will prove his ruin. Those that stay themselves upon lies will be still coveting to increase them, that they may build their hopes firm upon them; as if many lies twisted together would make one truth, or many broken reeds and rotten supports one sound one, which is a great delusion, and will prove to them a great desolation. For they that observe lying vanities, the more they increase them the more disappointments they prepare for themselves, and the farther they run from their own mercies. The men of Ephraim did so, when they thought to secure the Assyrians in their interests by a solemn league, signed, sealed, and sworn to; they made a covenant with the Assyrians, but they will find there is no hold of them. That potent prince will be a slave to his word no longer than he pleaseth. They thought to secure the Egyptians for their confederates by a rich present of the commodities of their country; not only to purchase their favour, but to shew that their friendship was worth having, oil is carried into Egypt. But the Egyptians, when they had got the bribe, dropped the cause, and Ephraim was never the better for them. Oleum perdidit et operam,—'The oil and the labour are both lost.' This was feeding on wind; this was increasing lies and desolation.

CARRYING OIL-SKINS ON MULES.—ver. 1.

Secondly. Judah is contended with too, and Jacob, which includes both Ephraim and Judah; ver. 2, "The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah." For though he had awhile ago ruled with God, and been faithful with the saints, yet now he begins to degenerate. Or, though in keeping close to the house of David, and the house of Aaron, and in them to the covenants of royalty and priesthood, they were so far in the right, in the former they ruled with God and in the latter were faithful to the saints, yet upon other accounts God had a controversy with them, and would punish them. Note, Men's being in the right in some things, in the main things, shall not exempt them from correction, and therefore should not exempt them from reproof for those things wherein they are in the wrong. There were those of the seven churches of Asia whom Christ approved of and commended; and yet he adds, "Nevertheless, I have something against thee." So here, though Jacob is a people near to God, yet God will punish him according to the evil ways he was found in, and the evil doings he was found guilty of; for God sees sin even in his own people, and will reckon with them for it.

Thirdly. Both Ephraim and Judah are put in mind of their father Jacob, whose seed they were, and whose name they bore, and it was their honour—of the extraordinary things he did, and God did for him; that they might be the more ashamed of themselves, for degenerating from so illustrious a progenitor, and staining the lustre of so great a name; and yet that they might be engaged and encouraged to return to God, the God of their father Jacob, in hopes for his sake to find favour with him. He had called this people Jacob, ver. 2; threatening to punish them: But how shall I give them up? How shall that dear name be forgotten?

1. Three glorious things concerning Jacob the person, Jacob the people are here put in mind of; but by brief hints only, for it is presumed they knew the story.

1st. His struggling with Esau in the womb. There "he took his brother by the heel," ver. 3; we have the story, Gen. xxv. 26. It was an early act of bravery, and an effort for the best precedency, a pious ambition for that birthright in the covenant which Esau is justly branded as profane for despising. But his degenerate seed, by mingling themselves with the nations, and making leagues with them, profaned that crown, and laid that honour in the dust, which he so gloriously put in for. Then it was that the dominion was given him; "The elder shall serve the younger." Then he was owned of God as his beloved, "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated;" but they had by their sin forfeited both the love of God and dominion over their neighbours.

2. His wrestling with the angel. Remember how your father Jacob had power with God by his own strength; the strength he had by the gifts of God, who "pleaded not against him by his great power," but "put strength into him," Job xxiii. 6. The angel he wrestled with is called God, and therefore is supposed to be the Son of God, the angel of the covenant. 'God was both a combatant with Jacob and an assistant of him, shewing in the latter greater strength than in the former, fighting as it were against him with his left hand, and for him with his right, and to that putting greater force;' so Dr. Pocock. The providence of God fought against him, when he met with one danger after another in his return homewards, but the grace of God enabled him to go on cheerfully in his way; and, when his faith acted upon the Divine promise that was for him, prevailed above his fears that arose from the Divine providences that were against him, then "by his strength he had power with God." But it refers especially to his prayer for deliverance from Esau, and for a blessing. "He had power over the angel, and prevailed," for he "wept and made supplication." Here was a mixture of the greatest courage and the greatest tenderness; Jacob wrestling like a champion, and yet weeping like a child. Note, Prayers and tears are the weapons with which the saints have obtained the most glorious victories. Thus Jacob commenced Israel—a prince with God. His posterity was called Israel, but they were unworthy the name; for they had forfeited and lost their communion with God, and their interest in him, by revolting from their duty to him.

3. His meeting with God at Bethel; God "found him in Bethel, and there he spake with us." God found him the first time in Bethel, as he went to Padan-aram, Gen. xxviii. 10; and a second time after his return, Gen. xxxv. 9, &c. It is likely this refers to both; for in both God spake to Jacob, and renewed the covenant with him; and the prophet might very well say, "There he spake with us," who are the seed of Jacob; for both times that God spake with Jacob at Bethel, he spake with him concerning his seed; Gen. xxviii. 14, "Thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth," and Gen. xxxv. 12, "This land will I give to thy seed." Thus God then covenanted with him and his seed after him. Now justly are they upbraided with this; for in that very place which their father Jacob called Bethel, "The house of God," in remembrance of the communion he there had with God, did they set up one of the calves, and worshipped it; and so turned that Bethel into a Beth-aven, a house of iniquity. There God spake with them exceeding great and precious promises, which they had despised and lost the benefit of.

2. Two inferences are here drawn from these stories concerning Jacob, for instruction to his seed:

1st. Here is a use of information. From what passed between God and Jacob, we may learn that Jehovah, "the Lord God of hosts," is the God of Israel. He was the God of Jacob, and this is his memorial throughout all the generations of the seed of Jacob, ver. 5. The more shame for them who forgot the memorial of their church, deserted the God of their fathers, and exchanged a Lord of hosts for Baalim. Note, Those only are accounted the people of God that keep up a memorial of God, such memorials of him as he himself hath instituted, by which he makes himself known, and will have us to remember him. Here are two memorials of his, by which he is distinguished from all others, and is to be acknowledged and adored by us. First. The former speaks his existence of himself. He is Jehovah, much the same with "I am," the same that was and is, and is to come; infinite, eternal, and unchangeable. Jehovah is his memorial, his peculiar name. Secondly. The latter speaks his dominion over all. He is the God of hosts, that has all the hosts of heaven and earth at his beck and command, and makes what use he pleaseth of them. Jacob saw Mahanaim, God's two hosts, about the time that he wrestled with the angel, Gen. xxxii. 1, 2; and so learned to call God the God of hosts, and transmitted it to us as his memorial. God's names, titles, and attributes, are the memorial of him, there is no need of images to be so; and that which was a revelation of God to one is his memorial to many, to all generations.

2nd. Here is a use of exhortation, ver. 6. Is this so, that Jacob thy father had this communion with the Lord God of hosts, and is this still his memorial? First. Then let those that have gone astray from God be converted to him; "Therefore turn thou to thy God." He that was the God of Jacob is the God of Israel, is thy God; from him thou hast unjustly and unkindly revolted, therefore turn thou to him by repentance and faith, turn to him as thine, to love him, obey him, and depend upon him. Secondly. Then let those that are converted to him walk with him in all holy conversation and godliness. "Keep mercy and judgment;" mercy in relieving and succouring the poor and distressed, judgment in rendering to all their due; be kind to all, do wrong to none. Keep piety and judgment, so it may be read; live righteously and godly in this present world; be devout and be honest. Do not only practise these occasionally, but be careful and constant, and conscientious in the practice of them. Thirdly. Let those that walk with God be encouraged to live a life of dependence upon him; "Wait on thy God continually," with a believing expectation receive from him all those succours and supplies thou standest in need of. Those that live a life of conformity to God may live a life of confidence and comfort in him, if it be not their own fault. Let our eyes be ever towards the Lord; and let us preserve a holy security and serenity of mind under the protection of the Divine power, and the influence of the Divine favour, looking without anxiety for a dubious event, and by faith keeping our spirits sedate and even; and that is waiting on God as our God in covenant, and this we must do continually.

7 He is a merchant,
The balances of deceit are in his hand:
He loveth to oppress.
8 And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich,
I have found me out substance:
In all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.
9 And I that am the LORD thy God from the land of Egypt
Will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles,
As in the days of the solemn feast.
10 I have also spoken by the prophets,
And I have multiplied visions,
And used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets.
11 Is there iniquity in Gilead? surely they are vanity:
They sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal;
Yea, their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the fields.
12 And Jacob fled into the country of Syria,
And Israel served for a wife,
And for a wife he kept sheep.
13 And by a prophet the LORD brought Israel out of Egypt,
And by a prophet was he preserved.
14 Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly:
Therefore shall he leave his blood upon him,
And his reproach shall his Lord return unto him.

Here are intermixed in these verses,

First. Reproofs for sin. When God is coming forth to contend with a people, that he may demonstrate his own righteousness, he will demonstrate their unrighteousness. Ephraim was called to turn to his God, and keep judgment, ver. 6; now, to shew that he had need of that call, he is charged with turning from his God by idolatry, and breaking the laws of justice and judgment.

1. He is here charged with injustice against the precepts of the second table, ver. 7, 8. Whence observe,

1st. What the sin is wherewith he is charged; "He is a merchant." The margin reads it as a proper name, He is a Canaan, or a Canaanite; unworthy to be denominated from Jacob and Israel, and worthy to be cast out with a curse from this good land, as the Canaanites were: see Am. ix. 7. But Canaan sometimes signifies a merchant; and therefore most likely to do so here, where Ephraim is charged with deceit in trade. Though God had given his people a land flowing with milk and honey, yet he did not forbid them to enrich themselves by merchandise, and they succeeded the Canaanites in that, as well as in their husbandry; they sucked "the abundance of the seas, and the treasures hid in the sand," Deu. xxxiii. 19. And if they had been fair merchants it had been no reproach at all to them, but an honour and blessing. But he is such a merchant as the Canaanites were, that were honest only with good looking to; and if they could, cheated all they dealt with. Ephraim doth so; he deceives, and thus he oppresseth. Note, There is oppression by fraud, as well as oppression by force. It is not only princes, lords, and masters that oppress their subjects, tenants and servants, but merchants and traders are often guilty of oppressing those they deal with, when they impose upon their ignorance, or take advantage of their necessity to make them hard bargains, or are rigorous and severe in expecting their debts. Ephraim cheated, First. With a great deal of art and cunning; "The balances of deceit are in his hand." He useth balances, and delivers his goods by weight and measure, as if he would be very exact. But they are balances of deceit, false weights and false measures; and thus, under colour of doing right, he doth the greatest wrong. Note, God has his eye upon merchants and traders, when they are weighing their goods, and paying their money, whether they do honestly or deceitfully. He observes what balances they have in their hand, and how they hold them; and though those they deal with may not be aware of that sleight of hand with which they make them balances of deceit, God sees it and knows it. Trades by the wit of man are made mysteries, but it is pity that by the sin of man they should ever be made mysteries of iniquity. Secondly. With a great deal of pleasure and pride; "He loveth to oppress." To oppress is bad enough, but to love it is much worse. His conscience doth not check and reprove him for it, as it ought to do; if it did, though he committed the sin, he could not delight in it. But his corruptions are so strong, and have so triumphed over his convictions, that he not only loves the gain of oppression, but he loves to oppress; sins for sinning sake, and takes a pleasure in outwitting and overreaching those that suspect him not.

2nd. How he justifies himself in this sin, ver. 8. Wicked men will have something to say for themselves now when they are told of their faults, some frivolous turn-off or other wherewith to evade the convictions of the word. Ephraim stands indicted for a common cheat. Now see what he pleads to the indictment. He doth not deny the charge, or plead not guilty, yet doth he not make a penitent confession of it, and ask pardon, but insists upon his own justification. Suppose it were so that he did use balances of deceit, yet,

First. He pleads that he had got a good estate. Let the prophet say what he pleased of his deceit, of the sin of it, and the curse of God that attended it, he could not be convinced there was any harm or danger in it; for this he was sure of, that he had thriven in it; "Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance." Whatever you make of it, I have made a good hand of it. Note, Carnal hearts are often confirmed in a good opinion of their evil ways by their worldly prosperity and success in those ways. But it is a great mistake; every word in what Ephraim saith here speaks his folly. 1*st.* It is folly to call the riches of this world substance, for they are things that are not, Pr. xxiii. 5. 2*nd.* It is folly to think we have them by ourselves, to say, as some read it, I have made myself rich, what substance I have is owing purely to my ingenuity and industry; I have found it, my might and power of my hand has gotten me this wealth. 3*rd.* It is folly to think that what we have is for ourselves. I have found me out substance, as if we had it for our own proper use and behoof, whereas we hold in trust only as stewards. 4*th.* It is folly to think that riches are things to be gloried in, and to say with exultation, "I am become rich." Riches are not the honours of the soul, are not peculiar to the best men, nor sure to us; and therefore "let not the rich man glory in his riches," Jas. i. 9, 10. 5*th.* It is folly to think that growing rich in a sinful way either doth make us innocent or will make us safe, or may make us easy in that way; for the prosperity of fools deceives and destroys them: see Isa. xlvii. 10; Pr. i. 32.

Secondly. He pleads that he had kept a good reputation. It is common for sinners when they are justly reproved by their ministers to appeal to their neighbours; and because they know no ill of them, or will say none, or think well of what the prophets charge them with as ill, fly in the face of their reprovers. "In all my labours," saith Ephraim, "they shall find no iniquity in me that were sin." Note, Carnal hearts are apt to build a good opinion of themselves upon the fair character they have among their neighbours. Ephraim was very secure, for, 1*st.* All his neighbours knew him to be diligent in his business; they had an eye upon all his labours, and commended him for them. Men will praise thee when thou dost well for thyself. 2*nd.* None of them knew him to be deceitful in his business. He played his cards so well, that nobody could say to the contrary but that he played fair. For either, (1.) He concealed the fraud, so that none discovered it. Whatever iniquity there is, they shall find none; as if no iniquity were displeasing to God, and damning to the soul, but that which is open and scandalous before men. What will it avail us that men shall find no iniquity in us, when God finds a great deal, and will bring every secret work, even secret frauds, into judgment? (2.) He excused the fraud, so that none condemned it; "They shall find no iniquity in me that were sin;" nothing very bad, nothing but what is very excusable, only some venial sins, sins not worth speaking of, which they think God will make nothing of, because they do not. It is a fashionable iniquity, it is customary, it is what everybody doth, it is pleasant, it is gainful; and this they think is no iniquity that is sin. Nobody will think the worse of them for it. But God sees not as man sees, he judgeth not as man judgeth.

2. He is here charged with idolatry, against the precepts of the first table; with that iniquity which is in a special manner vanity, the making and worshipping of images, which are vanities; ver. 11, "Surely they are vanity," they do not profit but deceive. Now the prophet mentions two places notorious for idolatry. 1st. Gilead on the other side Jordan, which had been branded for it before, ch. vi. 8; "Is there iniquity in Gilead?" It is a thing to be wondered at, it is a thing to be sadly lamented. What! iniquity in Gilead! idolatry there! Gilead was a fruitful, pleasant country, pleasant to a proverb, Jer. xxii. 6; and doth it so ill requite the Lord? It was a frontier country, and lay much exposed to the insults of enemies, and therefore stood in special need of the Divine protection. What! and yet by iniquity throw itself out of that protection! Is there iniquity in Gilead? Yea, 2nd. And in Gilgal too. There they sacrifice bullocks, ch. ix. 15; and there their altars which they have set up, either to strange gods in opposition to God himself, or to the God of Israel in opposition to his own appointed altar, are as thick as heaps of muck in the furrows of the field that is to be sown, ch. viii. 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead only? so some. Is it only in those remote parts of the nation that people are so superstitious, where they border upon other nations? No, they are as bad at Gilgal. In Gilead God protected Jacob their father (of whom he had been speaking) from the rage of Laban, and will you there commit iniquity?

Secondly. Here are threatenings of wrath for sin. Some make that to be so, ver. 9, "I will make thee to dwell in tabernacles as in the days" of the appointed time; that is, I will bring thee into such a condition as Israel was in when they dwelt in tents, and wandered for forty years; that was the time appointed in the wilderness. Ephraim forgot that God brought him out of Egypt, and brought him up to be what he was, and was proud of his wealth, and took sinful courses to increase it, and therefore God threatens to bring him to a tabernacle state again,—to a poor, mean, desolate, unsettled condition. Note, It is just with God, when men have by their sins turned their tents into houses, by his judgments to turn their houses into tents again. However, that is certainly a threatening; ver. 14, "Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly." See how men are deceived in their opinion of themselves, and how they will one day be undeceived; Ephraim thought there was no iniquity in him that deserved to be called sin, ver. 8, but God tells him there was that in him that was sin, and would be found so, if he did not repent and reform. For,

1. It was extremely offensive to his God. "Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly," with his iniquities that are so distasteful to God, and to him too will be bitterness in the latter end. He was so wilful in sinning against his knowledge and convictions, that any one might see and say he designed no other but to provoke God in the highest degree.

2. It would certainly be destructive to himself. That cannot be otherwise which provokes God against him, and kindles the fire of his wrath. Therefore, 1st. He shall take away his forfeited life; he shall "leave his blood upon him," that is, he shall not hold him guiltless, but bring upon him that death which is the wages of sin. "His blood shall be upon his own head," 2 Sam. i. 16; for his own iniquity hath testified against him, and he alone shall bear it. Note, When sinners perish their blood is left upon them. 2nd. He shall take away his forfeited honour; "His reproach shall his Lord return upon him." God is his Lord; he had by idolatry and other sins reproached the Lord, and done dishonour to him, and to his name and family, and had given occasion to others to reproach him. And now God will return the reproach upon him, according to the word he has spoken, that those who despise him shall be lightly esteemed. Note, Shameful sins shall have shameful punishments. If Ephraim put contempt on his God, he shall be so reduced as that all his neighbours shall look with contempt upon him.

Thirdly. Here are memorials of former mercy, which come in to convict them of base ingratitude in revolting from God. Let them blush to remember,

1. That God had raised them from meanness. When Ephraim was become rich, and was proud of that, he forgot that which God (that they might not forget it) obliged them every year to acknowledge; Deu. xxvi. 5, "A Syrian ready to perish was my father." But God here puts them in mind of it, ver. 12. Let them remember not only the honours of their father Jacob, what a mighty prince he was with God, ver. 3, (an honour which they had no share in, while they were in rebellion against God,) but what a poor servant he was to Laban, which was sufficient to mortify them that were puffed up with the estates they had raised. Jacob fled into Syria from a malicious brother, and there served a covetous uncle for a wife, and "for a wife he kept sheep," because he had no estate to endow a wife with. Jacob was poor and low, and a fugitive; therefore his posterity ought not to be proud. He was a plain man dwelling in tents, and keeping sheep; therefore balances of deceit ill became them. He served for a wife that was not a Canaanitess, as Esau's wives were; therefore it was a shame for them to degenerate into Canaanites, and mingle themselves with the nations. God wonderfully preserved him in his flight, and preserved him in his services, so that he multiplied exceedingly; and from that root, in a dry ground, sprang an illustrious nation that bare his name, which magnifies the goodness of God both to him and them, and leaves them under the stain of base ingratitude to that God who was their Founder and Benefactor.

2. That God had rescued them from misery; had raised them to what they were, not only out of poverty, but out of slavery, ver. 13, which laid them under much stronger obligations to serve him, and under a yet deeper guilt in serving other gods. 1st. God "brought Israel out of Egypt" on purpose that they might serve him, and by redeeming them out of bondage acquired a special title to them, and to their service. 2nd. He preserved them, as sheep are kept by the shepherd's care. He preserved them from Pharaoh's rage, at the sea, even at the Red Sea; protected them from all the perils of the wilderness, and provided for them. 3rd. He did this by a prophet, that is, Moses, who, though he is called king in Jeshurun, Deu. xxxiii. 5, yet what he did for Israel he did as a prophet, by direction from God, and by the power of his word. The ensign of his authority was not a royal sceptre, but the rule of God; with that he summoned both Egypt's plagues and Israel's blessings. Moses, as a prophet, was a type of Christ, Acts iii. 22; and it is by Christ, as a prophet, that we are brought out of the Egypt of sin and Satan, by the power of his truth. Now this shews how very unworthy and ungrateful this people were, First. In rejecting their God, who had brought them out of Egypt, which, in the preface to the commandments, is particularly a reason for the first, why they should have no other gods before him. Secondly. In despising and persecuting his prophets, whom they should have loved and valued, and have studied to answer God's end in sending them, for the sake of that prophet by whom God had brought them out of Egypt, and preserved them in the wilderness. Note, The benefit we have had by the word of God greatly aggravates our sin and folly, if we put any slight upon the word of God.

3. That God had taken care of their education as they grew up. This instance of God's goodness we have, ver. 10; as by a prophet he delivered them, so by prophets he still continued to speak to them. Man that is formed out of the earth is fed out of the earth; so that nation that was formed by prophecy, by prophecy was fed and taught. Beginning at Moses, and so going on to all the prophets through the several ages of that church, we find that Divine revelation was all along their tuition. 1st. They had prophets raised up among themselves, Am. ii. 11; a succession of them, scarce ever without a spirit of prophecy among them, more or less, from Moses to Malachi. 2nd. These prophets were seers; they had visions and dreams in which God discovered his mind to them immediately, with a full assurance that it was his mind, Num. xii. 6. 3rd. These visions were multiplied; God spake not only once, yea twice, but many a time. If one vision was not regarded, he sent another. The prophets had variety of visions, and frequent repetitions of the same. 4th. God spake to them by the prophets; what the prophets received from the Lord they plainly and faithfully delivered to them. The people at mount Sinai begged that God would speak to them by men like themselves, and he did so. 5th. In speaking to them by the prophets he used similitudes, to make the messages he sent by them both intelligible and more affecting, and more likely to be remembered. The visions they saw were often similitudes, and their discourses were embellished with very apt comparisons. And as God by his prophets, so by his Son he used similitudes, for "he opened his mouth in parables." Note, God keeps an account, whether we do or no, of the sermons we hear; and those that have long enjoyed the means of grace in purity, plenty, and power, that have been frequently, faithfully, and familiarly told the mind of God, will have a great deal to answer for another day, if they persist in a course of iniquity.

Fourthly. Here are intimations of farther mercy, and this remembered too in the midst of sin and wrath, as some understand; ver. 9, "I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt," that then, and there, took thee to be my people, and have approved myself thy God ever since, in a constant series of merciful providences, have yet a kindness for thee, as bad as thou art; and I will "make thee to dwell in tabernacles," not as in the wilderness, but "as in the days of the solemn feast," the feast of tabernacles, which was celebrated with great joy, Lev. xxiii. 40. 1. They shall be made to see by the grace of God that though they are rich, and have found out substance, yet they are but in a tabernacle state, and have in their worldly wealth no continuing city. 2. They shall yet have cause to rejoice in God, and have opportunity to do it in public ordinances. The feast of tabernacles was the first solemn feast the Jews kept after their return out of Babylon, Ezr. iii. 4. 3. This, as other promises, was to have its full accomplishment in the grace of the Gospel, which provides tabernacles for believers in their way to heaven, and furnisheth them with matter of joy, holy joy, joy in God, such as was in the feast of tabernacles, Zec. xiv. 18, 19.

CHAPTER XIII.

The same strings, though generally unpleasing ones, are harped upon in this chapter that were in those before. People care not to be told either of their sin or of their danger by sin, and yet it is necessary and for their good to be told of both, nor can they better hear of either than from the word of God, and from their faithful ministers, while the sin may be repented of, and the danger prevented. Here, I. The people of Israel are reproved and threatened for their idolatry, ver. 1—4. II. They are reproved and threatened for their wantonness, pride, and luxury, and other abuses of their wealth and prosperity, ver. 5—8. III. The ruin that is coming upon them, for these and all their other sins, is foretold as very terrible, ver. 12, 13, 15, 16. IV. Those among them that yet retain a respect for their God are here encouraged to hope that he will yet appear for their relief, though their kings and princes and all their other supports and succours fail them, ver. 9—11, 14.

WHEN Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel;
But when he offended in Baal, he died.
2 And now they sin more and more,
And have made them molten images of their silver,
And idols according to their own understanding,
All of it the work of the craftsmen:
They say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.
3 Therefore they shall be as the morning cloud,
And as the early dew that passeth away,
As the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor,
And as the smoke out of the chimney.
4 Yet I am the LORD thy God from the land of Egypt,
And thou shalt know no god but me:
For there is no saviour beside me.

Idolatry was the sin that did most easily beset the Jewish nation till after the captivity; the ten tribes from the first were guilty of it, but especially after the days of Ahab. And this is the sin which in these verses they are charged with. Observe,

First. The provision that God made to prevent their falling into idolatry. This we have ver. 4. God did what was fit to be done to keep them close to himself; what could have been done more? 1. He made known himself to them as "the Lord their God," and took them to be his people in a peculiar manner. Both by his word and by his works all along, "from the land of Egypt," he declared, "I am the Lord thy God;" he told them so from heaven, at mount Sinai, that he was the Lord and their God, who brought them out of the land of Egypt. This he continued both to declare and to prove to them by his prophets and by his providences. 2. He gave them a law, forbidding them to worship any other. Thou shalt know no God but me; not only shalt not own and worship any other, but shalt not acquaint thyself with any other, nor make the rites and usages of the Gentiles familiar to thee. Note, It is a happy ignorance not to know that which we ought not to meddle with. We find those praised who have not known the depths of Satan. 3. He gave them a good reason for it; "There is no Saviour besides me." Whatever we take for our God, we expect to have for our Saviour; that is, to make us happy here and hereafter. As where we have protection we owe allegiance, so where we have salvation, and hope for it, we owe adoration.

Secondly. The honour that Ephraim had while he kept himself clear from idolatry; ver. 1, "While Ephraim spake trembling," or with trembling, that is, (as Dr. Pocock understands it,) while he behaved himself towards God as his father Jacob did, with weeping and supplications, and spake not proudly and insolently against God and his prophets, while he kept up a holy fear of God, and worshipped him in that fear, so long he exalted himself in Israel; that is, he was very considerable among the tribes, and made a figure. Jeroboam, who was of that tribe, exalted himself and his family; when he spake there was trembling, that is, all about him stood in awe of him; so some understand it. Note, Those that humble themselves, especially that humble themselves before God, shall be exalted. When people speak with modesty, and jealousy of themselves, with a diffidence of their own judgment, and a deference to others, they exalt themselves, they gain a reputation. But as for Ephraim, he soon lost himself; "When he offended in Baal he died," that is, he lost his reputation,—his honour soon dwindled and sunk, and was laid in the dust. Baal is here put for idolatry; When Ephraim forsook God, and took to worship images, the state received its death wound, and was never good for any thing after. Note, Deserting God is the death of any person or persons.

Thirdly. The lamentable growth of idolatry among them; ver. 2, "Now they sin more and more." When once he began to offend in Baal the ice was broken, and he grew worse and worse; coveted more idols, doted more upon those he had, and grew more ridiculous in the worship of them. Note, The way of idolatry, as of other sins, is down-hill; and men cannot easily stop themselves. It is the sad case of all those who have forsaken God, that they sin yet more and more. Let us trace them in their apostasy. 1. They made them molten images, proud to have gods that they could cast into what mould they pleased; probably these were the calves in little, like the silver shrines for Diana, the zealots for the calf worship carried about with them; it may be images of the gods they worshipped, made on purpose for themselves. 2. They made them of their silver, and then doubted not of their property in them, when they purchased them with their own money, or made them of their own plate melted down for that purpose. See what cost they put themselves to in the service of their idols, which they honoured with the best they had, and therefore made their molten images of silver. 3. They made them "according to their own understanding," that is, according to their own fancy. They consulted with themselves what shape they should make it in, and made it accordingly; a god according to the best of their judgment; or according to their own likeness,—in the form of a man. And when they made their idols men like themselves in shape, they made themselves stocks and stones like them in reality; for they that make them are like unto them, and so is every one that trusteth in them. 4. It was all the work of the craftsmen. Their images do not pretend, like that of Diana, to have come down from Jupiter, Acts xix. 35; no, perhaps the workmen stamped their names upon them,—such an idol was such a man's work: see ch. viii. 6; Isa. lxiv. 9, &c. 5. Though they were thus the work of their hands, yet they were the beloved of their souls; for they say of them, "Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves." Either the priests called upon the people thus to pay their homage, or the people who were not allowed to come so near themselves called upon the men that sacrificed, that is, the priests that attended for them, to kiss the calves in their name and stead, because they could not reach to do it, so very fond were they to pay their utmost respects to such an idol as they were taught to have a veneration for. Though they were calves, yet if they were gods, the worshippers, by themselves or their proxies, thus made their honours to them. They kissed the calves in adoration of them, affection for them, and allegiance to them as theirs. Thus we are bid to "kiss the Son," to take him for our Lord and our God.

Fourthly. Threatenings of wrath for their idolatry. The Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another; and, therefore, all they "that worship images," shall be confounded, especially if Ephraim do it, Ps. xcvii. 7. Because they are so fond of kissing their calves, therefore, God will give them sensible convictions of their folly, ver. 3. They promise a great deal of safety and satisfaction in the worship of their idols, and that their prosperity will thereby be established; but God tells them they shall be disappointed, and driven away in their wickedness. This is illustrated by four similitudes. They shall be, 1. As the morning cloud, which promiseth showers of rain to the parched cloud. 2. As the early dew, which seems to be an earnest of such showers. But both pass away, and the day proves as dry and hot as ever; so fleeting and transitory their profession of piety was, ch. vi. 4, and so had they disappointed God's expectation from them; and therefore it is just that so their prosperity should be, and so their expectations from their idols should be disappointed; and so will all theirs be that make an idol of this world. 3. They are as the chaff, light and worthless; and they shall be driven "as the chaff is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor," Ps. i. 4; xxxv. 5; Job xxi. 18. Nay, 4. They are as the smoke, noisome and offensive: see Isa. lxv. 5; and they shall be driven away as the smoke out of the chimneys, that is soon dissipated, and disappears, Ps. lxviii. 2. Note, No solid, lasting comfort is to be expected anywhere but in God.

5 I did know thee in the wilderness,
In the land of great drought.
6 According to their pasture, so were they filled;
They were filled, and their heart was exalted;
Therefore have they forgotten me.
7 Therefore I will be unto them as a lion:
As a leopard by the way will I observe them:
8 I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps,
And will rend the caul of their heart,
And there will I devour them like a lion:
The wild beast shall tear them.

SYRIAN LEOPARD.

We may observe here,

First. The plentiful provision God hath made for Israel, and the seasonable supplies he had blessed them with; ver. 5, "I did know thee in the wilderness," that is, took cognizance of thy case, and made provision for thee, even in a "land of great drought," when thou wast in extreme distress, and when no relief was to be had in an ordinary way: see a description of this wilderness, Deu. viii. 15; Jer. ii. 6; and say, the God that knew them, and owned them, and fed them there, was a friend indeed, for he was a friend at need, and an all-sufficient friend, that could victual so vast an army when all ordinary ways of provision were cut off, and where, if miracles had not been their daily bread, they must all have perished. Note, Help at an exigence is very obliging, and must never be forgotten.

Secondly. Their unworthy, ungrateful abuse of God's favour to them. God not only took care of them in the wilderness, but put them in possession of Canaan, a good land, a large and fat pasture; and, ver. 6, "according to their pastures so were they filled." God gave them both plenty and dainties, and they did not spare it, but, having been long confined to manna, when they came into Canaan they fed themselves to the full. And this was no hopeful presage; it would have looked better, and promised better, if they had been more modest and moderate in the use of their plenty, and had learned to deny themselves; but what was the effect of it? "They were filled, and their heart was exalted." Their luxury and sensuality made them proud, insolent, and secure. The best comment upon this is that of Moses, Deu. xxxii. 13—15, But "Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked." When the body was stuffed up with plenty the soul was puffed up with pride. Then they began to think their religion a thing below them, and they could not persuade themselves to stoop to the service of it. "The wicked through the pride of his countenance will not seek after God." When they were poor and lame in the wilderness, they thought it was necessary for them to keep in with God, but when they were replenished and established in Canaan they began to think they had no farther need of him; "Their heart was exalted, therefore have they forgotten me." Note, Worldly prosperity, when it feeds men's pride, makes them forgetful of God; for they remember him only when they want him. When Israel was filled, what more could the Almighty do for them? And therefore they said unto him, "Depart from us," Job xxii. 17. It is sad that those favours which ought to make us mindful of God, and studious what we shall render to him, should make us unmindful of him, and regardless what we do against him. We ought to know that we live upon God when we live upon common providence, though we do not, as Israel in the wilderness, live upon miracles.

Thirdly. God's just resentment of their base ingratitude, ver. 7, 8. The judgments threatened, ver. 3, spoke the departure of all good from them. The threatenings here go farther, and speak the breaking in of all evils upon them; for God, that had so much befriended them, now turns to be their enemy, and fights against them, which is expressed here very terribly; "I will be unto them as a lion," and "as a leopard." The lion is strong, and there is no resisting him. The leopard is here taken notice of to be crafty and vigilant; "As a leopard by the way will I observe them." As that beast of prey lies in wait by the roadside to catch travellers and devour them, so will God, by his judgments, watch over them to do them hurt, as he had watched over them to do them good, Jer. xliv. 27. No opportunity shall be slipped that may accelerate or aggravate their ruin; Jer. v. 6, "A leopard shall watch over their cities." A lynx, or spotted beast, (and such the leopard is,) is noted for quicksightedness above any creature, (lynx visu,—'the eyes of a lynx,) and so it intimates that not only the power but the wisdom of God is engaged against those whom he has a controversy with. Some read it, (and the original will bear it,) 'I will be as a leopard in the way of Assyria.' The judgments of God shall surprise them then when they are going to the Assyrians to seek for protection and help from them. It is added, "I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved," and thereby exasperated and made more cruel, 2 Sam. xvii. 8; Pr. xxviii. 15; which intimates how highly God was provoked, and he would make them feel it: he "will rend the caul of their heart." The lion is observed to aim at the heart of the beasts he preys upon, and thus will God "devour them like a lion." He will send such judgments upon them as shall prey upon their spirits, and consume their vitals. Their heart was exalted, ver. 6, but God will take an effectual course to bring it down. "The wild beast shall tear them;" not only God will be as a lion and leopard to them, but the metaphor shall be fulfilled to the letter, for noisome beasts are one of the four sore judgments with which God will destroy a provoking people, Eze. xiv. 15. Now all this teacheth us, 1. That abused goodness turns into the greater severity. Those who despise God, and affront him, when he is to them as a tender, careful shepherd, shall find he will be even to his own flock as the beasts of prey are. Those whom God has in vain endured with much longsuffering, and invited with much affection, in them he will shew his wrath, and make them vessels of it, Rom. ix. 22. Patientia læsa fit furor,—'Despised patience will turn into fury.' 2. That the judgments of God, when they come with commission against impenitent sinners, will be irresistible, and very terrible. They will rend the caul of the heart, will fill the soul with confusion, and tear that in pieces; and we are as unable to grapple with them, as a lamb is to make his part good against a roaring lion; for "who knows the power of God's anger?" "Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord," let us be persuaded to make peace with him, for are we stronger than he?

9 O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help.
10 I will be thy king:
Where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities?
And thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? [my wrath.
11 I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in 12 The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up; his sin is hid.
13 The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him:
He is an unwise son;
For he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children.
14 I will ransom them from the power of the grave;
I will redeem them from death:
O death, I will be thy plagues;
O grave, I will be thy destruction:
Repentance shall be hid from mine eyes.
15 Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come,
The wind of the LORD shall come up from the wilderness,
And his spring shall become dry,
And his fountain shall be dried up:
He shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels.

16 Samaria shall become desolate;
For she hath rebelled against her God:
They shall fall by the sword:
Their infants shall be dashed in pieces,
And their women with child shall be ripped up.

The first of these verses is the summary or contents of all the rest, ver. 9. Where we have, 1. All the blame of Israel's ruin laid upon themselves. O Israel! thy perdition is thence; it is of and from thyself. Or, It has destroyed thee, O Israel! that is, all that sin and folly of thine which thou art before charged with. As thy own wickedness has many a time corrected thee, so that has now at length destroyed thee. Note, Wilful sinners are self-destroyers; obstinate impenitency is the grossest self-murder. Those that are destroyed of the destroyers have their blood upon their own head, they have destroyed themselves. 2. All the glory of Israel's relief ascribed to God; "But in me is thy help." That is, 1st. It might have been. I would have helped thee, and healed thee, but thou wouldst not be healed and helped, but wast resolutely set upon thy own destruction. This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners, not only that they did that which tended to their own ruin, but they opposed the offers God made them, and the methods he took with them to have prevented it: I would have gathered them, and they would not. They might have been easily and effectually helped, but they put the help away from them. Nay, 2nd. It may yet be; Thy case is bad, but it is not desperate: "thou hast destroyed thyself," but come to me and I will help thee. This is a plank thrown out after shipwreck, and greatly magnifies not only the power of God, that he can help when things are at the worst, can help those that cannot help themselves, but the riches of his grace, that he will help those that have destroyed themselves, and therefore might justly be left to perish; that he will help those that had long refused his help. Dr. Pocock gives a different reading and sense of this verse: 'O Israel, this has destroyed thee, that in me is thy help.' Presuming upon God and his favour has emboldened thee in those wicked ways which have been thy ruin. Now in the rest of these verses we may see,

First. How Israel destroyed themselves. It is said, ver. 16, they rebelled against their God, revolted from their allegiance to him, entered into a confederacy with his enemies, and took up arms against him; and this was the thing that ruined them, for never any hardened themselves against God and prospered. Note, Those that rebel against their God destroy themselves, for they make him their enemy for whom they are an unequal match.

1. They treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and so they destroy themselves. They are doing that every day which will be remembered against them another day; ver. 12, "The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, and his sin is hid," that is, God took notice of it, kept it upon record, and will produce it against him, and reckon with him for it afterwards. Their former sins contributed to their present destruction; for they were "laid up in store with God," Deu. xxxii. 34, 35; Job xiv. 17. It is laid up in safety, and will not be forgotten, nor the evidence against him lost; but it is laid up in secret, it is hid, the sinner himself is not aware of it. It is bound up in God's omniscience, in the sinner's own conscience. Note, The sin of sinners is not forgotten till it is pardoned, but an exact account is kept of it, which will be opened in proper time.

2. They make no haste to repent and help themselves when they are under Divine rebukes; and therefore they are their own ruin, because they will not do what they should do towards their own salvation, ver. 13. 1st. They are brought into trouble and distress by sin. "The sorrow of a travailing woman shall come upon him." They shall smart for sin, and so be made sensible of it; they shall be thrown into pangs and agonies by it, very sharp and severe, and yet, like the pains of a woman in labour, hopeful and promising, and in order to deliverance; and by these, though God corrects him, yet he designs his good. He is chastened that he may not be destroyed. But, 2nd. They are not by these forwarded as they ought to be towards repentance and reformation, which would issue their sorrows in true joy: "He is an unwise son, for he should not stay long," as he doth, "in the place of the breaking forth of children," but, being brought to the birth, should struggle to get forth, lest he be stifled and still-born at last. Were the child which the mother is in travail of capable of understanding its own case, we should reckon it an unwise child that would choose to stay long in the birth; for the "captive exile hasteth to be loose, lest he die in the pit," Isa. li. 14. Note, Those may justly be reckoned their own destroyers who defer and put off their repentance, by which alone they might help themselves. Those are in danger of miscarrying in conversion that delay it, and will not put forth themselves to speed the work, and bring it to an issue.

3. Therefore he is destroyed because he has done that which would be his certain ruin, and neglected that which would be his only relief. Here is a sad description of the desolation they are doomed to, ver. 15, 16. It is here taken for granted that Ephraim is fruitful among his children; his name signifies 'fruitfulness.' He is fruitful in respect of the plentiful products of his country, and the great numbers of its inhabitants; it was both a rich and a populous tribe, as was foretold concerning it. But sin turns this fruitful tribe into barrenness. Joseph was a "fruitful bough," but for sin it was blasted. The instrument is an east wind, representing a foreign enemy that should invade it. It is called "the wind of the Lord," not only because it shall be a very great and strong wind, but because it shall be sent by a Divine direction; it shall come from the Lord, and do whatever he appoints; and see what effect it shall have upon that flourishing tribe, what desolations war shall make. 1st. Was it a rich tribe? the foreign enemy shall make it poor enough. This wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness a freezing, blasting wind, and shall dry up the springs and fountains with which this tree is watered, shall exhaust the sources of its wealth. The invader shall waste the country, and so impoverish the husbandman; shall intercept trade and commerce, and so impoverish the merchant. And let not the great men, whose wealth lies in their rich furniture, think that they shall be exempted from the judgment; for he shall "spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels." See the folly of those that lay up their treasure on earth, that lay it up in pleasant vessels, vessels of desire, so the word is, on which they set their affections, and in which they place their comfort and satisfaction. This is treasure that may be spoiled, and that they may be spoiled of; it is what either moth and rust may corrupt or what thieves and soldiers may steal and carry away. But wise and happy they who have laid up their treasure in heaven, and in the pleasant things of that world, which cannot be spoiled, which they cannot be stripped of; ever happy are they, and therefore truly wise. 2nd. Was it a populous tribe, and numerous? the enemy shall depopulate it, and make its men few; "Samaria shall become desolate," without inhabitants. First. Those shall be cut off that are the guard and joy of the present generation. The men that bear arms shall bear them to no purpose, for "they shall fall by the sword," so that there shall be none to make head against the fury of the conqueror, or to take care of the concerns, either of the public or of private families. Secondly. Those shall be cut off that are the seed and hope of the next generation, that should rise up in the places of those that fell by the sword. The whole nation must be rooted out, and therefore the infants shall be dashed to pieces, in the most cruel and barbarous manner; and, which, if possible, is yet more inhuman, "The women with child shall be ripped up." Thus shall the glory of Samaria flee away from the birth, and from the womb, ch. ix. 11; x. 14. See instances of this cruelty, 2 Kin. viii. 12; xv. 16; Am. i. 13.

Secondly. Let us now see how God was the help of this self-destroying people, how he was their only help; ver. 10, "I will be thy king," to rule and save thee. Though they had refused to be his subjects, and had rebelled against him, yet he would still be their king, and would not abandon them. The business and care of a good king is to keep his people not only from being ruined by foreign enemies, but from ruining themselves and one another. Thus will God yet be Israel's King, as he was their King of old. Note, Our case would be sad indeed if God were not better to us than we are to ourselves.

1. God will be their King when they have no other king; he will protect and save them when those are cut off and gone that should have been their protectors and saviours: I will be he, (so ver. 10 may be read,) he that shall help thee. Where is the king that may save thee in all thy cities? that may go in and out before thee, and fight thy battles, when thy cities are invaded by a foreign power, and suppress the more dangerous quarrels of thy citizens among themselves? Where are thy judges, that by administering public justice should preserve the public peace? (for they are righteousness and peace that kiss each other.) Where are thy judges that thou hadst such a desire of, and such a dependence upon, of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? This refers, 1st. To the foolish, wicked desire which the whole nation had of a kingly government, being weary of the theocracy, or Divine government which they had been under during the time of the judges, because it looked too mean for them. They rejected Samuel, and in him the Lord, when they said, Give us a king like the nations, whereas the Lord was their King. 2nd. To the desire which the ten tribes had, of a kingly government different from that of the house of David, because they thought that was too absolute, and bore too hard upon them; and they hoped to mend themselves by setting up Jeroboam. Both these are instances, First. Of men's improvidence for themselves. When they are uneasy with their present lot they are fond of novelty, and think to mend themselves by a change; but they are commonly disappointed, and do not find that advantage by the alteration which they promised themselves. Secondly. Of men's impiety towards God, in thinking to refine upon his appointments, and amend them. God gave Israel judges and prophets for their conduct, but they were weary of them, and cried, "Give us a king and princes." God gave them the house of David, established it by a covenant of royalty; but they were soon weary of that too, and cried, "We have no part in David." Those destroy themselves that are not pleased with what God doth for them, but think they can do better for themselves. Well, in both these requests Providence humoured them; gave them Saul first, and afterwards Jeroboam. And what the better were they for them? Saul was given in anger, given in thunder, 1 Sam. xii. 18, 19; and soon after was taken away in wrath, upon mount Gilboa. The kingly government of the ten tribes was given in anger, not only against Solomon for his defection, but against the ten tribes that desired it, for their discontent, and disaffection to the house of David. And God was now about to take that away in wrath, by the power of the king of Assyria. And then, Where is thy king? He is gone, and thou shalt abide many days "without a king, and without a prince," ch. iii. 4; shalt have none to save thee, none to rule thee. Note, 1. God often gives in anger what we sinfully and inordinately desire; gives it with a curse, and with it gives us up to our own hearts' lusts. Thus he gave Israel quails. 2. What we inordinately desire we are commonly disappointed in, and it cannot save us, as we expected it should. 3. What God gives in anger he takes away in wrath; what he gives because we did not desire it well, he takes away because we did not use it well. It is the happiness of the saints, that, whether God gives or takes, it is all in love, and furnisheth them with matter for praise. To the pure all things are pure. It is the misery of the wicked that, whether God gives or take, it is all in wrath; to them nothing is pure, nothing is comfortable.

2. God will do that for them which no other king could do if they had one; ver. 14, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave." Though Israel according to the flesh be abandoned to destruction, God has mercy in store for his spiritual Israel, in whom all the promises were to have their accomplishment, and this among the rest, for to them the apostle applies it, 1 Cor. xv. 55, and particularly to the blessed resurrection of believers at the great day; yet not excluding their spiritual resurrection from the death of sin to a holy, heavenly, spiritual, and Divine life. It is promised, 1st. That the captives shall be delivered, shall be ransomed from the power of the grave. Their deliverance shall be by ransom, and we know who it was that paid their ransom, and what the ransom was, for it was the Son of man that "gave his life a ransom for many," Mat. xx. 28. It is he that thus redeemed them. Those that upon their repenting and believing are for the sake of Christ's righteousness acquitted from the guilt of sin, and saved from death and hell, which are the wages of sin, are those ransomed of the Lord that shall, in the great day, be brought out of the grave in triumph, and it shall be as impossible for the bands of death to hold them as it was to hold their Master. 2nd. That the conqueror shall be destroyed. "O death, I will be thy plague." Jesus Christ was the plague and destruction of death and the grave, when by death he destroyed him that had the power of death, and when in his own resurrection he triumphed over the grave. But the complete destruction of them will be in the resurrection of believers at the great day, when death shall for ever be swallowed up in victory; and it is the last enemy that shall be destroyed. But the word which we translate, "I will," may as well be rendered ubi nunc,—'where now' is thy plague? And so the apostle took it: "O death, where is thy" plague, or "sting," with which thou hast so long pestered the world? "O grave, where is thy victory," or thy destruction, wherewith thou hast destroyed mankind? Christ has abolished death, has broken the power of it, and altered the property of it, and so enabled us to triumph over it. This promise he has made, and it shall be made good to all that are his, for "repentance shall be hid from his eyes;" he will never recall this sentence passed on death and the grave, for he is not a man that he should repent. Thanks be to God, therefore, who giveth us the victory.

CHAPTER XIV.

The strain of this chapter differs from that of the foregoing chapters. Those were generally made up of reproofs for sin, and threatenings of wrath, but this is made up of exhortations to repentance and promises of mercy, and with these the prophet closeth; for all the foregoing convictions and terrors he had spoken were designed to prepare and make way for these; he wounds that he may heal; the Spirit convinceth that he may comfort. This chapter is a lesson for penitents, and some such there were in Israel, at this day, as bad as things were. We have here, I. Directions in repenting, what to do and what to say, ver. 1—3. II. Encouragements to repent, taken from God's readiness to receive returning sinners, ver. 4, 8, and the comforts he had treasured up for them, ver. 5—7. III. A solemn recommendation of these things to our serious thoughts, ver. 9.

O ISRAEL, return unto the LORD thy God;
For thou hast fallen by thine iniquity.
2 Take with you words, and turn to the LORD:
Say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us
So will we render the calves of our lips. [graciously:
3 Asshur shall not save us;
We will not ride upon horses:
Neither will we say any more to the work of our hands,
Ye are our gods:
For in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.

Here is, First. A kind invitation given to sinners to repent, ver. 1. It is directed to Israel, God's professing people; they are called to return. Note, Conversion must be preached even to those that are within the pale of the church as well as to the heathen. Thou art Israel, and therefore art bound to thy God in duty, gratitude, and interest; thy revolt from him is so much the more heinous, and thy return to him so much the more necessary. Let Israel see, 1. What work he has made for repentance. "Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity;" thou hast stumbled, so some read it: their idols were their stumbling-blocks. Thou art fallen from God unto sin, fallen off from all good, fallen down under the load of guilt and the curse. Note, Sin is a fall, and it concerns those that are fallen by sin to get up again by repentance. 2. What work he has to do in his repentance. Return to the Lord thy God; return to him as the Lord whom thou hast a dependence upon, as thy God, thine in covenant, whom thou hast an interest in. Note, It is the great concern of those that have revolted from God to return to God, and so to do their first works. Return to him from whom thou hast fallen, and who alone is able to raise thee up. Return even to the Lord, or quite home to the Lord; do not only look to him, or take some steps towards him, but make a thorough work of it. The ancient Jews had a saying grounded on this: 'Repentance is a great thing, for it brings men quite up to the throne of glory.'

Secondly. Necessary instructions given how to repent. 1. They must bethink themselves what to say to God when they come to him; "Take with you words." They are not required to bring sacrifices and offerings, but penitent prayers and supplications; the fruit of thy lips, yet not of the lips only, but of the heart, else words are but wind. One of the rabbins saith, they must be such words as proceed from what is spoken first in the inner man; the heart must dictate to the tongue. We must take good words with us by taking good thoughts and good affections with us. Verbaque prævisam rem non invita sequentur,—'Those who master a subject are seldom at a loss for language.' Note, When we come to God we should consider what we have to say to him, for if we come without an errand we are likely to go without an answer; Ezr. ix. 10, "What shall we say?" We must take with us words from the Scripture, take them from the Spirit of grace and supplication, who teacheth us to cry, Abba, Father! and makes intercession in us. 2. They must bethink themselves what to do. They must not only take with them words, but must turn to the Lord, inwardly in their hearts, outwardly in their lives.

Now, for their assistance herein and encouragement, God is pleased to put words into their mouths, to teach them what they shall say. Sure we may hope to speed with God when he himself has ordered our address to be drawn up ready to our hands, and his own Spirit has indited it for us; and no doubt we shall speed if the workings of our souls agree with the words here recommended to us. They are,

1st. Petitioning words. Two things we are here directed to petition for. First. To be acquitted from guilt. When we return to the Lord we must say to him, Lord, "take away all iniquity." They were now smarting for sin, under the load of affliction, but are taught to pray, not as Pharaoh, Take away this death, but, Take away this sin. Note, When we are in affliction we should be more concerned for the forgiveness of our sins than for the removal of our trouble. Take away iniquity; lift it off as a burthen we are ready to sink under, or as the stumbling-block which we have often fallen over; Lord, take it away, that it may not appear against us to our confusion and condemnation. Take it all away by a free and full remission, for we cannot pretend to strike any of it off by a satisfaction of our own. When God pardons sin he pardons all that great debt; and when we pray against sin we must pray against it all, and not except any. Secondly. To be accepted as righteous in God's sight; "Receive us graciously." Let us have thy favour and love, and have thou respect to us and to our performances; receive our prayer graciously; be well pleased with that good which by thy grace we are enabled to do. 'Take good,' so the word is; take it to bestow upon us. So the margin reads it, 'Give good.' This follows upon the petition for the taking away of iniquity, for till iniquity is taken away we have no reason to expect any good from God; but the taking away of iniquity makes way for the conferring of good, removendo prohibens,—'by taking that out of the way which hindered.' Give good; they do not say what good, but refer themselves to God; it is not good of the world's shewing, Ps. iv. 6, but good of God's giving. Give good; that good which we have forfeited, and which thou hast promised, and which the necessity of our case calls for. Note, God's gracious acceptance, and the blessed fruits and tokens of that acceptance, are to be earnestly desired and prayed for by us in our returning to God. Give good, that is, that good which will make us good, and keep us from returning to iniquity again.

2nd. Promising words. These also are put into their mouths, not to move God or to oblige him to shew them mercy, but to move themselves, and oblige themselves to returns of duty. Note, Our prayers for pardon and acceptance with God should be always accompanied with sincere purposes and vows of new obedience. Two things they are to promise and vow:

First. Thanksgiving. Pardon our sins and accept of us, "so will we render the calves of our lips." 'The fruit of our lips,' so the Seventy, a word they used for burnt offerings, and so it agrees with the Hebrew. The apostle quotes this phrase, Heb. xiii. 15, and by the fruit of our lips understands the 'sacrifice of praise to God, giving thanks to his name.' Note, Praise and thanksgiving is our spiritual sacrifice, and if it come from an upright heart shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock, Ps. lxix. 30, 31. And the sense of our pardon and acceptance with God will enlarge our hearts in praise and thankfulness. Those that are received graciously may and must render the calves of their lips. Poor returns for rich receivings, yet if sincere more acceptable than the calves of the stall.

Secondly. Amendment of life. They are taught to promise not only verbal acknowledgments but a real reformation. And we are taught here, 1*st.* In our returns to God to covenant against sin. We cannot expect that God should take it away by forgiving it, if we do not put it away by forsaking it. 2*nd.* To be particular in our covenants and resolutions against sin, as we ought to be in our confessions, because deceit lies in generals. 3*rd.* To covenant especially and expressly against those sins which we have been most subject to, which have most easily beset us, and which we have been most frequently overcome by. We must keep ourselves from, and therefore must thus fortify ourselves against, our own iniquity, Ps. xviii. 23. The sin they here covenant against, owning thereby that they had been guilty of it, is giving that glory to another which is due to God only. This they promise they will never do, (1.) By putting that confidence in creatures which should be put in God only. They will not trust to their alliances abroad; Asshur, that is, Assyria, "shall not save us." We will not court the help of the Assyrians when we are in distress, as we have done, ch. v. 13; vii. 11; viii. 9; we will not contract for it, ch. ii. 1, nor will we confide in it or depend upon it. Having a God to go to, a God all-sufficient to trust to, we scorn to be beholden to the Assyrians for help. They will not trust to their warlike preparations at home, especially not those which they were forbidden to multiply; "We will not ride upon horses," that is, we will not make court to Egypt, for thence they fetched their horses, Deu. xvii. 6; Isa. xxx. 16; xxxi. 1, 3. When our enemies invade us, we will depend upon our God to succour our infantry, and will be in no care to remount our cavalry. Or, we will not post on horseback, for haste, from one creature to another to seek relief, but will take the next way, and the only sure way, by applying ourselves to God, Isa. xx. 5 Note, True repentance takes us off from trusting to an arm of flesh, and brings us to rely on God only for all the good we stand in need of. Nor will they do it by paying that homage to creatures which is due to God only; We will not "say any more to the works of our hands, Ye are our gods." They must promise never to worship idols again, and for a good reason, because it is the most absurd and senseless thing in the world to pray to that as a god which is the work of our hands. We must promise that we will not set our hearts upon the gains of this world, nor pride ourselves in our external performances in religion, for that is in effect to "say to the works of our hands, Ye are our gods."

3rd. Pleading words are here put into their mouths, for "in thee the fatherless findeth mercy." We must take our encouragement in prayer, not from any merit God finds in us, but purely from the mercy we hope to find in God. This contains in itself a great truth, that God takes special care of fatherless children, Ps. lxviii. 4, 5; so he did in his law, Ex. xxii. 22; so he doth in his providence, Ps. xxvii. 10. It is God's prerogative to help the helpless; in him there is mercy for such, for they are proper objects of mercy; in him they find it, there it is laid up for them, and there they must seek it, "Seek, and ye shall find." It comes in here as a good plea for mercy and grace, and an encouraging one to their faith. First. They plead the distress of their state and condition; We are fatherless orphans, destitute of help. Those may expect to find help in God that are truly sensible of their helplessness in themselves, and are willing to acknowledge it. This is a good step towards comfort. If we have not yet boldness to call God, Father, yet we look upon ourselves as fatherless without him, and therefore lay ourselves at his feet to be looked upon by him with compassion. Secondly. They plead God's wonted loving-kindness to such as were in that condition. With thee the fatherless not only may find, but doth find, and shall find mercy. It is a great encouragement to our faith and hope, in returning to God, that it is his glory to father the fatherless and help the helpless.

4 I will heal their backsliding,
I will love them freely:
For mine anger is turned away from him.
5 I will be as the dew unto Israel:
He shall grow as the lily,
And cast forth his roots as Lebanon.
6 His branches shall spread,
And his beauty shall be as the olive tree,
And his smell as Lebanon.
7 They that dwell under his shadow shall return;
They shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine:
The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.

We have here an answer of peace to the prayers of returning Israel. They seek God's face, and they shall not seek in vain. God will be sure to meet them in a way of mercy who return to him in a way of duty. If we speak to God in good prayers, God will speak to us in good promises, as he "answered the angel with good words and comfortable words," Zec. i. 13. If we take with us the foregoing words in our coming to God, we may take home with us these following words for our faith to feast upon; and see how these answer those.

First. Do they dread and deprecate God's displeasure, and therefore return to him? He assures them that upon their submission his anger is turned away from them. This is laid as the ground of all the other favours here promised. I will do so and so, for mine "anger is turned away," and thereby a door is opened for all good to flow to them, Isa. xii. 1. Note, Though God is justly and greatly angry with sinners, yet he is not implacable in his anger; it may be turned away, it shall be turned away from those that turn away from their iniquity. God will be reconciled to those that are reconciled to him and to his whole will.

Secondly. Do they pray for the taking away of iniquity? He assures them that he will "heal their backslidings;" so he promised Jer. iii. 22. Note, Though backslidings from God are the dangerous diseases and wounds of the soul, yet they are not incurable, for God has graciously promised that, if backsliding sinners will apply themselves to him as their physician, and comply with his methods, he will heal their backslidings. He will heal the guilt of their backslidings by pardoning mercy, and their bent to backslide by renewing grace. Their iniquity shall not be their ruin.

Thirdly. Do they pray that God will receive them graciously? In answer to that, behold it is promised, "I will love them freely." God had hated them while they went on in sin, ch. ix. 15; but, now they return and repent, he loves them, not only ceaseth to be angry with them, but takes a complacency in them, and designs their good. He loves them freely, with an absolute, entire love, (so some,) so that there are no remains of his former displeasure; with a liberal, bountiful love, so others. He will be open-handed in his love to them, and will think nothing too much to bestow upon them, or to do for them. Or, with a cheerful, willing love; he will love them without reluctancy or retinency.

He will not say in the day of thy repentance, How shall I receive thee again? as he said in the day of thine apostacy, How shall I give thee up? Or, with an unmerited, preventing love. Whom God loves he loves freely, not because they deserve it, but of his own good pleasure; he loves because he will love, Deu. vii. 7, 8.

Fourthly. Do they pray that God will give good? will make them good? In answer to that, behold it is promised, "I will be as the dew unto Israel," ver. 5. Observe,

1. What shall be the favour God will bestow upon them. It is the blessing of their father Jacob, "God give thee the dew of heaven," Gen. xxvii. 28. Nay, what they need God will not only give them, but he will himself be that to them, all that which they need, "I will be as the dew unto Israel." This speaks spiritual blessings in heavenly things; and it follows upon the healing of their backslidings, for pardoning mercy is always accompanied with renewing grace. Note, To Israelites indeed God himself will be as the dew. He will instruct them, his doctrine shall drop upon them as the dew, Deu. xxxii. 2. They shall know more and more of him, for he will come to them "as the rain," Hos. vi. 3. He will refresh them with his comforts, so that their souls shall be as "a watered garden," Isa. lviii. 11. He will be to true penitents "as the dew to Israel," when they were in the wilderness, dew that had manna in it, Ex. xvi. 14; Num. xi. 9. The graces of the Spirit are the hidden manna, hidden in the dew; God will give them bread from heaven, as he did to Israel in the dew, in abundance, Jno. i. 16.

2. What shall be the fruit of that favour which shall be produced in them. The grace thus freely bestowed on them shall not be in vain. Those souls, those Israelites, to whom God is as the dew, on whom his grace distils,

1st. They shall be growing. The bad being by the grace of God made good, they shall by the same grace be made better; for grace, wherever it is true, is growing. First. They shall grow upwards, and be more flourishing; shall grow as the lily, or, as some read it, shall blossom as the rose. The growth of the lily, as that of all bulbous roots, is very quick and speedy. The root of the lily seems lost in the ground all winter, but when it is refreshed with the dews of the spring, it starts up in a little time; so the grace of God improves young converts sometimes very fast. The lily, when it is come to its height, is a lovely flower, Mat. vi. 29; so grace is the comeliness of the soul, Eze. xvi. 14. It is the beauty of holiness that is produced by the "dew of the morning," Ps. cx. 3. Secondly. They shall grow downwards, and be more firm. The lily indeed grows fast and grows fine, but it soon fades, and is easily plucked up; and therefore it is here promised to Israel that with the flower of the lily he shall have the root of the cedar. He shall cast forth his fruits as Lebanon, as the trees of Lebanon, which, having taken deep root, cannot be plucked up, Am. ix. 15. Note, Spiritual growth consists most in the growth of the root, which is out of sight. The more we depend upon Christ, and draw sap and virtue from him, the more we act in religion from a principle, and the more stedfast and resolved we are in it the more we cast forth our roots. Thirdly. They shall grow round about; ver. 6, "His branches shall spread" on all sides. And, ver. 7, He shall grow as the vine, whose branches extend farthest of any tree. Joseph was to be a fruitful bough, Gen. xlix. 22. When many are added to the church from without, when a hopeful generation riseth up, then Israel's branches spread. When particular believers abound in good works, and increase in the knowledge of God and in every good gift, then their branches may be said to spread; the inward man is renewed day by day.

2nd. They shall be graceful and acceptable both to God and man. Grace is an amiable thing, and makes those that have it truly amiable. They are here compared to such trees as are pleasant, First. To the sight. "His beauty shall be as the olive-tree," which is always green; "The Lord called thy name a green olive-tree," Jer. xi. 16. Ordinances are the beauty of the church, and in them it is and shall be ever green. Holiness is the beauty of a soul; when those that believe with the heart make profession with the mouth, and justify and adorn that profession with an agreeable conversation, then their beauty is as the olive-tree, Ps. lii. 8. It is a promise to the trees of righteousness that their leaf shall not wither. Secondly. To the smell. His smell shall be as Lebanon, ver. 6, and his scent as "the wine of Lebanon," ver. 7. This was the praise of their father Jacob; "The smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed," Gen. xxvii. 27. The church is compared to a "garden of spices," Cant. iv. 12, 14, which "all her garments smell of." True believers are acceptable to God and approved of men; God "smells a sweet savour from their spiritual sacrifices," Gen. viii. 21; and they are "accepted of the multitude of their brethren." Grace is the perfume of the soul, the perfume of the name; makes it like precious ointment, Eccl. vii. 1. The memorial thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon, so the margin reads it; not only their reviving comforts now, but their surviving honours when they are gone, shall be as the wine of Lebanon, that has a delicate flavour. Flourishing churches have "their faith spoken of throughout the world," Rom. i. 8, and "leave their name to be remembered," Ps. xlv. 17; and the memory of flourishing saints is blessed, and shall be so, as theirs who by faith obtained a good report.

3rd. They shall be fruitful and useful. The church is compared here to the vine and the olive, that bring forth useful fruits to the honour of God and man. Nay, the very shadow of the church shall be agreeable; ver. 7, "They that dwell under his shadow shall return." 'Under God's shadow,' so some; 'under the shadow of the Messias,' so the Chaldee. Believers "dwell under God's shadow," Ps. xci. 1, and there they are and may be safe and easy. But it is rather, under the shadow of Israel, under the shadow of the church. Note, God's promises pertain to those, and those only, that dwell under the church's shadow, that attend on God's ordinances, and adhere to his people; not those that flee to the shadow only for shelter in a hot gleam, but that dwell under it, Ps. xxvii. 4. We may apply it to particular believers. When a man is effectually brought home to God, all that dwell under his shadow fare the better for it. Children, servants, subjects, friends, this day is salvation come to this house. They that dwell under the shadow of this church shall return, their drooping spirits shall return, and they shall be refreshed and comforted. He "restoreth my soul," Ps. xxiii. 3. "They shall revive as the corn," which when it is sown dies first, and then revives and "brings forth much fruit," Jno. xii. 24. It is promised that God's people shall be blessings to the world, as corn and wine are. And a very great and valuable mercy it is to be serviceable to our generation. Comfort and honour attend it.

8 Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?
I have heard him, and observed him:
I am like a green fir tree.
From me is thy fruit found.
9 Who is wise, and he shall understand these things?
Prudent, and he shall know them?
For the ways of the LORD are right, and the just shall walk in them:
But the transgressors shall fall therein.

CONE AND NUT OF THE STONE PINE.—ver. 8.

Let us now hear the conclusion of the whole matter.

First. Concerning Ephraim. He is spoken of, and spoken to, ver. 8.

1. Here is his repentance and reformation; "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" As some read it, God here reasons and argues with him why he should renounce idolatry: 'O Ephraim! what to me and idols?' What concord or agreement can there be between me and idols? What "communion between light and darkness, between Christ and Belial?" 2 Cor. vi. 14, 15. Therefore thou must break off thy league with them, if thou wilt come into covenant with me. As we read it, God promiseth to bring Ephraim, and keep him to this: "Ephraim shall say," (God will put it into his heart to say it,) "What have I to do any more with idols?" He had promised, ver. 3, not to "say any more to the works of his hands, Ye are my gods." But God's promises to us are much more our security and our strength, for the mortifying of sin, than our promises to God; and therefore God himself is here surety for his servant to good, will put it into his heart, and into his mouth. And, whatever good we say or do at any time, it is he that works it in us. Ephraim had solemnly engaged not to call his idols his gods, but God here engageth farther for him, that he shall resolve to have no more to do with them. He shall abolish them, he shall abandon them, and that with the utmost detestation; for it is necessary, not only that in our lives we be turned from sin, but that in our hearts we be turned against sin. See here, 1st. The power of Divine grace. Ephraim had been "joined to idols," ch. iv. 17, was so fond of them, that one would have thought he could never have fallen out with them; and yet God will work such a change in him, that he shall loathe them as much as ever he loved them. 2nd. See the benefit of sanctified afflictions. Ephraim had smarted for his idolatry, it had brought one judgment after another upon him, and this at length is the fruit, even the "taking away of his sin," Isa. xxvii. 9. 3rd. See the nature of repentance. It is a firm and fixed resolution to have no more to do with sin. This is the language of a penitent: I am ashamed that ever I had to do with sin, but I have had enough of it, I hate it, and by the grace of God I will never have any thing to do with it again, no, not with the occasions of it. Thou shalt say to thine idol, "Get thee hence," Isa. xxx. 22, shalt say to the tempter, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

2. Here is the gracious notice God is pleased to take of it: "I have heard him, and observed him;" I have heard, and will look upon him; so some read it. Note, The God of heaven takes cognizance of the penitent reflections and resolutions of returning sinners. He expects and desires the repentance of sinners, because he hath no pleasure in their ruin. "He looks upon men," Job. xxxiii. 27; "hearkens and hears," Jer. viii. 6; and if there be any disposition to repent he is well pleased with it. When Ephraim bemoans himself before God, he is a dear son, he is a pleasant child, Jer. xxxi. 20; he meets penitents with mercy, as the father of the prodigal met his returning son. God observed Ephraim, to see whether he would bring forth fruits meet for his profession of repentance that he made, and whether he would continue in this good mind. He observed him, to do him good and comfort him, according to the exigences of his case.

3. Here is the mercy of God designed for him, in order to his comfort and perseverance in his resolutions; still God will be all in all to him. Before Israel was compared to a tree, now God compares himself to one. He will be to his people, 1st. As the branches of a tree: "I am like a green fir-tree," and will be so to thee. The fir-trees in those countries were exceeding large and thick, and a shelter against sun and rain. God will be to all true converts both a delight and a defence; under his protection and influence they shall both dwell in safety and dwell at ease. He will be either a sun and a shield or a shade and shield, according as their case requires. They shall sit down "under his shadow with delight," Cant. ii. 3; he will be so all weathers, Isa. iv. 6. 2nd. As the root of a tree; "From me is thy fruit found." Which may be understood either of the fruit brought forth to us,—to him we owe all our comforts; or, of the fruit brought forth by us,—from him we receive grace and strength to enable us to do our duty. Whatever fruits of righteousness we bring forth, all the praise of them is owing to God; for he works in us both to will and to do that which is good.

Secondly. Concerning every one that hears and reads the words of the prophecy of this book; ver. 9, "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things?" Perhaps the prophet was wont to conclude the sermons he preached with these words, and now he closeth the whole book with them, in which he had committed to writing some fragments of the many sermons he had preached. Observe,

1. The character of those that do profit by the truths here delivered. Who is wise and prudent, he shall understand these things, he shall know them. Those that set themselves to understand and know these things thereby make it to appear that they are truly wise and prudent, and will thereby be made more so. And if any do not understand and know them, it is because they are foolish and unwise. Those that are wise in the doing of their duty, that are prudent in practical religion, they are most likely to know and understand both the truths and providences of God, which are a mystery to others, Jno. vii. 17. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," Ps. xxv. 14. "Who is wise?" This intimates a desire that those who read and hear things would understand them,—O that they were wise! and a complaint that few were so,—Who has believed our report?

2. The excellency of the things concerning which we are here instructed. "The ways of the Lord are right;" and therefore it is our wisdom and duty to know and understand them. The way of God's precepts, in which he requires us to walk, is right, agreeing with the rules of eternal reason and equity, and having a direct tendency to our eternal felicity. The ways of God's providence, in which he walks towards us, are all right; no fault is to be found with any thing that God doth, for it is all well done. His judgments upon the impenitent, his favours to the penitent, they are all right. However they may be perverted and misinterpreted, God will at last be justified and glorified in them all. His ways are equal.

3. The different use which men make of them. 1st. The right ways of God to those that are good are, and will be, a savour of life unto life; "The just shall walk in them;" they shall conform to the will of God both in his precepts and providences, and shall have the comfort of so doing. They shall well understand the mind of God, both in his word and in his works, and shall be well reconciled to both, and shall accommodate themselves to God's intention in both. The just shall walk in those ways towards their great end, and shall not come short of it. 2nd. The right ways of God to those that are wicked will be a savour of death unto death. "The transgressors shall fall," not only in their own wrong ways, but even in the right ways of the Lord. Christ, that is a foundation stone to some, is to others a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence. That which was ordained to life, through their abuse of it becomes death to them. God's providences being not duly improved by them, harden them in sin, and contribute to their ruin. God's discovery of himself, both in the judgments of his mouth and in the judgments of his hand, is to us according as we are affected under it. Recipitur ad modum recipientis,—'What is received influences according to the qualities of the receiver.' The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. But of all transgressors, those certainly have the most dangerous fatal falls that fall in the ways of God, that split on the Rock of ages, and suck poison out of the balm of Gilead. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid of this.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF HOSEA.

The period of time within which the twelve minor prophets flourished includes the entire prophetic cycle of more than four hundred years—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, having also lived in it. It is unquestionably the most eventful in the history of the Hebrews. It embraces the introduction of image worship, and that of Phœnician idolatry, with all its attendant evils, among the Israelites; the regicidal murders and civil wars which shook their kingdom to its centre; the corruptions of the Jewish state in consequence of its adoption of the idolatrous practices of the northern tribes; the Assyrian and Egyptian alliances; the irruption of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Chaldean armies into Palestine; the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities; the Persian conquests; the release of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land; and the state of affairs at Jerusalem during the governorship of Nehemiah. Upon all these various events and circumstances, the predictions, warnings, threatenings, promises, and moral lessons, have, in a multiplicity of aspects, a more or less pointed and important bearing. Events subsequent to this period likewise form the subjects of prophetic announcement, such as the progress of Alexander the Great; the successes of the Maccabees; the corruptions which prevailed in the last times of the Jewish state; the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; the dispersion, future conversion, and restoration of the Jews; and the universal establishment of true religion throughout the world. Intermingled with these topics, and giving to each a significance and interest which it could not otherwise have possessed, are some of the clearest and most illustrious predictions respecting the Messiah, in his Divine and human, his sacerdotal and suffering, and his regal and all-conquering character, that are to be found in the Old Testament.—It is impossible seriously to peruse this collection of prophetical writings without discovering the omniscient eye to which all future events, with the most minute of their attendant circumstances, are present; the omnipotent arm, which, in the most difficult cases, secures the accomplishment of the Divine purposes; the glorious attributes of Jehovah as the moral governor of the universe, and the special friend and protector of his people; the deep depravity of the human heart; the multiform phases of moral evil; and the just retributions which befall mankind in the present state of existence. These, and numerous subjects of a kindred nature, furnish abundance of matter "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," which, while it is able to make "men wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus," is also admirably fitted to "make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works, 2 Tim. iii. 15—17.—The Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets, translated from the original Hebrew, with a Commentary, by E. Henderson, D.D., to which valuable work we are indebted for other notes marked H. The following remarks by Hengstenberg throw great light on the character and history of the Israelites at the period of Hosea's prophetical ministry. The kingdom of Israel, from its very commencement, contained within itself a twofold germ of destruction, the institution of the worship of the calves, and the apostacy from the dynasty of David. I. As to the former, the consequence of this apparently isolated violation of a Mosaic ordinance extended much farther than would appear on a superficial vew. It was shewn here also that a little leaven leavens the whole lump. Still more important than the low conceptions of God which were caused by this symbolical representation of him was another aspect of the transaction. The prohibition of the worship of images in the Pentateuch was as definite and clear as possible. The kings of Israel were far from rejecting this prohibition; but as they allowed themselves to pervert and explain away this law against their better conscience, probably asserting that it was given only in reference to the rude and sensual conception of the first generations, so were they prepared to do this in other instances also, as often as they were incited by their corrupt heart. Every action of conscious unfaithfulness which is nevertheless cherished, and both internally and outwardly excused, must draw after it a total apostacy in the case of a community, no less than in that of an individual. Moreover, this first change in the nature of religion proceeded from the civil power, which secured to itself for the future also unlimited influence in the affairs of religion, by bringing into subjection the ecclesiastical power, which was independent and opposed to it. The Levites, who declared against the worship of the calves, without resorting to the miserable sophistry which the king invented to excuse it, were exiled; and, in their place, creatures of the king were made ministers of the sanctuary, and this measure would subject (compare the remarkable passage, Am. vii. 13) the sanctuary, and the whole substance of religion, to the caprice of the king, in direct contradiction to the Mosaic constitution; the consequence of this would necessarily be the more disastrous the more corrupt the kings were, and, from the base foundation on which the regal power rested, necessarily must be. With the worship of images idolatry was soon connected. But neither are we to regard this as an open opposition to the true God. Such opposition is found only during one reign, that of Ahab, in which the apostacy was carried to the utmost extremity. That it has been supposed to be practised at other times, is wholly owing to the circumstance that the Scripture, disregarding the multitude of wretched excuses, calls that a direct apostacy from God which was so as to its essence, though not its outward form. Men rendered outward obedience to Jehovah; they celebrated his feasts; they brought the sacrifices prescribed in the Pentateuch; they regulated, in general, the whole of religion, according to his ordinances, as may be shewn from the books of Kings, and still more from Amos and Hosea; but they contrived a way of identifying light with darkness, that is, of combining the worship of idols with the worship of the true God. Outwardly, the worship of Jehovah would predominate, but inwardly idolatry would be exalted to an almost sole dominion. And the danger was increased by the very circumstance, that they still continued to rely on the covenant and the promises of Jehovah, and on their outward service, and thus were strengthened in their false security. The natural consequence of this apostacy from the Lord was a frightful corruption of manners. The first result of this spiritual adultery was that which is corporeal. Licentiousness constituted a fundamental principle, as of the Asiatic religions in general, so especially of those with whom the Israelites came into contact. But the deadly influence spread still wider over the whole region of morals. Where there is no holy God, there there are no efforts of man after holiness. All Divine and human rights were trampled under foot; all the bands of love, of law, and of order, were dissolved. Thus is the condition of the land, in a moral respect, uniformly described by its two prophets: compare, for example, ch. iv. 1, 2, "There is no faithfulness and no love, and no knowledge of God in the land. To curse, and lie, and murder, and steal, and commit adultery; they break through, and blood touches blood." From this moral corruption, then, again followed the internal dissolution of the state, and its external weakness. The supernatural consequence of the apostacy from the Lord was a severe punishment which he inflicted upon the people. God will be sanctified upon him with whom he enters into a near and gracious relation, when, by the person's own fault, he is not sanctified in him. Because Israel was the people of the Lord, he could not always continue to appear outwardly what inwardly he no longer was. II. As the second germ of corruption, we pointed out the apostacy from the house of David. His dominion rested on a Divine right. The new Israelitish kingdom was built on the sandy foundation of human caprice. Its first king had raised himself to the throne by his own power and cunning, and the favour of the people. Every one, who had the same means in his possession, believed that they gave him a right to do the like. And thus dynasty succeeded dynasty, regicide followed regicide; in the bloody conflict thus occasioned the people became more and more lawless; sometimes interregnums occurred, times of total anarchy; by these internal struggles the power of the state to resist invaders was continually more and more weakened. No king could stop this fountain of adversity, for to do this he must have given up his existence as a king. And just as little could he apply a remedy to the other sources of evil; for, if once the religious partition-wall between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah was removed, the civil one also threatened to fall. Such, in general, were the circumstances under which Hosea, like the other prophets of the kingdom of Israel, came forward. That these circumstances were far more difficult than those in the kingdom of Judah, is obvious. There also was the corruption great, but it was not so closely interwoven with the foundation of the whole state. Thorough reforms, such as those under Hezekiah and Josiah, were possible; and in the outward preservation of the true religion the interests of a whole tribe were concerned. The reign of Jeroboam II., which was outwardly highly prosperous, and in which Hosea entered upon his prophetical office, had still more increased the apostacy from the Lord, and the corruption of manners, and therefore laid the foundation of the series of misfortunes, which, beginning soon after his death, conducted the people with rapid steps to their total ruin. They were still more confirmed in their security by prosperity; for, instead of being led by the unmerited mercy of God to repentance, (compare 2 Kin. xiv. 26, 27,) they regarded this prosperity as a reward of their apostacy, as a seal whereby Jehovah-Baal confirmed the correctness of their course. The false prophets did their utmost to strengthen them in their delusion; the true preached to deaf ears. Immediately after the death of Jeroboam it began to appear which of the two had the truth on their side. A ten years' interregnum followed. After its termination, Jeroboam's son Zachariah began to reign; but in the short space of six months he was murdered by Shallum, 2 Kin. xv. 10. This king was slain by Menahem after he had reigned only a month, 2 Kin. xv. 14. Menahem reigned ten years in Samaria. Even in his reign the catastrophe was preparing which brought the kingdom to total ruin. He became tributary to the Assyrian king Phul, 2 Kin. xv. 19—21. He was followed by his son Pekahiah, in the fiftieth year of Uzziah. After a two years' reign, this prince was slain by Pekah the son of Remaliah, who held the throne twenty years, 2 Kin. xv. 27, and by his alliance with the king of Assyria against Judah (compare Isa. vii.) hastened the ruin of Israel. The Assyrians, under Tiglath-pileser, who had been summoned by Ahaz, carried away into exile, even at that time, a portion of the citizens, the tribes beyond the Jordan. Pekah was slain by Hoshea, in the fourth year of Ahaz, who began to reign in the twelfth year of Ahaz, 2 Kin. xvii. 1, after an interregnum of eight years. He became tributary to Shalmanassar, and at the end of his nine years' reign was also the end of the kingdom of the ten tribes. By an attempted alliance with Egypt, he brought the vengeance of the king of Assyria upon himself and his people.

Chap. I.—5. Valley of Jezreel. Since called Esdraelon, consisting of the broad elevated plain which stretches from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, near mount Carmel.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO HOSEA.

CHAP. II.—8. Baal. Baal was perhaps the most ancient of all the gods worshipped in the East. He was, according to Dr. Munter, the representative of the sun, the generative power in the eastern mythology, and had associated with him Astarte, the female power, which was viewed as representing the moon. Gesenius, however, is of opinion that, under these names, the planets Jupiter and Venus were worshipped. From the frequency with which his name occurs in compound Phœnician names, as Hannibal, Hasdrubal, &c., the worship of Baal appears to have been common among that people, and from them, especially the Tyrians, it was borrowed by the Israelites. Mention is made of this idolatry in the time of the Judges; (see Jud. ii. 11, 13; iii. 7; vi. 25;) it became prevalent even in Judah in the days of Ahaz; and, though abolished by the pious king Josiah, was revived by Manasseh. In Israel it rapidly gained ground after the introduction of the worship of the golden calves by Jeroboam, and reached its height in the reigns of Ahab and Hoshea.—H. 23. Thou art my people. The sentences in the latter part of this verse are very abrupt, but exceedingly expressive. Leaving out those supplied by the translators, and which unnerve the passage, it stands thus: I will say to NOT MY PEOPLE, THOU MY PEOPLE; and they shall say, MY GOD.—A. Clarke.

CHAP. III.—4. Without teraphim. This was true during the captivity, and is true at this day. The mournful comment on this of Rabbi Kimchi, as quoted in Pictorial Bible, deserves attention. 'These are the days of the captivity, in which we are at this day.' (Kimchi wrote in the twelfth century.) 'We have no king nor prince out of Israel, for we are in the power of the Gentiles, and of their kings and princes. We have no sacrifices for God, nor images for idols; no ephod, for God, that declares future things; nor any teraphim, for idolatry, which shews things to come, according to the mind of those that believe in them.'—They have had neither priests nor sacrifice, their temple being destroyed, where only they were to offer sacrifice. And yet the want of a place where to perform the most solemn part of their public worship does not tempt them to idolatry, or make them fond of image worship, or any such idolatrous practice, which was the epidemical sin of their forefathers.—Lowth. This is surely a most astonishing prophecy of events directly contrary to all human probability, yet undeniably taking place, not on a particular occasion, or for a short time, but through very many revolving centuries, and in the most distant regions. How could Hosea have foreseen this had not God inspired him? And does not this demonstrate (in the only way by which such things can be demonstrated) the Divine inspiration of this prophecy?—Scott. 5. Afterward shall the children of Israel return. No reflection, says Fuller, need here be made, save this, that the superabundant grace of God towards them in their outcast and perishing condition shall not only fill their hearts with gratitude, but inspire them with a holy fear of offending him any more.

CHAP. IV.—9. Like people, like priest. They live upon the sin offerings of the people, and are so far from restraining them that they take delight in seeing them commit iniquity; because, the more they sin, the greater is the number of sin offerings, which are the priests' portion.—Lowth. Thus absolutions, indulgences and dispensations have long enriched the Romish clergy, and spiritual courts have prosecuted such offenders as could afford to pay fines and fees apparently for no other reason; and many such things have been and are done by the professed ministers of religion.—Scott. 12. Their staff declareth unto them. See Supplementary Note on Eze. xxi. 21.

CHAP. V.—15. Till they acknowledge their offence. As God's coming to a people and being with them implies their experiencing efficient protection and aid, so his withdrawment of his presence implies the deprivation of their blessings. The original, like many other Hebrew verbs, conveys not only the idea of contracting guilt, but of suffering its consequences. The latter idea seems to Dr. Henderson to be clearly conveyed in this passage, who accordingly translates the verse as follows:—

> 'I will depart, I will return to my place,
> Till they suffer punishment.
> Then will they seek my face;
> When they are in trouble they will seek me early.'

CHAP. VII.—8. A cake not turned. In the East, having heated the hearth, they sweep one corner, put the cake upon it, and cover it with embers; and in a short time they turn it, cover it again, and continue this several times, till they find it sufficiently baked. 9. Gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth it not. The kingdom is grown old in iniquity, the time of their captivity is at hand, and they are apprehensive of no danger. They are in the state of a silly old man who, through age and infirmities, is become nearly bald, and the few remaining hairs on his head are quite gray; but he does not consider his latter end, is making no provision for that eternity on the brink of which he is constantly standing; does not apply to the Sovereign Physician to heal his spiritual diseases, but calls in the doctors to cure him of old age and death! This miserable state and preposterous conduct we witness every day. O how fast does the human being cling to his native earth! Reader, hear the voice of an old man:—

> 'O my coevals! remnants of yourselves,
> Shall our pale withered hands be still stretched out,
> Trembling at once with eagerness and age,
> With avarice and ambition grasping,—fast
> Grasping at air! For what hath earth beside?
> We want but little, nor that little long.'—A. Clarke.

CHAP. VIII.—5. Thy calf, O Samaria. The calf, or ox, was a supreme deity in Egypt. A white ox was worshipped under the name of Apis at Memphis, and another ox, called Mneris, was worshipped at On, or Heliopolis. See wood engraving, Ps. cxx. The introduction of the worship of the golden calves by Jeroboam, which he must have seen during his residence in Egypt, prepared the way for the adoption by the Israelites of the gross idolatries of the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Chaldeans. 12. But they were counted as a strange thing. Alas! exclaims Scott, in how many places, even among Protestants, is a minister who inculcates the great doctrines of Christianity, as stated at the reformation, accused of preaching a new religion, and bringing strange things to the ears of the people!

CHAP. IX.—6. Memphis. See Supplementary Note on Jer. xlvi. 13. Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus. Tyrus was situated in a beautiful and strongly fortified place by the sea. Samaria was on a mountain, and the territory occupied by the tribe of Ephraim and several of the other nine was distinguished for its fertility. Notwithstanding this, the purposes of God would take effect against it. Perhaps Tyrus is introduced in the comparison, because extensive commerce was carried on by the Israelites with the Phœnician ports. "Judah and the land of Israel were thy merchants," says the prophet, in denouncing Tyre, Eze. xxvii. 17; both have now fallen. See Supplementary Notes on Eze. xxvii., and Mic. i. 6. 17. They shall be wanderers among the nations. Referring to Ephraim, ver. 16, which, distinguished from Israel, means the tribe of Ephraim, whence most of the apostate kings sprang, and where idolatry most abounded. By Israel the other nine tribes are meant, the ten together forming the principal subject of Hosea's prophecies. This distinction is not sufficiently marked in Henry's commentary. As to these ten tribes, no one can tell where they have wandered to, nor in what nations they are to be found. Some have thought they were to be discovered in one country, some in another,—among the American Indians—among the Affghans in the East Indies—among the Nestorians. Wanderers they certainly are, hitherto undiscovered by others, perhaps now even unknown to themselves, says Dr. Adam Clarke. Dr. Henderson is of opinion that they returned with the Jews after the Babylonish captivity, and that there is no ground for expecting them yet to be restored in their tribal capacity. However this may be, even such of them as were incorporated with the Jews have with them been wanderers among the nations for many hundred years, and so continue.

> 'Tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast,
> When shall we flee away and be at rest?'

It is wonderful that these prophecies, so often repeated, and so exactly descriptive of the present state of that favoured nation, after many revolving ages, do not more impress the minds of those who read them with admiration of the foreknowledge of God, and full conviction of the Divine inspiration of the holy Scriptures!

CHAP. X.—11. The general meaning of this verse seems to be that the Ephraimites had been accustomed, in the plenitude of their power, to crush and oppress others, apparently their brethren of the two tribes; but they were now themselves to be brought into subjection to the king of Assyria, by whom they would be placed in circumstances of great hardship in foreign countries.—H. The meaning here given to "tread out," namely, threatening other nations, is very doubtful. M. Henry's is to be preferred, who says, the heifer loved the work, 'because, not being muzzled, she has liberty to eat at pleasure; and the work itself was both dry and easy, and both its own diversion and its own wages.' Scott makes "passing over her fair neck" to denote mild discipline, formerly but ineffectually tried. Henry again is to be preferred. But, saith God, I have a yoke to put upon her fair neck, as fair as it is. "I will make Ephraim to ride;" that is, I will tame them, or cause them to be ridden by the Assyrians.'

CHAP. XI.—4. That take off the yoke on their jaws. There appears to be here an allusion to the moving and pulling forward the collar or yoke of beasts which have been hard at work, to let in the cool air between it and their neck. 'I have often,' says Adam Clarke, 'done this at the land ends in ploughing, when at the turnings the cattle were permitted a few moments to draw their breath.' And I laid meat unto them. Giving them at the same time a bite of grass or hay, to encourage them to go on afresh. Thus God acted with his people, on whose necks was the yoke of his law. How many privileges, advantages, and comforts did he mingle with his precepts to make them at once a righteous and a happy people. 8. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? The mercy of God is here pathetically represented as contending with his justice, to shew that he does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men.—Lowth. It is indeed, in the words of Dr. Henderson, one of the most affecting instances of the infinite tenderness of the Divine compassion to be found in Scripture, the point of which is enhanced by its being introduced immediately after a description of the odious conduct of the Israelites. For suddenly and unexpectedly, says Dr. Smith, the prophet changes. Beams of mercy break from the clouds just now fraught with vengeance. God, to speak in the language of love, feels the relentings of a tender parent; his bowels yearn, his mercy triumphs, his rebellious child shall be pardoned. As the Lion of the tribe of Judah he will exert his power to save his people; he will call his children from the land of their captivity and dispersion, and, with the swiftness of doves, they will fly to him a faithful and a holy people.

CHAP. XII.—5. Even the Lord God of hosts. This, says Bishop Horsley, is no other than he whom the patriarch found at Bethel, who there spake with the Israelites in the loins of their progenitor; he whom the patriarch found at Bethel, by the tenor of the context, was the antagonist with whom he was matched at Peniel, and who wrestled with the patriarch in human form. The conflict was no sooner ended than the patriarch acknowledged his antagonist as God. And, to make the assertion of this precious godhead if possible more unequivocal, he adds, that to him belonged, as his appropriate memorial, that name which is declarative of the very essence of the godhead,—Jehovah is his memorial. See valuable note in this place on the import of the name Jehovah, in Dr. Henderson's work on the Minor Prophets.—'He contended nobly with God, he contended nobly with the angel; he wept and supplicated to him; at Bethel he found him, and there he spake with him; even Jehovah the God of hosts, Jehovah is his memorial.' The Being eminently called the angel of God is one who is, in certain respects and properties, distinct from God, and yet is, at the same time, truly and essentially the same with God.—J. P. Smith.

CHAP. XIII.—2. Kiss the calves. Kissing the idol was and still is a rite of idolatrous worship.

CHAP. XIV.—5-7. I will be as the dew unto Israel, &c. These verses contain gracious promises of God's favour and blessing upon Israel's conversion. In the fifth verse it is described by that refreshment which copious dews give to the grass in summer. If we consider the nature of the climate, and the necessity of dews in so hot a country, not only to refresh but likewise to preserve life,—if we consider also the beauty of the oriental lilies, the fragrance of the cedars which grow upon Lebanon, the beauteous appearance which the spreading olive-trees afford, the exhilarating coolness caused by the shade of such trees, and the aromatic smell exhaled by the cedars,—we shall then partly understand the force of the metaphors here employed by the prophet; but their full energy no one can conceive till he feels alike the want and enjoys the advantage of the particulars referred to in that climate where the prophet wrote.—Lowth. This last remark admits of a farther application. None but he who has experienced spiritual thirst, who has drank of the living water which Christ gives, and dwelt under his shadow, none but he, in short, who has 'felt the want and enjoyed the advantage' of the free, rich grace of God, 'can conceive the full energy' of these expressions. What a glorious prophecy! What a wonderful prophet! How sublime, how energetic, how just! And these promises are not for Israel merely after the flesh; they are for all the people of God. 7. They that dwell under his shadow shall return. The Targum is curious: 'They shall be gathered together from the midst of their captivity; they shall dwell under the shadow of his Christ, and the dead shall revive.' —A. Clarke. 9. The just. The Just One; he who stands justified by the perfectness of his own obedience. The only one of the human race who ever was just, or justified, by his own justice. The plural, except where the matter of the discourse is relative to mere secular transactions, signifies 'the justified,' those that are justified by faith in the Redeemer coming, or to come, and clothed with his righteousness. Transgressors. Or, 'revolters shall stumble therein.' To the incorrigible enemies of God the very scheme of mercy itself will be a cause of error, confusion, and ruin.—Bp. Horsley.

PROCLAIMING

OF THE

PROPHECY OF JOEL,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are altogether uncertain concerning the time when this prophet prophesied. It is probable it was about the same time that Amos prophesied—not for the reason that the rabbins give,—because Amos learns his prophecy with that wherewith Joel concludes his, "The Lord shall roar out of Zion;" but for the reason Dr. Lightfoot gives, because he speaks of the same judgments of locusts, and invasion and fire, that Amos foresees; which is an intimation that they appeared about the same time,—Amos in Israel, and Joel in Judah. Hosea and Obadiah prophesied about the same time. And it appears that Amos prophesied in the days of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, Am. vii. 10. God sent a variety of prophets, that they might strengthen one another's hands and hearts, and that out of the mouth of two or three witnesses every word might be established. In this prophecy, I. The desolations made by hosts of noxious insects is described, ch. i., and part of ch. ii. II. The people are hereupon called to repentance, ch. ii. III. Promises are made of the return of mercy upon their repentance, ch. ii., and promises of the pouring out of the Spirit in the latter days. IV. The cause of God's people is pleaded against their enemies, whom God would in due time reckon with, ch. iii., and glorious things are spoken of the gospel Jerusalem, and of the prosperity and perpetuity of it.

A.M. 3204. B.C. 800.

CHAPTER I.

This chapter is the description of a lamentable devastation made of the country of Judah by locusts and caterpillars. Some think the prophet speaks of it as a thing to come, and gives warning of it beforehand, as usually the prophets did of judgments coming. Others think it was now present, and his business is to affect the people with it, and awaken them by it to repentance. I. It is spoken of as a judgment which there was no precedent of in former ages, ver. 1—7. II. All sorts of people sharing in the calamity are called upon to lament it, ver. 8—13. III. They are directed to look up to God in their lamentations, and to humble themselves before him, ver. 14—20.

THE word of the LORD that came to Joel the son of Pethuel.

2 Hear this, ye old men,
And give ear, all ye inhabitants of the land.
Hath this been in your days,
Or even in the days of your fathers?
3 Tell ye your children of it,
And let your children tell their children,
And their children another generation.

4 That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten;
And that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten;
And that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpiller eaten.

5 Awake, ye drunkards, and weep;
And howl, all ye drinkers of wine,
Because of the new wine; for it is cut off from your mouth.

6 For a nation is come up upon my land,
Strong, and without number,
Whose teeth are the teeth of a lion,
And he hath the cheek teeth of a great lion.

7 He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig tree:
He hath made it clean bare, and cast it away;
The branches thereof are made white.

It is a foolish fancy which some of the Jews have, that this Joel the prophet was the same with that Joel that was the son of Samuel, 1 Sam. viii. 2, yet one of their rabbins very gravely undertakes to shew why Samuel is here called Pethuel; this Joel was long after that. He here speaks of a sad and sore judgment which was now brought, or to be brought, upon Judah for their sins.

Observe,

First. The greatness of the judgment, expressed here in two things: 1. It was such as could not be paralleled in the ages that were past, in history, or in the memory of any living, ver. 2. The old men are appealed to, who could remember what had happened long ago; nay, and "all the inhabitants of the land" are called on to search if they could any of them remember the like. Let them go farther back than their memory, and "prepare themselves for the search of their fathers," if this be a case that would not find an account of the like any record. Note, Times that outdo their predecessors in sin may justly expect to fall under greater and sorer judgments than any their predecessors have felt. It was such as would not be forgotten in the ages to come, ver. 3. "Tell ye your children of it; let them know what dismal tokens of the wrath of God are in store under, that they may take warning, and may learn submission to the things which you have suffered: for it is designed for warning to many also. Yea, "let your children tell their children, and these children another generation." Let them tell it not only as a strange thing, which may surprise posterity, but as a solemn instruction, accidents are reported in our days in the manner of them as such phenomena, as if any thing like the great drought aforetime—as it is said there was a plague and fire, as there was under the great drought, and one great wind—that let them tell it to their children, as those in Israel did of the judgments and to teach the future. Note, We ought to transmit to posterity the memorial of God's judgments as well as of his mercies.

Secondly. The judgment itself. It is an invasion of the country of Judæa by a great army. Many interpreters, both ancient and modern, understand it of armies of men; the troops of the Assyrians, that under Sennacherib took all the defenced cities of Judah, and then, as usual, made sport of the country, and consumed the products of it. Nay, some make the four sorts of animals here named, ver. 4, to signify the four monarchies, which in their turns were oppressive to the people of the Jews, one destroying what another left. Some of the Chaldee paraphrasers understand it of the Babylonish captivity, which happened in the days of the young men, and their multitude, to lay all waste. So the Chaldee paraphrase of verse 6, "Nations, peoples, tongues, languages, possessed the land instead of them." Nations, peoples, tongues, languages, possessed ch. ii. 25, "I restored to them." Nations, peoples, tongues, languages, possessed and ravaging a captive. But it seems plain rather to be understood literally of armies of insects coming upon the land, and eating up the fruits of it. Locusts were one of the plagues of Egypt, of them it is said there never were any like them, nor shall be, Ex. x. 14. Some such as those in Egypt, some such as these in Judæa; some that come into a country for subsistence, and others for multitude, and the mischief they do. That locusts but for a few days, this here seems to have continued for four years successively, as some think, because here are four sorts of insects mentioned, ver. 4, one destroying what the other left; but others think they came all in one year. We are not told in the history of the Old Testament when this happened, but we are sure no word of God fell to the ground. And though a devastation by these insects is primarily intended here, yet it is expressed in such language as is very applicable to the destruction of the country by a foreign enemy invading it; because, if the people were not humbled and reformed by that lesser judgment which devoured the fruits, God would send this greater upon them, which should devour the inhabitants, and by the description of that they are bid to take it for a warning. If the nation of worms do not reduce them, another nation shall come to ruin them. Observe,

1. What these armies are that are sent against them. Locusts and caterpillars, palmer-worms and canker-worms, ver. 4. We cannot now determine precisely the difference between them, any one of them they differed one from another. They were all noisome insects, any one of them destructive and worse a man might easily think with his own strength to encounter; but when they came in vast numbers or attacks of them they were very mighty; not when they came in vast numbers or attacks of them they were very formidable, and set up all before them. Note, God is the Lord of hosts, has all creatures at his command, and when he pleaseth can humble and mortify a proud and rebellious people by the weakest and most contemptible creatures. Man is said to be a worm, and by this it appears he is less than a worm; for when God pleaseth worms are too hard for him, plunder his country, eat up that for which he laboured, destroy the forage, and cut off the subsistence of a potent nation. The weaker the instrument is that God employs, the more is his power magnified.

2. What force and fury they came with. They are here called a nation, ver. 6, because they are embodied, and act by consent, and as it were with a common design; for though "the locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands," Pr. xxx. 27, and it is there mentioned as an instance of their wisdom. It is prudence for those that are weak severally to unite and act jointly. They are strong, for they are without number. The "small dust of the balance" is light and easily blown away, but a heap of dust is weighty; so a worm can do little, (yet one worm served to wither Jonah's gourd,) but numbers of them can do wonders. They are said to have "the teeth of a lion," of "a great lion," because of the great and terrible execution they do. Note, Locusts become as lions when they come armed with a Divine commission. We read of the locusts out of the bottomless pit, that "their teeth were as the teeth of lions," Rev. ix. 8.

3. What mischief they do. They eat up all before them, ver. 4; what one leaves the other devours. They destroy not only the grass and corn, but the trees; ver. 7, The vine is laid waste. These vermin eat the leaves which should be a shelter to the fruit while it ripens, and so that also perisheth and cometh to nothing. They eat the very bark of the fig-tree, and so kill it. Thus the fig-tree doth not blossom, nor is there fruit in the vine.

Thirdly. A call to the drunkards to lament this judgment; ver. 5, "Awake and weep, all ye drinkers of wine." This intimates,

1. That they should suffer very sensibly by this calamity. It should touch them in a tender part; the new wine, which they loved so well, should be cut off from their mouth. Note, It is just with God to take away those comforts which are abused to luxury and excess; to recover the corn and wine which is prepared for Baal, which is made the food and fuel of a base lust. And to them judgments of that kind are most grievous. The more men place their happiness in the gratifications of sense the more pressing temporal afflictions are upon them. The drinkers of water needed not to care when the vine was laid waste, they could live as well without it as they had done, it was no trouble to the Nazarites; but the drinkers of wine will weep and howl. The more delights we make necessary to our satisfaction, the more we expose ourselves to trouble and disappointment.

2. It intimates that they had been very senseless and stupid under the former tokens of God's displeasure; and therefore they are here called to awake and weep. They that will not be roused out of their security by the word of God shall be roused by his rod; those that will not be startled by judgments at a distance shall be themselves arrested by them; and when they are going to take of the forbidden fruit, a prohibition of another nature shall come between the cup and the lip, and cut off the wine from their mouth.

8 Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth
For the husband of her youth.
9 The meat offering and the drink offering is cut off
From the house of the LORD;
The priests, the LORD's ministers, mourn.
10 The field is wasted, the land mourneth;
For the corn is wasted:
The new wine is dried up, the oil languisheth.
11 Be ye ashamed, O ye husbandmen; howl, O ye vine-
For the wheat and for the barley; [dressers,
Because the harvest of the field is perished.
12 The vine is dried up, and the fig tree languisheth;
The pomegranate tree, the palm tree also, and the apple
Even all the trees of the field, are withered: [tree,
Because joy is withered away from the sons of men.
13 Gird yourselves, and lament, ye priests:
Howl, ye ministers of the altar:
Come, lie all night in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God:
For the meat offering and the drink offering is withholden
From the house of your God.

The judgment is here described as very lamentable, and such as all sorts of people should share in. It shall not only rob the drunkards of their pleasure, (if that were the worst of it, it might be the better borne,) but it shall deprive others of their necessary subsistence, who are therefore called to lament, ver. 8, as a virgin laments the death of her lover, to whom she was espoused, but not completely married, yet so as that he was in effect her husband; or, as a young woman lately married, from whom "the husband of her youth," her young husband, or the husband to whom she was married when she was young, is suddenly taken away by death. Betwixt a new married couple that are young, that married for love, and that are every way amiable and agreeable to each other, there is great fondness, and consequently great grief if either be taken away. Such lamentation shall there be for the loss of their corn and wine. Note, The more we are wedded to our creature comforts the harder it is to part with them. See that parallel place, Isa. xxxii. 10—12. Two sorts of people are here brought in, as concerned to lament this devastation, countrymen and clergymen.

First. Let the husbandmen and vinedressers lament, ver. 11. Let them be ashamed of the care and pains they have taken about their vineyards, for it will be all labour lost, and they shall gain no advantage by it; they shall see the fruit of their labour eaten up before their eyes, and shall not be able to save any of it. Note, Those who labour only for "the meat that perisheth," will, sooner or later, be ashamed of their labour. The vinedressers will then express their extreme grief by howling, when they see their vineyards stripped of leaves and fruit, and the vine withered, so that nothing is to be had or hoped for from them, wherewith they might pay their rent and maintain their families. The destruction is particularly described here. "The field is wasted," ver. 10; all is consumed that it produced; "the land mourns," the ground has a melancholy aspect, and looks ruefully; all the inhabitants of the land are in tears for what they have lost, are in fears of perishing for want, Isa. xxiv. 4; Jer. iv. 28. The corn, the bread-corn, which is the staff of life, is wasted; the new wine which should be brought into the cellars for a supply, when the old is drunk, is dried up, is ashamed of having promised so fair what it is not now able to perform. The oil languisheth or is diminished, because (as the Chaldee renders it) the olives are fallen off. The people were not thankful to God as they should have been, for the "bread that strengthens man's heart," the "wine that makes glad the heart," and the "oil that makes the face to shine," Ps. civ. 14, 15; and therefore they are justly brought to lament the loss and want of them, of all the products of the earth which God had given them, either for necessity or for delight. This is repeated, ver. 11, 12: the wheat and barley, the two principal grains. Bread was then made of wheat for the rich and of barley for the poor, so that rich and poor meet together in the calamity. The trees are destroyed, not only the vine and the fig-tree, as before, ver. 7, which were more useful and necessary, but other trees also that were for delight—the pomegranate, palm-tree, and apple-tree, yea all the trees of the field, as well as those of the orchard,—timber-trees as well as fruit-trees. In short, all "the harvest of the field is perished," ver. 11; and by this means "joy is withered away from the sons of men," ver. 12; the joy of harvest, which is used to express great and general joy, is come to nothing, is turned into shame, is turned into lamentation. Note, The perishing of the harvest is the withering of the joy of the children of men. Those that place their happiness in the delights of sense, when they are deprived of them, or any way disturbed in the enjoyment of them, lose all their joy; whereas the children of God, that look upon the pleasures of sense with a holy indifferency and contempt, and know what it is to make God their heart's delight, can rejoice in him as the God of their salvation, even when the fig-tree doth not blossom; spiritual joy is so far from withering then, that it flourisheth more than ever, Hab. iii. 17, 18. Let us see here,

1. What perishing, uncertain things all our creature comforts are. We can never be sure of the continuance of them. Here the heavens had given their rains in due season, the earth had yielded her strength, and when the appointed weeks of harvest were at hand they saw no reason to doubt but that they should have a very plentiful crop; yet then they are invaded by those unthought-of enemies, that lay all waste, and not by fire and sword. It is our wisdom not to lay up our treasure in those things which are liable to so many ill accidents.

2. See what need we have to live in a continual dependence upon God and his providence, for our own hands are not sufficient for us. When we see the full corn in the ear, and think we are sure of it,—nay, when we have brought it home,—if he blow upon it, nay, if he do not bless it, we are not likely to have any good of it.

3. See what ruinous work sin makes. A paradise is turned into a wilderness, a fruitful land, the most fruitful land upon earth, into barrenness, for the iniquity of them that dwelt therein.

Secondly. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, lament, for they share deeply in the calamity. "Gird yourselves" with sackcloth, ver. 13; nay, they do mourn, ver. 9. Observe, The priests are called the "ministers of the altar," for on that they attended, and the ministers of the Lord, of my God, saith the prophet; for in attending on the altar they served him, did his work, and did him honour. Note, They that are employed in holy things are therein God's ministers, and on him they attend. The ministers of the altar used to rejoice before the Lord, and spend their time very much in singing; but now they must lament and howl, for the meat offering and drink offering was "cut off from the house of the Lord," ver. 9; and the same again, ver. 13, "from the house of your God." He is your God in a particular manner; you are in a nearer relation to him than other Israelites are, and therefore it is expected you should be more concerned than others for that which is a hindrance to the service of his sanctuary. It is intimated,

1. That the people, as long as they had the fruits of the earth brought in their season, presented to the Lord his dues out of them, and brought the offerings to the altar, and tithes to them that served at the altar. Note, A people may be filling up the measure of their iniquity apace, and yet may keep a course of external performances in religion.

2. That when the meat and drink failed, the meat offering and drink offering failed of course; and this was the sorest instance of the calamity. Note, As far as any public trouble is an obstruction to the course of religion, it is to be upon that account, more than any other, sadly lamented, especially by the priests, the Lord's ministers. As far as poverty occasions the decay of piety, and the neglect of Divine offices, and starves the cause of religion among a people, it is indeed a sore judgment. When the famine prevailed God could not have his sacrifices, nor could the priests have their maintenance; and therefore let the Lord's ministers mourn.

14 Sanctify ye a fast, call a solemn assembly,
Gather the elders and all the inhabitants of the land
Into the house of the LORD your God,
And cry unto the LORD,
15 Alas for the day!
For the day of the LORD is at hand,
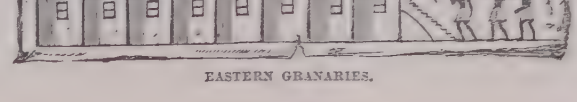
And as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come.
16 Is not the meat cut off before our eyes,
Yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God?
17 The seed is rotten under their clods,
The garners are laid desolate, the barns are broken down;
For the corn is withered.
18 How do the beasts groan! [pasture;
The herds of cattle are perplexed, because they have no



EASTERN GRANARIES.

Yea, the flocks of sheep are made desolate.
19 O LORD, to thee will I cry:
For the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness,
And the flame hath burned all the trees of the field.
20 The beasts of the field cry also unto thee:
For the rivers of waters are dried up,
And the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness.

We have observed abundance of tears shed for the destruction of the fruits of the earth by the locusts, now here we have those tears turned into the right channel, that of repentance and humiliation before God. The judgment was very heavy, and here they are directed to own the hand of God in it, his mighty hand, and to humble themselves under it. Here is,

First. A proclamation issued out for a general fast. The priests are ordered to appoint one. They must not only mourn themselves, but they must call upon others to mourn too. "Sanctify ye a fast;" that is, let some time be set apart from all worldly business, to be spent in the exercises of religion, in the expressions of repentance, and other extraordinary instances of devotion. Note, Under public judgments there ought to be public humiliations; for by them the Lord God calls to weeping and mourning. With all the marks of sorrow and shame sin must be confessed and bewailed, the righteousness of God must be acknowledged, and his favour implored. Observe what is to be done by a nation at such a time. 1st. A day is to be appointed for this purpose, a day of restraint, so the margin reads it. A day in which people must be restrained from their other ordinary occasions, (that they may the more closely attend God's service,) and from all bodily refreshments. For, 2nd. It must be a fast, a religious abstaining from meat and drink, farther than is of absolute necessity. The king of Nineveh appointed a fast, in which they were to taste nothing, Jonah iii. 7. Hereby we own ourselves unworthy of our necessary food, and that we have forfeited it, and deserve to be wholly deprived of it. We punish ourselves, and mortify the body, which has been the occasion of sin; we keep it in a frame fit to serve the soul in serving God; and by the appetite's craving food, the desires of the soul towards that which is better than life, and all the supports of it, are excited. This was in a special manner seasonable, now God was depriving them of their meat and drink; for hereby they accommodate themselves to the affliction they were under. When God saith, You shall fast, it is time to say, We will fast. 3rd. There must be a solemn assembly. The elders and the people, magistrates and subjects, must be gathered together, even "all the inhabitants of the land," that God might be honoured by their public humiliations, that they might thereby take the more shame to themselves, and that they might excite and stir up one another to the religious duties of the day. All had contributed to the national guilt, all shared in the national calamity, and therefore they must all join in the professions of repentance. 4th. They must come together in the temple, "the house of the Lord your God," because that was the house of prayer, and there they might hope to meet with God, because it was the place which he had chosen to put his name there; there they might hope to speed, because it was a type of Christ and his mediation. Thus they interested themselves in Solomon's prayer for the acceptance of all the requests that should be put up in or towards this house, in which their present case was particularly mentioned; 1 Kin. viii. 37, "If there be locust, if there be caterpillar." 5th. They must sanctify this fast, must observe it in a religious manner, with sincere devotion. What is a fast worth if it be not sanctified? 6th. They must "cry unto the Lord." To him they must make their complaint, and offer up their supplication to him. When we cry in our affliction, we must cry to the Lord; this is fasting to him, Zec. vii. 5.

Secondly. Divers considerations suggested to induce them to proclaim this fast, and to observe it strictly.

1. God was beginning a controversy with them. It was time to "cry unto the Lord, for the day of the Lord is at hand," ver. 15. Either they mean the continuance and consequences of this present judgment, which they now saw but breaking in upon them, or some greater judgment, which this was but a preface to. However it be, this they are taught to make the matter of their lamentation; "Alas, for the day, the day of the Lord is at hand." Therefore cry to God. For, 1st. The day of his judgment is very near, it is at hand; it will not slumber, and therefore you should not. It is time to fast and pray, for you have but a little time to turn you in. 2nd. It will be very terrible; there is no escaping it, no resisting it; "as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come:" see Isa. xiii. 6. It is not a correction but a destruction; and it comes from the hand, not of a weak creature, but of the Almighty, and who knows (nay, who doth not know,) the power of his anger? Whither should we go with our cries, but to him from whom the judgment we dread comes? There is no fleeing from him but by fleeing to him; no escaping destruction from the Almighty but by making our submission and supplication to the Almighty. This is "taking hold on his strength, that we may make peace," Isa. xxvii. 5.

2. They saw themselves already under the tokens of his displeasure. It was time to fast and pray, for their distress was very great, ver. 16. 1st. Let them look into their own houses, and there was no plenty there, as used to be. Those who kept a good table were now obliged to retrench; "Is not the meat cut off before our eyes?" We see it wherever we go. Note, Though it is common for the heart not to rue what the eye sees not, yet that heart is hard indeed which trembles not, and humbles not itself, when God's judgments are before the eyes. If, when God's hand is lifted up, men will not see, when his hand is laid on they shall see. Is not the meat many a time cut off before our eyes? Let us then labour for that spiritual meat which is not before our eyes, and which cannot be cut off. 2nd. Let them look into God's house, and see the effects of the judgment there. Joy and gladness were cut off from the house of God. Note, The house of our God is the proper place of joy and gladness. When David goes to the altar of God, it is to God my exceeding joy. But when joy and gladness are cut off from God's house, either by the corruption of holy things, or the persecution of holy persons, when serious godliness decays and love waxes cold, then it is time to cry to the Lord, time to cry, Alas!

The prophet returns to describe the grievousness of the calamity in several particulars of it. Corn and cattle are husbandmen's staple commodities; now here they are deprived of both these. First. The caterpillars have devoured the corn; ver. 17, the garners, which they used to fill with corn, "are laid desolate, and the barns broken down," because the corn is withered, and the owners think it not worth while to be at the charge of repairing them when they have nothing to put in them, nor likely to have any; for "the seed is rotten under the clods," either through too much rain, or (which was the more common case in Canaan) for want of rain, or perhaps some insects under ground eat it up. When one crop fails the husbandman hopes the next will make it up; but here they despair of that, the seedtime being as bad as the harvest. Secondly. The cattle perish too for want of grass; ver. 18, "How do the beasts groan!" This the prophet takes notice of, that the people might be affected with it, and lay to heart the judgment. The groans of the cattle should soften their hard and impenitent hearts. "The herds of cattle," the larger cattle, (black cattle we call them,) they are perplexed, nay, even "the flocks of sheep," who will live upon a common, and take up with very short grass, yet even they are made desolate. See here the inferior creatures suffer for our transgression, and groan under the double burthen of being serviceable to the sin of man and subject to the curse of God for it. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake."

Thirdly. The prophet stirs them up to cry to God, with the consideration of the examples given them for it.

1. His own example; ver. 19, "O Lord, to thee will I cry." He would not put them upon doing that which he would not resolve to do himself; nay, whether they would do it or no, he would. Note, If God's ministers cannot prevail to affect others with the discoveries of Divine wrath, yet they ought to be themselves affected with them; if they cannot bring others to cry to God, yet they must themselves be much in prayer. In time of trouble we must not only pray but cry, must be fervent and importunate in prayer; and to God, from whom both the destruction is and the salvation must be, ought our cry to be always directed. That which engaged him to cry to God was not so much any personal affliction as the national calamity. "The fire has devoured the pastures of the wilderness;" which seems to be meant of some parching, scorching heat of the sun, which was as fire to the fruits of the earth; it consumed them all. Note, When God "calls to contend by fire," it concerns those that have any interest in heaven to cry mightily to him for relief: see Num. xi. 2; Am. vii. 4, 5.

2. The example of the inferior creatures. The beasts of the field do not only groan, but they cry unto thee, ver. 20. They appeal to thy pity, according to their capacity, and as if, though they are not capable of a rational and revealed religion, yet they had something of dependence upon God by natural instinct. At least, when they groan by reason of their calamity, he is pleased to interpret it as if they cried to him; much more will he put such a favourable construction upon the groanings of his own children, though sometimes so feeble that they cannot be uttered, Rom. viii. 26. The beasts are here said to cry unto God, as from him the lions seek their meat, Ps. civ. 21, and the young ravens, Job xxxviii. 41. The complaints of the brute creatures here are for want of water. The rivers are dried up, through the excessive heat, and for want of grass, for "the fire has devoured the pastures of the wilderness." And what better are they than beasts that never cry to God but for corn and wine, and complain of nothing but the want of the delights of sense; yet their crying to God in those cases shames the stupidity of those that cry not to God in any case.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter, we have, I. A farther description of that terrible desolation which should be made in the land of Judah by the locusts and caterpillars, ver. 1—11. II. A serious call to the people, when they are under this sore judgment, to return and repent, and to fast and pray, and seek unto God for mercy, with directions how to do this aright, ver. 12—17. III. A promise that upon their repentance God would remove the judgment, would repair the breaches made upon them by it, and restore unto them plenty of all good things, ver. 18—27. IV. A prediction of the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world, by the pouring out of the Spirit in the latter days, ver. 28—32. Thus the beginning of this chapter is made terrible with the tokens of God's wrath, but the latter end of it made comfortable with the assurances of his favour, and it is in the way of repentance that this blessed change is made. So that though it is only the last paragraph of the chapter that points directly at gospel times, yet the whole may be improved as a type and figure, representing the curses of the law invading men for their sins, and the comforts of the Gospel flowing into them upon their repentance.

BLOW ye the trumpet in Zion,
And sound an alarm in my holy mountain:
Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble:
For the day of the LORD cometh, for it is nigh at hand;
2 A day of darkness and of gloominess,
A day of clouds and of thick darkness,
As the morning spread upon the mountains:
A great people and a strong;
There hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it.
Even to the years of many generations.
3 A fire devoureth before them;
And behind them a flame burneth:
The land is as the garden of Eden before them,
And behind them a desolate wilderness;
Yea, and nothing shall escape them.
4 The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses;
And as horsemen, so shall they run.
5 Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap,
Like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble,
As a strong people set in battle array.
6 Before their face the people shall be much pained:
All faces shall gather blackness.
7 They shall run like mighty men;
They shall climb the wall like men of war;
And they shall march every one on his ways,
And they shall not break their ranks:
8 Neither shall one thrust another;
They shall walk every one in his path:
And when they fall upon the sword, they shall not be wounded.

9 They shall run to and fro in the city;
They shall run upon the wall, they shall climb up upon the houses;
They shall enter in at the windows like a thief.
10 The earth shall quake before them;
The heavens shall tremble:
The sun and the moon shall be dark,
And the stars shall withdraw their shining:
11 And the LORD shall utter his voice before his army:
For his camp is very great:
For he is strong that executeth his word:
For the day of the LORD is great and very terrible;
And who can abide it?

Here we have God contending with his own professing people for their sins, and executing upon them the judgment written in the law; Deu. xxviii. 42, "The fruit of thy land shall the locust consume," which was one of those diseases of Egypt that God would bring upon them, ver. 60.

First. Here is the war proclaimed; ver. 1, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion;" either to call the invading army together, and then the trumpet sounds a charge, or rather to give notice to Judah and Jerusalem of the approach of the judgment, that they might prepare to meet their God in the way of his judgments, and might endeavour by prayers and tears—the church's best artillery—to put by the stroke. It was the priests' business to sound the trumpet, Num. x. 8, both as an appeal to God in the day of their distress and a summons to the people to come together to seek his face. Note, It is the work of ministers to give warning from the word of God of the fatal consequences of sin, and to reveal his wrath from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. And though it is not the privilege of Zion and Jerusalem to be exempted from the judgments of God, if they provoke him, yet it is their privilege to be warned of them, that they may make their peace with him. Even in the holy mountain the alarm must be sounded, and then it sounds most dreadful, Am. ii. 2. Now, "shall a trumpet be blown in the city," in the holy city, "and the people not be afraid?" Sure they will; Am. iii. 6, "Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble." They shall be made to tremble by the judgment itself. Let them therefore tremble at the alarm of it.

Secondly. Here is a general idea given of the day of battle, which cometh, which is nigh at hand, and there is no avoiding it. It is the day of the Lord, the day of his judgment, in which he will both manifest and magnify himself. It is "a day of darkness and gloominess," ver. 2; literally so, the swarms of locusts and caterpillars being so large and so thick as to darken the sky, Ex. x. 15, or rather figuratively; it will be a melancholy time, a time of grievous affliction. And it will come "as the morning spread upon the mountains;" the darkness of this day will come as suddenly as the morning light, as irresistibly, will spread as far, and grow upon them as the morning light.

Thirdly. Here is the army drawn up in array; ver. 2, They are "a great people and strong." Any one that sees the vast numbers that there shall be of locusts and caterpillars, destroying the land, will say, (as we are all apt to be most affected with what is present,) Surely, never was the like before, nor ever will be the like again. Note, Extraordinary judgments are rare things, and seldom happen, which is an instance of God's patience. When God had drowned the world once he promised never to do it again. The army is here described to be, 1. Very bold and daring. They are as horses, as war horses that rush into the battle, and are not affrighted, Job xxxix. 22; and as horsemen carried on with martial fire and fury, "so shall they run," ver. 4. Some of the ancients have observed that the head of a locust is very like in shape to the head of a horse. 2. Very loud and noisy. "Like the noise of chariots," of many chariots, when driven furiously over rough ground, "on the tops of the mountains," ver. 5. Hence is borrowed part of the description of the locusts which St. John saw rise out of the bottomless pit, Rev. ix. 7, 9, "The shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto the battle; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots, of many horses running to the battle." Historians tell us, that the noise made by swarms of locusts in those countries that use to be infested with them hath sometimes been heard six miles off. The noise is likewise compared to that of a roaring fire. It is like the "noise of a flame" that "devours the stubble," which noise is the more terrible because that which it is the indication of is devouring. Note, When God's judgments are abroad they make a great noise, and it is necessary for the awakening of a secure and stupid world. 3. They are very regular, and keep rank in their march. Though numerous and greedy of spoil, yet they are "as a strong people set in battle array," ver. 5. "They shall march every one on his way," straight forward, as if they had been trained up by the discipline of war to keep their post, and observe their right-hand man. "They shall not break their ranks, nor one thrust another," ver. 7, 8. Their number and swiftness shall breed no confusion. See how God can make creatures to act by rule that have no reason to act by, when he designs to serve his own purposes by them. And see how necessary it is that those who are employed in any service for God should observe order and keep ranks, should diligently go on in their own work, and not stand in one another's way. 4. They are very swift. They "run like horsemen," ver. 4; run "like mighty men," ver. 7; they "run to and fro in the city," and "run upon the wall," ver. 9; when God "sends forth his command on earth," his word "runs very swiftly," Ps. cxlvii. 15. Angels have wings, and so have locusts, when God makes use of them.

Fourthly. Here is the terrible execution done by this formidable army. 1. In the country, ver. 3. View the army in the front, and you will see a fire devouring before them; they consume all as if they breathed fire. View it in the rear, and you will see those that come behind as furious as the foremost; "Behind them a flame burns." When they are gone, then it will appear what destruction they have made. Look upon the fields that they have not yet invaded, and they are as the garden of Eden, pleasant to the eye, and full of good fruits; they are the pride and glory of the country. But look upon the fields that they have eaten up, and they are "as a desolate wilderness," One would not think that these had ever been like the former, and yet so they were perhaps but the day before; or that those should ever be made like these, and yet so they shall be perhaps by to-morrow night; yea, and nothing shall escape them that can possibly be made food for them. Let none be proud of the beauty of their grounds any more than of their bodies, for God can soon change the face of both. 2. In the city they shall "climb the wall," ver. 7; they shall "run upon the houses, and enter in at the window like a thief," ver. 9. When Egypt was plagued with locusts, they filled Pharaoh's houses and the houses of his servants, Ex. x. 5, 6. The locusts out of the bottomless pit—Satan's emissaries, and missionaries of the man of sin—do as these locusts. God's judgments, too, when they come with commission, cannot be kept out with bars and bolts; they will find or force their way.

Fifthly. The impressions that should hereby be made upon the people. They shall find it to no purpose to make opposition; these enemies are invulnerable, and therefore irresistible; "When they fall upon the sword they shall not be wounded," ver. 8. And those that cannot be hurt cannot be stopped, and therefore "before their faces the people shall be much pained," ver. 6; as the merchants are in pain for their trading ships when they hear they are just in the mouth of a squadron of the enemies. One was in pain for his field, another for his vineyard, and "all faces gather blackness," which notes the utmost consternation imaginable. Men in fear look pale; but men in despair look black. The whiteness of a sudden fright, when it is settled, turns unto blackness. What is the matter of our pride and pleasure God can soon make the matter of our pain. The terror that the country should be in is described, ver. 10, by figurative expressions. "The earth shall quake," and "the heavens tremble." Even the hearts that seemed undaunted, so firm that nothing would frighten them, as immovable as heaven or earth, yet shall be seized with astonishment. Or, when the inhabitants of the land are made to quake, it seems to them as if all about them trembled too. Through the prevalency of their fear, or for want of the supports of life they used to have, their eye shall wax dim, and their sight fail them, so that to them "the sun and moon shall" seem to "be dark," and the stars to "withdraw their shining." Note, When God frowns upon men the lights of heaven will be small joy to them. For man, by rebelling against his Creator, has forfeited the benefit of all the creatures. But though this here is to be understood figuratively, there is a day coming when it will be accomplished in the letter, when the heavens shall be rolled together like a scroll, and the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. Particular judgments should awaken us to think of the general judgment.

Sixthly. We are directed to look up to him who is the Commander-in-chief of this formidable army, and that is God himself, ver. 11. It is "his army," it is "his camp;" he raised it, he gives it commission; he "utters his voice before it," as the general useth to give orders to his army what to do, and make a speech to animate the soldiers. It is the Lord that gives the word of command to all these animals, which they exactly observe. Some think with this cloud of locusts God sent terrible thunder, for that is called, "the voice of the Lord," and was another of the plagues of Egypt, and this made the heavens and earth tremble. It is "the day of the Lord," as it was called, ver. 1, for in this war we are sure he carries the day; it must need be his, for his camp is great and numerous; those whom he makes war upon he can, as here, overpower with numbers. And whoever he employs to execute his word, as the minister of his justice, is sure to be made strong, and par negotio,—'equal to what he undertakes.' Whom God gives commission to he girds with strength for the executing of that commission. And this makes the great day of the Lord very terrible to all those who in that day are to be made the monuments of his justice, for who can abide it? None can escape the arrests of God's wrath, can make head against the force of it, or bear up under the weight of it, 1 Sam. vi. 20; Ps. lxxvi. 7.

12 Therefore also now, saith the LORD,
Turn ye even to me with all your heart,
And with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning:
13 And rend your heart, and not your garments,
And turn unto the LORD your God:
For he is gracious and merciful,
Slow to anger, and of great kindness,
And repenteth him of the evil.
14 Who knoweth if he will return and repent,
And leave a blessing behind him;
Even a meat offering and a drink offering unto the LORD [your God?
15 Blow the trumpet in Zion,
Sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly:
16 Gather the people, sanctify the congregation,
Assemble the elders,
Gather the children, and those that suck the breasts:
Let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber,
And the bride out of her closet.
17 Let the priests, the ministers of the LORD,
Weep between the porch and the altar,
And let them say, Spare thy people, O LORD,
And give not thine heritage to reproach,
That the heathen should rule over them:
Wherefore should they say among the people, Where is their God?

We have here an earnest exhortation to repentance, inferred from that desolating judgment described and threatened in the foregoing verses: Therefore now turn ye to the Lord. 1. Thus you must answer the end and intention of the judgment; for it was sent for this end, to convince you of your sins, to humble you for them, to reduce you to your right minds and to your allegiance. God brings us into straits that he may bring us to repentance, and so bring us to himself. 2. Thus you may stay the progress of the judgment. Things are bad with you, but thus you may prevent their growing worse; nay, if you take this course, they will soon grow better. Here is a gracious invitation,

First. To a personal repentance, exercised in the soul; "every family apart, and their wives apart," Zec. xii. 12. When the judgments of God are abroad each person is concerned to contribute his quota to common supplications, having contributed to the common guilt. Every one must mend one, and mourn for one, and then we should all be mended, and all found among God's mourners. Observe,

1. What we are here called to, which will teach us what it is to repent; for it is the same that the Lord our God still requires of us, we having all made work for repentance.

1st. We must be truly humbled for our sins, must be sorry we have by sin offended God, and ashamed we have by sin wronged ourselves, both wronged our judgments and wronged our interests. There must be outward expressions of sorrow and shame, fasting and weeping and mourning? Tears for the trouble must be turned into tears for the sin that procured it. But what will the outward expressions of sorrow avail, if the inward impressions be not agreeable, and not only accompany them, but be the root and spring of them, and give rise to them? And, therefore, it follows, "Rend your heart, and not your garments;" not but that, according to the custom of that age, it was proper for them to rend their garments, in token of great grief for their sins, and a holy indignation against themselves for their folly. But rest not in the doing of that, as if that were sufficient, but be more in care to accommodate your spirits than to accommodate your dress to a day of fasting and humiliation. Nay, rend not your garments at all, unless withal you rend your hearts; for the sign without the thing signified is but a jest and a mockery, and an affront to God. Rending the heart is that which God looks for, and requires; that is, the "broken and contrite heart," which he "will not despise," Ps. li. 17. When we are greatly grieved in soul for sin, so that it even cuts us to the heart to think how we have dishonoured God, and disparaged ourselves by it,—when we conceive an aversion to sin, and earnestly desire and endeavour to get clear of the principles of it, and never to return to the practice of it,—then we rend our hearts for it, and then will God rend the heavens, and come down to us with mercy.

2nd. We must be thoroughly converted to our God, and come home to him when we fall out with sin. "Turn ye even to me," saith the Lord, ver. 12, and again, ver. 13, "Turn unto the Lord your God." Our fasting and weeping is worth nothing if we do not with it turn to God as our God. When we are fully convinced that it is our duty and interest to keep in with him, and are heartily sorry we have ever turned the back upon him, and thereupon by a firm and fixed resolution make his glory our end, his will our rule, and his favour our felicity, then we return to the Lord our God; and this we are all commanded and invited to do, and to do it quickly.

2. What arguments are here used to persuade this people thus to turn to the Lord, and to turn to him with all their hearts. When the heart is rent for sin, and rent from it, then it is prepared to turn entirely to God, and to be devoted entirely to him, and he will have it all or none. Now, to bring ourselves to this, let us consider,

1st. We are sure he is, in the general, a good God. Therefore we must turn to the Lord our God, not only because he has been just and righteous in punishing us for our sins, the fear of which should draw us to him, but because "he is gracious and merciful," in receiving us upon our repentance, the hope of which should drive us to him. He is gracious and merciful, delights not in the death of sinners, but desires they may turn and live. He is slow to anger against those that offend him, but of great kindness towards those that desire to please him. These very expressions are used in God's proclamation of his name, when he caused his goodness, and with it all his glory, to pass before Moses, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. He "repenteth him of the evil;" not that he changeth his mind, but when the sinner's mind is changed God's way towards him is changed, the sentence is reversed, and the curse of the law is taken off. Note, That is genuine, ingenuous, and evangelical repentance which ariseth from a firm belief of the mercy of God, which we have sinned against, and yet are not in despair. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The goodness of God, if it be rightly understood, instead of emboldening us to go on in sin, will be the most powerful inducement to repentance, Ps. cxxx. 4. The act of indemnity brings those to God whom the act of attainder frightened from him.

2nd. We have reason to hope he will, upon our repentance, give us that good which by sin we have forfeited and deprived ourselves of, ver. 14; that he will return and repent, that he will not proceed against us as he has done, but will act in favour of us. Therefore let us repent of our sins against him, and return to him in a way of duty, because then we may hope he will repent of his judgments against us, and return to us in a way of mercy. Now observe, First. The manner of the expectation is very humble and modest; "Who knows if he will?" Some think it is expressed thus doubtfully, to check the presumption and security of the people, and to quicken them to a holy carefulness and liveliness in their repentance, as Jos. xxiv. 19. Or, rather, it is expressed doubtfully, because it is the removal of a temporal judgment that they here promise themselves, which we cannot be so confident of as we may that in the general God is gracious and merciful. There is no question at all to be made but that if we repent of our sins God will forgive them, and be reconciled to us; but whether he will remove this or the other affliction we are under may well be questioned, and yet the probability of it should encourage us to repent. Promises of temporal good things are often made with a peradventure: "It may be you shall be hid," Zeph. ii. 3. David's sin is pardoned, and yet the child shall die; and when David prayed for its life he said as here, "Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me" in this matter likewise? 2 Sam. xii. 22. The Ninevites repented and reformed upon such a consideration as this, Jon. iii. 9. Secondly. The matter of the expectation is very pious. They hope God will return and repent, and "leave a blessing behind him;" not as if he were about to go from them, and they could be content with any blessing in lieu of his presence, but behind him, that is, after he hath ceased his controversy with us, he will bestow a blessing upon us. And what is it? It is a "meat offering and a drink offering to the Lord our God." The fruits of the earth are called a blessing, Isa. lxv. 8, because they depend upon God's blessing, and are necessary blessings to us. They had been deprived of these, and that which grieved them most while they were so was, that God's altar wanted its offerings, and God's priests their maintenance. That, therefore, which they comfort themselves with the prospect of in their return of plenty is, that then there should be meat offerings and drink offerings in abundance brought to God's altar, which they more desired than to see the wonted abundance of meat and drink brought to their own tables. Thus, when Hezekiah was in hopes he should recover of his sickness, he asked, "What is the sign that I shall go up," not to the throne of judgment, or to the council-board, but "to the house of the Lord?" Isa. xxxviii. 22. Note, The plentiful enjoyment of God's ordinances in their power and purity is the most valuable instance of a nation's prosperity, and the greatest blessing that can be desired. If God give the blessing of the meat offering and the drink offering, that will bring along with it other blessings,—will sanctify them, sweeten them, and secure them.

Secondly. They are here called to a public national repentance, to be exercised in the solemn assembly, as a national act, for the glory of God and the excitement of one another, and that the neighbour nations might know and observe what it was that qualified them for God's gracious returns in mercy to them, which they would be the admiring witnesses of. Let us see here,

1. How the congregation must be called together, ver. 15, 16. The trumpet was blown, ver. 1, to sound an alarm of war; but now it must be blown in order to a treaty of peace. God is willing to shew mercy to his people, if he do but find them in a frame fit for it, and therefore, Call them together; "sanctify a fast." By the law many annual feasts were appointed, but only one day in the year was to be observed as a fast,—the day of atonement, a day to afflict the soul; and if they had kept close to God and their duty, there would have been no occasion to observe any more. But now they had by sin brought the judgments of God upon them they are often called to fasting. What was said, ch. i. 14, is here repeated, "Call a solemn assembly," "gather the people," press them to come together upon this errand; "sanctify the congregation," appoint a time for solemn preparation beforehand, and put them in mind to prepare themselves. Let not the greatest be excused, but assemble the elders, the judges, and magistrates; let not the meanest be passed by, but "gather the children, and those that suck the breasts." It is good to bring little children, as soon as they are capable of understanding any thing, to religious assemblies, that they may be trained up betimes in the way wherein they should go. But these were brought even when they were at the breast; and were kept fasting, that by their cries for the breast the hearts of the parents might be moved to repent of sin, which God might justly visit upon their children, so as that the tongue of the sucking child might "cleave to the roof of his mouth," Lam. iv. 4; and that on them God might have compassion, as he had on the infants of Nineveh, Jon. iv. 11. New married people must not be exempted; "Let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet." Let them not take state upon them as usual, nor put on their ornaments, nor indulge themselves in mirth, but apply themselves to the duties of the public fast with as much gravity and sadness as any of their neighbours. Note, Private joys must always give way to public sorrows, both those for affliction and those for sin.

2. How the work of the day must be carried on, ver. 17. 1st. The priests, the Lord's ministers, must preside in the congregation, and be God's mouth to the people, and theirs to God. Who but they should stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God, whose business it was to make intercession upon ordinary occasions? 2nd. They must officiate "between the porch and the altar." There they used to attend about the sacrifices, and therefore, now they have no sacrifices to offer, or next to none, there they must offer up their spiritual sacrifices. There the people must see them weeping and wrestling, like their father Jacob, and be helped into the same devout frame. Ministers must themselves be affected with those things wherewith they desire to affect others. It was "between the porch and the altar" that Zechariah the son of Jehoiada was put to death for his faithfulness; that precious blood God would require at their hands, and therefore, to turn away the judgment threatened for it, there they must weep. 3rd. They must pray. Words are here put into their mouths which they might in their prayers enlarge upon. Their petition must be, "Spare thy people, O Lord." God's people, when they are in distress, can expect no relief against God's justice but what comes from his mercy. They cannot say, Lord, right us, but, Lord, spare us; we deserve the correction; we need it; but, Lord, mitigate it. The sinner's supplication is, Spare us, good Lord: their plea must be taken from the relation wherein they stand to God. They are thy people, and thine heritage, therefore have compassion on them, but especially from the concern of God's glory in their trouble. Lord, "give not thine heritage to reproach," to the reproach of famine. Let not the land of Canaan, that hath so long been celebrated for the glory of all lands, now be made the scorn of all lands; let not the heathen rule over them, as they easily will do, when thine heritage is impoverished, and disabled to subsist. Let not the heathen make them a proverb or a byword, so some read it; let it never be said, As poor and beggarly as an Israelite. Note, The maintaining of the credit of the nation among its neighbours is a blessing to be desired and prayed for by all that wish well to it. But that reproach of the church is especially to be dreaded and deprecated which reflects upon God; let them not "say among the people, Where is their God?" that God who has promised to help them, whom they have boasted so much of, and put such a confidence in. If God's heritage be destroyed, the neighbours will say, that God was either weak, and could not relieve them, or unkind, and would not. God thus triumphs over the pretended deities; Deu. xxxii. 37, "Where are now their gods in whom they trusted?" And Sennacherib thus triumphs over them; "Where are the gods of Hamath and Arpad?" But it must by no means be suffered that any should say of Israel, "Where is their God?" for we are sure our God is in the heavens, Ps. cxv. 2, 3; is in his temple, Ps. xi. 4.

18 Then will the LORD be jealous for his land,
And pity his people.
19 Yea, the LORD will answer and say unto his people,
Behold, I will send you corn,
And wine, and oil, and ye shall be satisfied therewith:
And I will no more make you a reproach among the heathen:
20 But I will remove far off from you the northern army,
And will drive him into a land barren and desolate,
With his face toward the east sea,
And his hinder part toward the utmost sea, [up,
And his stink shall come up, and his ill savour shall come
Because he hath done great things.
21 Fear not, O land; be glad and rejoice:
For the LORD will do great things.
22 Be not afraid, ye beasts of the field:
For the pastures of the wilderness do spring,
For the tree beareth her fruit,
The fig tree and the vine do yield their strength.
23 Be glad then, ye children of Zion,
And rejoice in the LORD your God:
For he hath given you the former rain moderately,
And he will cause to come down for you the rain,
The former rain, and the latter rain in the first month
24 And the floors shall be full of wheat,
And the fats shall overflow with wine and oil.

25 And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten,
The cankerworm, and the caterpiller, and the palmerworm,
My great army which I sent among you.
26 And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied,
And praise the name of the LORD your God,
That hath dealt wondrously with you:
And my people shall never be ashamed.
27 And ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel,
And that I am the LORD your God, and none else:
And my people shall never be ashamed.

See how ready God is to succour and relieve his people, how he waits to be gracious. As soon as ever they humble themselves under his hand, and pray, and seek his face, he presently meets them with his favours. They prayed that God would spare them; and see here with what good words, and comfortable words, he answered them. But God's promises are real answers to the prayers of faith, because with him saying and doing are not two things. Now observe,

First. Whence this mercy promised shall take rise, ver. 18. God will be "jealous for his land, and pity his people." He will have an eye, 1. To his own honour, and the reputation of his covenant with Israel, by which he had conveyed to them that good land, and had given in the value of it very high. Now he will not suffer it to be despised or disparaged, but will be jealous for the credit of his land, and the inhabitants of it, who had been praised as a happy people, and therefore must not lie open to reproach as a miserable people. 2. To their distress. He will "pity his people," and in pity to them he will restore them their forfeited comforts. God's compassion is a great encouragement to those that come humbly to him as penitents and as petitioners.

Secondly. What his mercy shall be, in several instances:

1. The destroying army shall be dispersed and defeated; ver. 20, "I will remove far off from you the northern army," that army of locusts and caterpillars that invaded you from the north, brought in upon the wings of a north wind—an army which you could put no stop to the progress of. But when you have made your peace with God he will ease you of these soldiers that are quartered upon you, and will "drive them into a land barren and desolate," into that vast howling wilderness that Israel wandered in, where, after having surfeited upon the plenty of Canaan, they shall perish for want of sustenance. Those that have their face to the east sea, the Dead Sea, which lay east of Judæa, shall perish in that, and the rear of the army shall be lost in the Great Sea, called here "the utmost sea." They had made the land barren and desolate, and God will cast them into a land barren and desolate. Thus those whom God employs for the correction of his people come afterwards to be themselves reckoned with, and the rod thrown into the fire. Nothing shall remain of these swarms of insects but the ill savour of them. When Egypt was eased of the plague of locusts they were carried away to the Red Sea, Ex. x. 19. Note, When an affliction has done its work it shall be removed in mercy, as the locusts of Canaan were from a penitent people; not as the locusts of Egypt were removed in wrath from an impenitent prince, only to make room for another plague. Many interpreters, by this northern army, understand that of Sennacherib, which was dispersed, when God by it had "accomplished his whole work upon mount Zion, and upon Jerusalem," Isa. x. 12. This enemy shall be driven away, "because he has done great things," has done a great deal of mischief, and has magnified to do it, has done it in the pride of his heart. Therefore it follows, ver. 21, "The Lord will do great things" for his people, as the enemy has done great things against them, to convince them that wherein they deal proudly he is and will be above them; that, what great things soever they did, they did no more than God commissioned them to do; and as, when he said to them, Go, they went, so when he said to them, Come, they came, to shew that they were soldiers under him.

2. The destroyed land shall be watered and made fruitful. When the army is scattered, yet what shall we do if the desolation they have made continue? It is therefore promised, ver. 22, that "the pastures of the wilderness," the pastures which the locusts had left as bare as the wilderness, shall again spring, and the trees shall again bear their fruit, particularly the fig-tree and the vine. But when we see how the country is wasted we are tempted to say, "Can these dry bones live?" "If the Lord should make windows in heaven," it cannot be. But it shall be; for, ver. 23, "The Lord has given," and will give you, "the former rain and the latter rain;" and if he give them in mercy he will give them moderately, so that the rain shall not turn into a judgment; and he will give them in due season, "The latter rain in the first month," when it was wanted and expected. It would make it comfortable to them to see it coming from the hand of God, and ordered by his wisdom, for then we are sure it is well ordered. 'He hath given you a teacher of righteousness,' so the margin reads it, for the same word that signifies 'the rain' signifies 'a teacher;' and that which we translate 'moderately' is, 'according to righteousness.' And this teacher of righteousness, saith one of the rabbins, is the King Messias, and of him many others understand this; for he is a teacher come from God, and he shews us the way of righteousness. But others understand it of any prophet that instructs unto righteousness, and some of Hezekiah particularly; others of Isaiah. Note, It is a good sign God has mercy in store for a people when he sends them teachers of righteousness, pastors after his own heart.

3. All their losses shall be repaired; ver. 25, "I will restore to you the years that the locust has eaten." You shall be comforted according to the time that you have been afflicted, and shall have years of plenty to balance the years of famine. Thus doth it "repent the Lord concerning his servants," when they repent; and, to shew how perfectly he is reconciled to them, he makes good the damage they have sustained by his judgments, and, like the gaoler, "washeth their stripes." Though in justice he distrained upon them, and did them no wrong, yet in compassion he makes restitution; as the father of the prodigal, upon his return, made up all he had lost by his sin and folly, and took him into his family, as in his former estate. The locusts and caterpillars are here called God's "great army," which he sent among them, and he will therefore repair what they had devoured, because they were his army.

4. They shall have great abundance of all good things. The earth shall yield her increase, and they shall enjoy it. Look into the store where they lay up, and you shall find "the floors full of wheat, and the fats overflowing with wine and oil," ver. 24; whereas, in the day of their distress, the "wine and oil languished," and "the barns were broken down," ch. i. 10, 17. Look upon their tables, where they lay out what they have laid up, and you shall find that they "eat in plenty and are satisfied," ver. 26; they do not eat to excess, nor are surfeited. We hope the drunkards are cured by the late affliction of their inordinate love of wine and strong drink; for, though they were brought in howling for their scarcity, ch. i. 5, they are not brought in again here singing for the plenty of it. But now all shall have enough, and shall know when they have enough, for God will make their food nourishing, and give them to be content with it.

These are the mercies promised, and in these God doth great things, ver. 21; "He deals wondrously with his people," ver. 26. Herein he glorifies his power, and shews that he can relieve his people, though their distress be never so great; and glorifies his goodness that he will do it upon their repentance, though their provocations were never so great. Note, When God deals graciously with poor sinners that return to him, it must be acknowledged that he deals wondrously and doth great things. Some expositors understand these promises figuratively, as pointing at the gospel grace, and having their accomplishment in the abundant comforts that are treasured up for believers in the covenant of grace, and the satisfaction of soul they have therein. When God sends us his promises to be the matter of our comfort, his graces to be the grounds of it, and his Spirit to be the author of it, we may well own that he hath sent us, according to his promise here, ver. 19, "corn, and wine, and oil," or that which is unspeakably better, and we have reason to be satisfied therewith.

Thirdly. What use shall be made of these returns of God's mercy to them, and the good account they shall turn to.

1. God shall have the glory of it; for they shall "rejoice in the Lord their God," ver. 23; and what is the matter of their rejoicing shall be the matter of their thanksgiving. They shall "praise the name of the Lord their God," ver. 26, and not praise their idols, nor call their corn and wine the rewards that their lovers had given them. Note, Then the plenty of our creature comforts is a mercy indeed to us, when by them our hearts are enlarged in love and thankfulness to God, who gives us all things richly to enjoy, though we serve him but poorly. When God restores to us plenty, after we have known scarcity, as it is doubly pleasant to us, so it should make us the more thankful to God. When Israel comes out of a wilderness into a Canaan, and there eats and is full, surely he will then bless the Lord with a very sensible pleasure, for that good land which he has given him, Deu. viii. 10.

2. They shall have the credit and comfort and spiritual benefit of it. When God gives them plenty again, and gives them to be satisfied with it, 1st. Their reputation shall be retrieved. They and their God shall be no more reflected upon as unfaithful to one another, when they are returned to him in a way of duty, and he to them in a way of mercy; ver. 19, "I will no more make you a reproach among the heathen," that triumphed in your calamities, and insulted over you. And, ver. 26, and again, ver. 27, "My people shall never be ashamed," as they have been of their good land which they used to boast of, but shall again and ever have the same occasion to boast of it. Note, It redounds much to the honour of God when he doth that which saves the honour of his people; and those that are his people indeed, though they may be for a time, they shall not be always a reproach among the heathen. If we be rightly ashamed of our sins against God we shall never be ashamed of our glorying in God. 2nd. Their joys shall be revived; ver. 23, "Be glad, and rejoice, O land," and all the inhabitants of it. Times of plenty use to be times of joy; yet the favour of God puts gladness into the heart, more than they have whose corn, and wine, and oil increaseth. But especially "be glad, then, ye children of Zion, rejoice in the Lord your God," ver. 23. They mourned in Zion, ver. 15, and therefore there in a particular manner they shall rejoice; for those that sow in penitential tears shall certainly reap in thankful joys. The children of Zion, who led the rest in fasting, must lead the rest in rejoicing. But observe, they shall rejoice in the Lord their God; not so much in the good things themselves that are given them, as in the good hand that gives them, and in the return of his favours to them, as theirs in covenant, which these good things are the tokens and pledges of. The joy of harvest and the joy of a feast must both terminate in God, whose love we should taste in all the gifts of his bounty, that we may make him our chief joy, as he is our chief good, and the fountain of all good to us. 3rd. Their faith in God shall be confirmed and increased. When temporal mercies are made by the grace of God to be of spiritual advantage to us, and plenty for the body is so far from being an enemy, as with many it proves, that it becomes a friend to the prosperity of the soul, then they are mercies indeed to us. This is promised here, ver. 27, "Ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel, the Holy One in the midst of thee," Hos. xi. 9, and that I am the Lord your God, and none else. As it proves that the Lord is God, and there is none other, because he wounds and he heals, he forms light and darkness, he doth good and evil, Isa. xlv. 7; Deu. xxxii. 39; so it proves him to be the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people, and a Father to them; that as a Father he both corrects them when they offend and comforts them when they repent. It was the burthen of the threatenings in Ezekiel's prophecy, Such and such evils I will bring upon you, and "ye shall know that I am the Lord." And the same is here made the crown of the promises, You shall eat and be satisfied, and rejoice, and thus "ye shall know that I am the Lord." Note, We should labour to grow in our acquaintance with God by all providences, both merciful and afflictive. When God gives to his people plenty, and peace, and joy, upon their return to him, he thereby gives them to understand that he is pleased with their repentance, that he has pardoned their sins, and that he is theirs as much as ever; that they are taken into the same covenant with him, for he is the Lord their God, and into the same communion, for he is in the midst of them, nigh unto them in all that they call upon him for; and, as the sun in the centre of the worlds, so in the midst of them as to diffuse his benign influences to all the parts of his land.

3. Even the inferior creatures shall share in it, and be made easy by it; "Fear not, O land," ver. 21; "Be not afraid, ye beasts of the field," ver. 22. They had suffered for the sin of man and for God's quarrel with him, and now they shall fare the better for man's repentance, and God's reconciliation to him. Nay, the beasts were said to cry unto God, ch. i. 20, and now that cry is answered, and they are bid not to be afraid, for they shall have plenty of all that which their nature craves. God, in sparing Nineveh, had an eye to the cattle, Jon. iv. 11; for the cattle had fasted, ch. iii. 8. This may lead us to think of the restitution of all things, when the creature that is now made subject to vanity, and groans under it, shall be brought, though not into the glorious joy, yet "into the glorious liberty of the children of God," Rom. viii. 21.

28 And it shall come to pass afterward,
That I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh;
And your sons and your daughters shall prophesy,
Your old men shall dream dreams,
Your young men shall see visions:
29 And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids
In those days will I pour out my spirit.
30 And I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth,
Blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke.

31 The sun shall be turned into darkness,
And the moon into blood,
Before the great and the terrible day of the LORD come.
32 And it shall come to pass,
That whosoever shall call on the name of the LORD shall be delivered:
For in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance,
As the LORD hath said,
And in the remnant whom the LORD shall call.

The promises of corn, and wine, and oil, in the foregoing verses, would be very acceptable to a wasted country, but here we are taught that we must not rest in those things. God has reserved some better things for us; and these verses have reference to those better things, both the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory, and the happiness of true believers in both. We are here told,

First. How the kingdom of grace shall be introduced by a plentiful effusion of the Spirit, ver. 28, 29. We are not at a loss for the meaning of this promise, nor in doubt what it refers to, and wherein it had its accomplishment, for the apostle Peter has given us an infallible explication and application of it, assuring us that when the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles at the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 1, &c., that was the very thing "which was spoken of here by the prophet Joel." Acts ii. 16, 17. That was the gift of the Spirit, which, according to the prediction, was to come; and we are not to look for any other, no more than for another accomplishment of the promise of the Messiah. Now,

1. The blessing itself here promised is the pouring out of the Spirit of God, his gifts, graces, and comforts, which the blessed Spirit is the Author of. We often read in the Old Testament of the Spirit of the Lord coming by drops, as it were, upon the judges and the prophets whom God had raised up for extraordinary services; but now the Spirit shall be poured out plentifully in a full stream, as was promised with an eye to gospel times, Isa. xliv. 3, "I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed."

2. The time fixed for this is afterwards; after the fulfilling of the foregoing promises this shall be fulfilled. St. Peter expounds this of the last days, the days of the Messiah, by whom the world was to have its last revelation of the Divine will and grace, in the last days of the Jewish church, a little before its dissolution.

3. The extent of this blessing in respect of the person on whom it shall be bestowed. The Spirit shall be "poured upon all flesh," that is, not as hitherto, upon Jews only, but upon Gentiles also, for in Christ there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, Rom. x. 11, 12. Hitherto Divine revelation was confined to the seed of Abraham, none but those of the land of Israel had the spirit of prophecy, but in the last days "all flesh shall see the glory of God," Isa. xl. 5, and shall come to "worship before him," Isa. lxvi. 23. The Jews understand it of all flesh in the land of Israel; and Peter himself did not fully understand it as speaking of the Gentiles, till he saw it accomplished in the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Cornelius and his friends, who were Gentiles, Acts x. 44, 45, which was but a continuation of that same gift which was bestowed on the day of Pentecost. The Spirit shall be poured out "upon all flesh," that is, upon all those whose hearts are made hearts of flesh, soft and tender, and so prepared to receive the impressions and influences of the Holy Ghost. "Upon all flesh," that is, upon some of all sorts of men; the gifts of the Spirit shall not be so sparing, or so much confined, as they have been, but shall be more general and diffusive of themselves. 1st. The Spirit shall be poured out upon some of each sex; Not "your sons" only, but "your daughters" shall prophesy. We read of four sisters in one family that were prophetesses, Acts xxi. 9. Not the parents only, but the children, shall be filled with the Spirit, which intimates the continuance of this gift for some ages successively in the church. 2nd. Upon some of each age; "Your old men" that are past their vigour, and whose spirits begin to decay; "your young men," that have yet but little acquaintance with, and experience of, Divine things, yet they shall "dream dreams," and "see visions," that is, God will reveal himself by dreams and visions both to young and old. 3rd. Upon those of the meanest rank and conditions, even "upon the servants and the handmaids." The Jewish doctors say, 'that prophecy doth not reside in any but such as are wise, valiant, and rich, not upon the soul of a poor man or a man in sorrow;' but in Christ Jesus there is "neither bond nor free," Gal. iii. 28. There were many that were called being servants, 1 Cor. vii. 21, but that was no obstruction to their receiving the Holy Ghost. 4th. The effect of this blessing. "They shall prophesy;" they shall receive new discoveries of Divine things, and that not for their own use only, but for the benefit of the church. They shall interpret Scripture, and speak of things secret, distant, and future, which, by the utmost sagacities of reason and their natural powers, they could not have an insight into or foresight of. By these extraordinary gifts the Christian church was first founded and set up, and the Scriptures written, and ministry settled, by which, with the ordinary operations and influences of the Spirit, it was to be afterwards maintained and kept up.

Secondly. How the kingdom of glory shall be introduced by the universal change of nature, ver. 30, 31. The pouring out of the Spirit will be very comfortable to the righteous; but let the unrighteous hear this and tremble. There is "a great and terrible day of the Lord" coming, which shall be ushered in with wonders in heaven and earth, "blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke," the turning of the sun into darkness and the moon into blood. This is to have its full accomplishment, as the learned Dr. Pocock thinks, in the day of judgment, at the end of time, before which these signs will be performed in the letter of them; yet so as that it was accomplished in part in the death of Christ, which is called the judgment of this world, when the earth quaked and the sun was darkened, and a great and terrible day" it was; and more fully in the destruction of Jerusalem, which was a type and figure of the general judgment, and before which there were many amazing prodigies, besides the convulsions of states and kingdoms prophesied of under the figurative expressions of turning the sun "into darkness, and the moon into blood," and the "wars and rumours of wars," and "distress of nations," which our Saviour spoke of as the beginning of these sorrows, Mat. xxiv. 6, 7. But before the last judgment there will be wonders indeed in heaven and earth,—the dissolution of both, without a metaphor. The judgments of God upon a sinful world, and the frequent destruction of wicked kingdoms by fire and sword, are prefaces to, and presages of, the judgment of the world at the last day. Those on whom the Spirit is poured out shall foresee and foretell that "great and terrible day of the Lord," and expound the "wonders in heaven and earth," that go before it; for as to his first coming, so to his second, did and do all the prophets bear witness, Rev. x. 7.

Thirdly. The safety and happiness of all true believers, both in the first and second coming of Jesus Christ, ver. 32. This speaks of particular persons; for to them the New Testament has more respect, and less to kingdoms and nations, than the Old. Now observe here,

1. That there is a salvation wrought out. Though the day of the Lord will be great and terrible, yet "in mount Zion and in Jerusalem there shall be deliverance" from the terror of it. It is the day of the Lord, the day of his judgment, who knows how to separate between the precious and the vile. In the everlasting Gospel, which went from Zion, in the church of the firstborn, typified by mount Zion, and which is the Jerusalem that is from above, there is deliverance; a way of escaping the wrath to come is found out and laid open. Christ is himself not only the Saviour, but the salvation; he is so to the ends of the earth. This deliverance, laid up for us in the covenant of grace, is the performance of the promises made to the fathers; "There shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said:" see Lu. i. 72. Note, This is ground of comfort and hope to sinners, that, whatever danger there is in their case, there is also deliverance, deliverance for them if it be not their own fault. And if we would share in this deliverance we must apply ourselves to the gospel Zion, to God's Jerusalem.

2. That there is a remnant that are interested in this salvation, and for whom the deliverance is wrought. It is "in this remnant," that is, among them, that the deliverance is; or in them, that is, in their souls and spirits, they are the earnests and evidences of it; "Christ in you the hope of glory." They are called a remnant, because they are but a few in comparison with the multitudes that are left to perish; a little remnant, but a chosen one, a "remnant according to the election of grace." And here we are told who they are that should be delivered in the great day. 1st. Those that sincerely call upon God. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord," whether Jew or Gentile, (for the apostle expounds it so, Rom. x. 13, where he lays this down as the great rule of the Gospel, by which we must all be judged,) "shall be delivered." This calling on God supposeth knowledge of him, faith in him, desire towards him, dependence on him, and, as an evidence of all this, a conscientious obedience to him; for without that, crying, "Lord, Lord," will not stand us in any stead. Note, It is the praying remnant that shall be the saved remnant; and it will aggravate the ruin of those who perish that they might have been saved on such easy terms. 2nd. Those that are effectually called to God. The deliverance is sure to the remnant whom the Lord shall call; not only with the common call of the Gospel, with which many are called that are not chosen, but with a special call into the fellowship of Jesus Christ, 'whom the Lord predestinates or prepares,' so the Chaldee. St. Peter borrows this phrase, Acts ii. 39. Note, Those only shall be delivered in the great day that are now effectually called from sin to God, from self to Christ, from things below to things above.

CHAPTER III.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a gracious promise of deliverance in mount Zion and Jerusalem; now this whole chapter is a comment upon that promise, shewing what that deliverance shall be, how it shall be wrought by the destruction of the church's enemies, and how it shall be perfected in the everlasting rest and joy of the church. This was in part accomplished in the deliverance of Jerusalem from the attempt that Sennacherib made upon it, in Hezekiah's time, and afterwards in the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, and other deliverances wrought for the Jewish church betwixt that and Christ's coming. But it has a farther reference to the great redemption wrought out for us by Jesus Christ, and the destruction of our spiritual enemies and all their agents, and will have its full accomplishment in the judgment of the great day. Here is a prediction. I. Of God's reckoning with the enemies of his people for all the injuries and indignities that they had done them, and returning them upon their own head, ver. 1—8. II. Of God's judging all nations when the measure of their iniquity is full, and appearing publicly, to the everlasting confusion of all impenitent sinners, and the everlasting comfort of all his faithful servants, ver. 9—17. III. Of the provision God has made for the refreshment of his people, for their safety and purity, when their enemies shall be made desolate, ver. 18—21. These promises were not of private interpretation only, but were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of this Scripture might have hope.

FOR, behold, in those days, and in that time,
When I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and [Jerusalem,
2 I will also gather all nations,
And will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat
And will plead with them there
For my people and for my heritage Israel,

CASTING LOTS.—ver 3.

Whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted
3 And they have cast lots for my people; [my land.
And have given a boy for an harlot,
And sold a girl for wine,
That they might drink
4 Yea, and what have ye to do with me, O Tyre, and Zidon,
And all the coasts of Palestine?
Will ye render me a recompence?
And if ye recompense me,
Swiftly and speedily will I return your recompence upon your own head;
5 Because ye have taken my silver and my gold,
And have carried into your temples my goodly pleasant things:
6 The children also of Judah and the children of Jerusalem
Have ye sold unto the Grecians,
That ye might remove them far from their border

SLAVE MARKET.

7 Behold, I will raise them out of the place
Whither ye have sold them,
And will return your recompence upon your own head:
8 And I will sell your sons and your daughters
Into the hand of the children of Judah, [off:
And they shall sell them to the Sabeans, to a people far
For the LORD hath spoken it.

We have often heard of the "year of the Redeemer," and the "year of recompences for the controversy of Zion;" now here we have a description of the transactions of that year, and a prophecy of what shall be done when it comes, whenever it comes, for it comes often, and at the end of time it will come once for all.

First. It shall be the year of the redeemed, for God will "bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem," ver. 2. Though the bondage of God's people may be grievous and very long, yet it shall not be everlasting. That in Egypt ended at length in their deliverance into the glorious liberty of the children of God; "Let my son go that he may serve me." That in Babylon shall likewise end well. And the Lord Jesus will provide for the effectual redemption of poor captived souls from under the dominion of sin and Satan, and will proclaim that acceptable year, the year of jubilee, the release of debts and servants, and the "opening of the prison to them that were bound." There is a day, there is a time fixed, for the bringing again of the captivity of God's children, for the redeeming of them from the power of the grave; and it shall be the last day, and the period of all time.

Secondly. It shall be the "year of recompences for the controversy of Zion." Though God may suffer the enemies of his people to prevail against them very far, and for a long time, yet he will call them to an account for it, and lead captivity captive, Ps. lxviii. 18; will lead those captive that led his people captive, Rev. xiii. 10. Observe,

1. Who they are that shall be reckoned with; "All nations," ver. 2. This intimates, 1st. That all the nations had made themselves liable to the judgment of God, for wrong done to his people. Persecution is the reigning crying sin of the world; that lying in wickedness itself is set against godliness. The enmity that is in the old serpent, the god of this world, against the seed of the woman, appears more or less in the children of this world; "Marvel not if the world hate you." 2nd. That whatever nation injured God's nation, they should not go unpunished; for he that toucheth the Israel of God shall be made to know that he toucheth the apple of his eye. Jerusalem will be a "burthensome stone to all people," Zec. xii. 3; but the neighbour nations shall be particularly reckoned with, "Tyre and Zidon, and all the coasts of Palestine," or the Philistines, who had been troublesome neighbours to the Israel of God, ver. 4. When the more remote and potent nations that laid Israel waste are reckoned with, the impotent malice of these that lay near them, and "helped forward the affliction," Zec. i. 15, and made a hand of it, Eze. xxvi. 2, shall not be passed by. Note, Little persecutors shall be called to an account as well as great ones; and, though they could not do much mischief, shall be reckoned with according to the wickedness of their endeavours, and the mischief they would have done.

2. The sitting of this court for judgment. They shall all be gathered, ver. 2; that they who have combined together against God's people, "with one consent," Ps. lxxxiii. 5, may together receive their doom. They shall be "brought down into the valley of Jehoshaphat," which lay near Jerusalem, and there God "will plead with them." 1st. Because it is fit that criminals should be tried in the same country where they did the fact. 2nd. For their greater confusion, when they shall see that Jerusalem, which they have so long endeavoured and hoped for the ruin of, in spite of all their rage made a praise in the earth. 3rd. For the great comfort and honour of God's Jerusalem, which shall see God pleading their cause. 4th. Then shall be reacted what God did for Jehoshaphat, when he gave him victory over those that invaded him, and furnished him and his people with matter of joy and praise, in the valley of Berachah: see 2 Chr. xx. 26. 5th. It was in this valley of Jehoshaphat, as Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that Sennacherib's army, or part of it, lay, when it was destroyed by an angel. They came together to ruin Jerusalem, but God brought them together for their own ruin, "as sheaves into the floor," Mic. iv. 12.

3. The plaintiff called, on whose behalf this prosecution is set on foot. It is "for my people, and for my heritage Israel." It is their cause that God will now plead with jealousy. Note, God's people are his heritage, his peculiar, his portion, his treasure above all people, Ex. xix. 5; Deu. xxxii. 9. They are his demesne, and therefore he has a good action against those that trespass upon them.

4. The charge exhibited against them, which is very particular. Many affronts they had put upon God by their idolatries; but that for which God has a quarrel with them is the affront they have put upon his people, and upon the vessels of his sanctuary.

1st. They had been very abusive to the people of Israel; had "scattered them among the nations," and forced them to seek for shelter where they could find a place. Or, carried them captives into their respective countries, and there industriously dispersed them for fear of their incorporating for their common safety. They parted their land, and took every one his share of it as their own; nay, "They have cast lots for my people," and sold them. When they had taken them prisoners, First. They made a jest of them, made a scorn of them, as of no value,—whom they would not release, and yet thought them not worth the keeping. They made nothing of playing them away at dice, or they made a dividend of the prisoners by lot, as the soldiers did of Christ's garments. Secondly. They made a gain of them. When they had them they sold them, yet with so much contempt, that they did not increase their wealth by their price, but sold them for their pleasure rather than their profit; they gave a boy taken in war for the hire of a harlot, and a girl for so many bottles of wine as would serve them for one sitting—a goodly price at which they valued them, and goodly preferment for a son and daughter of Israel, to be a slave and a drudge in a tavern or a brothel. Observe here how that which is got by one sin is commonly spent upon another. The spoil which the enemies of the Jews gathered by injustice and violence they scattered and threw away in drinking and whoring; such is the character many times, and such the conversation, of the enemies and persecutors of the people of God. The Tyrians and Philistines, when they seized any of the children of Judah and Jerusalem, either took them prisoners in war or kidnapped them; they sold them to the Grecians, (with whom the men of Tyre traded in the persons of men, Eze. xxvii. 13,) that they "might remove them far from their own border," ver. 6. It was a great reproach to Israel, God's firstborn, his freeborn, to be thus bought and sold among the heathen.

2nd. They had unjustly seized God's silver and gold, ver. 5, by which some understand the wealth of Israel. The silver and gold which God's people had he calls his, because they had received it from him, and devoted it to him; and whosoever robbed them God took it as if they had robbed him, and would make reprisals accordingly. Those that take away the estates of good men for well-doing will be found guilty of sacrilege—they take God's silver and gold. But it seems rather to be meant of the vessels and treasures of the temple, which God here calls his goodly, pleasant things, precious and desirable to him, and all that are his. These they carried into their temples, as trophies of their victory over God's Israel, thinking therein they triumphed over Israel's God; nay, and that their idols triumphed over him. Thus the ark was put in Dagon's temple. Thus they did unjustly: "What have you to do with me?" ver. 4; that is, with my people. What wrong have they done you? what provocation have they given you? You had nothing to do with them, and yet you do all this against them. Devices are devised against the quiet in the land, and those offended and harmed that are harmless and inoffensive. "Will you render me a recompence?" Can they pretend that either God or his people have done them any injury, for which they may justify themselves by the law of retaliation in doing them these mischiefs? No, they have no colour for it. Note, It is no new thing for those that have been very civil and obliging to their neighbours yet to find them very unkind and unneighbourly, and for those who do no injuries yet to suffer many.

5. The sentence passed upon them. In general, ver. 4, "If ye recompense me," if you pretend a quarrel with me, if you provoke me thus to jealousy, if you touch the apple of mine eye, "I will swiftly and speedily return your recompence upon your own head." Those that contend with God will find themselves unable to make their part good with him. He will recompense them suddenly when they little think of it, and have not time to prevent it; if he take them to task, he will soon effect their ruin. Particularly it is threatened, 1st. That they shall not gain their end in the mischief they designed against God's people. They thought to have removed them so far from their border that they should never return to it again, ver. 6; but, saith God, "I will raise them out of the place whither you have sold them," and they shall not, as you intended, be buried alive there. Men's selling the people of God will not deprive him of his property in them. 2nd. That they shall be paid in their own coin, as Adonibezek was; ver. 8, "I will sell your sons and your daughters into the hand of the children of Judah;" you shall lie as much at their mercy as they have been at yours, Isa. lx. 14. Thus the Jews had "rule over them that hated them," Est. ix. 1; and then they shall justly be sold to "the Sabeans, to a people far off." This, some think, had its accomplishment in the victories obtained by the Maccabees over the enemies of the Jews. Others think it looks as far forward as the last day, when "the upright shall have dominion," Ps. xlix. 14; and "the saints shall judge the world." It is certain none ever hardened his heart against God, or his church, and prospered long. No; not

Pharaoh himself, for "the Lord hath spoken it," for the comfort of all his suffering servants, that "Vengeance is his, and he will repay."

9 Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles;
Prepare war, wake up the mighty men,
Let all the men of war draw near; let them come up:
10 Beat your plowshares into swords,
And your pruninghooks into spears:
Let the weak say, I am strong.
11 Assemble yourselves, and come, all ye heathen,
And gather yourselves together round about:
Thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O LORD.
12 Let the heathen be wakened,
And come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat:
For there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about.

VALLEY OF JEHOSHAPHAT.

13 Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe:
Come, get you down; for the press is full, the fats overflow;
For their wickedness is great.
14 Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision:
For the day of the LORD is near in the valley of decision.
15 The sun and the moon shall be darkened,
And the stars shall withdraw their shining.
16 The LORD also shall roar out of Zion,
And utter his voice from Jerusalem;
And the heavens and the earth shall shake:
But the LORD will be the hope of his people,
And the strength of the children of Israel
17 So shall ye know that I am the LORD your God
Dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain:
Then shall Jerusalem be holy,
And there shall no strangers pass through her any more.

What the psalmist had long before ordered to be "said among the heathen," Ps. xcvi. 10, the prophet here will have in like manner to be published to all the nations, that "the Lord reigns," and that "he comes, he comes to judge the earth," as he had long been judging in the earth. The notice here given of God's judging the nations may have reference to the destruction of Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, and to the antichrist especially, and all the proud enemies of the Christian church. But some of the best interpreters, ancient and modern, particularly the learned Dr. Pocock, think the scope of these verses is to set forth the day of the last judgment, under the similitude of God's making war upon the enemies of his kingdom, and his gathering in the harvest of the earth, both which similitudes we find used in the Revelation, ch. xiv. 18; xix. 11. Here we have,

First. A challenge given to all the enemies of God's kingdom to do their worst. To signify to them that God is preparing war against them, they are called upon to prepare war against him, ver. 9—11. When the hour of God's judgment is come, effectual methods shall be taken to gather all nations "to the battle of that great day of God Almighty," Rev. xvi. 14; xx. 8. It seems to be here spoken ironically, "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles;" let all the forces of the nations be summoned to join in confederacy against God and his people. It is like that, Isa. viii. 9, "Associate yourselves, O ye people, and gird yourselves," but ye shall be "broken to pieces." "Prepare war," muster up all your strength, "wake up the mighty men;" call them into your service, excite them to vigilance and resolution. "Let all the men of war draw near, let them come" and enter the lists with Omnipotence if they dare. Let them not complain for want of weapons, but let them "beat their ploughshares into swords," and their "pruning-hooks into spears." Let them resolve, if they will, never to return to their husbandry again, but either to conquer or die. Let none plead unfitness to bear arms, but "let the weak say, I am strong," and will venture into the field of battle. Thus doth a God of almighty power bid defiance to all the opposition of the powers of darkness. Let "the heathen rage," and "the kings of the earth take counsel together" against the Lord and his Christ. Let them assemble and come, and gather themselves together; but he that sits in heaven shall laugh at them, and while he thus calls them has them in derision, Ps. ii. 1, 4. The heathen must be wakened, must be raised from the dead, that they may "come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat," to receive their doom, ver. 12; may come up out of their graves, come up into the air, to meet the Lord there. Jehoshaphat signifies, 'The judgment of the Lord.' Let them come to the place of God's judgment, which perhaps is the chief reason for the using of this name here; but it is put together as a proper name, for the sake of allusions to the place so called, which we observed before. Let them come thither where God will "sit to judge the heathen," to that throne of glory before which shall be "gathered all nations," Mat. xxv. 32; for before the judgment-seat of Christ we must all appear. The challenge, ver. 9, is turned into a summons, ver. 12. It is not only, Come if you dare, but, You shall come whether you will or no, for there is no escaping the judgments of God.

Secondly. A charge given to the ministers of God's justice to appear and act against these daring enemies of his kingdom among men. And, therefore, "Cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord," ver. 11; when they bring their forces into the field, let God bring his. Let the archangel's trumpet sound a charge, to call together his mighty ones, that is, his angels. Perhaps it is with reference to this that Christ's coming from heaven at the last day is said to be "with his mighty angels," 2 Thes. i. 7. These are the hosts of the Lord, that shall fight his battles then, when he shall put down all opposing rule, principality and power, when he shall "judge among the heathen," Ps. cx. 6. Some think these words, ver. 9, 10, "Prepare war, wake up the mighty men," are not a challenge to the enemy's hosts, but a charge to God's hosts—let them draw near and come up. When God's cause is to be pleaded, either by the law or by the sword, he hath those ready that shall plead it effectually; witnesses ready to appear for him in the court of judgment; soldiers ready to appear for him in the field of battle. They shall "beat ploughshares into swords," if need be; however, it is plain to them the charge is given; ver. 13, "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe;" that is, their wickedness is great, the measure of it is full, and they are ripe for ruin. Our Saviour has expounded this, Mat. xiii. 39, "The harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels;" and they are commanded to thrust in their sickle, their sharp sickle, and gather in both the harvest and the vintage, Rev. xiv. 15, 18. Note, The greatness of men's wickedness makes them ripe for God's judgment.

Thirdly. The vast appearance that shall be in that great and solemn day; ver. 14, "Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision," the same which before was called the valley of Jehoshaphat, or, of the judgment of the Lord, for "the day of the Lord is near" in that valley. Note, 1st. The judgment day, that day of the Lord, has all along been looked upon and spoken of as nigh at hand. Enoch said, Behold, the Lord comes, as if the judge were then standing before the door; because it is certain that day will come, and will come according to the appointment, and "a thousand years with God are but as one day." Things are ripening apace for it; we ought always to be ready for it, because our judgment is at hand. 2nd. The day of judgment will be the day of decision, when every man's eternal state will be determined; and the controversy that has been long depending between the kingdom of Christ and that of Satan shall be finally decided, and an end put to the struggle; 'The valley of the distribution of judgment,' so the Chaldee; when "every man shall receive according to the things done in the body." 'The valley of threshing,' so the margin, carrying on the metaphor of the harvest, ver. 13. The proud enemies of God's people will then be crushed and broken to pieces, and made as the "dust of the summer threshing-floors." 3rd. Innumerable multitudes will be gathered together to receive their final doom in that day; as in the destruction of Gog we read of the valley of Hamongog, and the city of Hamonah, Eze. xxxix. 15, 16, both signifying the multitude of the vanquished enemies; it is the word here used, Hamonim, Hamonim, expressed by way of admiration—O what vast multitudes of sinners will Divine justice be glorified in the ruin of at that day! 'A multitude of living,' saith one of the rabbins, 'and a multitude of dead;' for Christ shall come to judge "both the quick and the dead."

Fourthly. The amazing change that shall then be made in the kingdom of nature; ver. 15, "The sun and moon shall be darkened;" as before, ch. ii. 31. Their glory and lustre shall be eclipsed by the far greater brightness of that glory in which the Judge shall then appear. Nay, they shall themselves be set aside in the dissolution of all things; for damned sinners in hell shall not be allowed their light, being cast into utter darkness; and glorified saints in heaven shall not need their light, for God himself will be their everlasting light, Isa. lx. 19. Those that fall under the wrath of God in that day of wrath shall be cut off from all comfort and joy, signified by the darkening not only of the sun and moon, but of the stars also.

Fifthly. The different impressions which that day will make upon the children of this world and the children of God, according as it will be to them.

1. To the wicked it will be "a terrible day." The Lord shall then speak from Zion and Jerusalem; that is, from the throne of his glory, from heaven, where he manifests himself in a peculiar manner, as sometimes he had done in the "glorious high throne of his sanctuary," which yet was but a faint resemblance of the glory of that day. He shall speak from heaven, from the midst of his saints and angels, (so some understand it,) the holy society of which may be called Zion and Jerusalem; for when we come to the heavenly Jerusalem, we come to the "innumerable company of angels:" see Heb. xii. 22, 25. Now his speaking in that day will be to the wicked as roaring, terrible as the roaring of a lion, for so the word signifies. He long kept silence, but now "our God shall come and shall not keep silence," Ps. l. 3, 21. Note, The judgment of the great day will make the ears of those to tingle that continue the implacable enemies of God's kingdom. God's voice will then "shake terribly both heaven and earth," Isa. ii. 21; yet once more, Hag. ii. 6; Heb. xii. 26. This notes, that the voice of God will in the great day speak such terror to the wicked as were enough to put even heaven and earth into a consternation. When God comes to pull down and destroy his enemies, and make them all his footstool, though heaven and earth should stand up in defence of them, and undertake their protection, it shall be all in vain; even they shall shake before him, and be an insufficient shelter to those whom he comes forth to contend with. Note, As blessings out of Zion are the sweetest blessings, and enough to make heaven and earth sing, so terrors out of Zion are the surest terrors, and enough to make heaven and earth shake.

2. To the righteous it will be a joyful day. When heaven and earth shall tremble, and be dissolved, and burnt up, then will the Lord be "the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel," ver. 16; and "then shall Jerusalem be holy," ver. 17. The saints are the Israel of God; they are his people, the church is his Jerusalem; they are in covenant and communion with him. Now in the great day, 1st. Their longings shall be satisfied. "The Lord will be the hope of his people;" that is, as he always was the founder and foundation of their hopes, so he then will be the crown of their hopes. He will be the 'harbour' of his people, so the word is, their receptacle, refuge, and home. The saints in the great day shall arrive at the desired haven,—shall put to shore after a stormy voyage. They shall go to be for ever at home with God; to their Father's house, the house not made with hands. 2nd. Their happiness shall be confirmed. God will be in that day "the strength of the children of Israel," enabling them to bid that day welcome, and to bear up under the weight of its glories and joys to them. In this world, when the judgments of God are abroad, and sinners are falling under them, God is, and will be, the hope and strength of his people; the strength of their heart, and their portion, when other men's hearts fail them for fear. 3rd. Their holiness shall be completed; ver. 17, "Then shall Jerusalem be holy," the holy city, indeed. Such shall the heavenly Jerusalem be, such the glorious church, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. Jerusalem shall be holiness, so the word is; it shall be perfectly holy, there shall be no remainder of sin in it. The gospel church is a holy society, even in its militant state, but will never be holiness itself till it comes to be triumphant. Then "no stranger shall pass through her any more;" that is, there shall not enter into the new Jerusalem any thing that defiles or works iniquity. None shall be there but who have a right to be there,—none but its own citizens; for it shall be an unmixed society. 4th. God shall in all this be manifested and magnified. "So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God." By the sanctifying and glorifying of the church God will be known in his holiness and glory, as the God that dwells in his holy mountain, and makes it holy by dwelling in it; and they that are sanctified and glorified are so through the knowledge of him that called them. The knowledge which true believers have of God is, First. An appropriating knowledge. They know that he is "the Lord their God;" yet not theirs only, but theirs in common with the whole church; that he is their God, but "dwelling in Zion, his holy mountain;" for, though faith appropriates, it doth not engross or monopolize, the privileges of the covenant. Secondly. It is an experimental knowledge. They shall find him their hope and strength in the worst of times; and so they shall "know that he is the Lord their God." Those know best the goodness of God who have tasted and seen it, and have found him good to them.

18 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the mountains shall drop down new wine,
And the hills shall flow with milk,
And all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters,
And a fountain shall come forth of the house of the LORD,
And shall water the valley of Shittim.
19 Egypt shall be a desolation,
And Edom shall be a desolate wilderness,
For the violence against the children of Judah,
Because they have shed innocent blood in their land.
20 But Judah shall dwell for ever,
And Jerusalem from generation to generation.
21 For I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed:
For the LORD dwelleth in Zion.

These promises with which this prophecy concludes have their accomplishment in part in the kingdom of grace, and the comforts and graces of all the faithful subjects of that kingdom, but will have their full accomplishment in the kingdom of glory; for, as to the Jewish church, we know not of any event concerning that which answers to the extent of these promises. And what instances of peace and prosperity they were blessed with, which these may be supposed to be an hyperbolical description of, they were but figures of better things reserved for us, that they in their best estate without us might not be made perfect.

First. It is promised that the enemies of the church shall be vanquished and brought down; ver. 19, Egypt, that old enemy of Israel, and Edom, that had an inveterate enmity to Israel, derived from Esau, these "shall be a desolation," a "desolate wilderness," no more to be inhabited; they are become the people of God's curse: so the Idumeans were, Isa. xxxiv. 5. No strength or wealth of a nation is a fence against the judgments of God. But what is the quarrel God has with these potent kingdoms? It is for their "violence against the children of Judah," and the injuries they have done them: see Eze. xxv. 3, 8, 12, 15; xxvi. 2. They had shed the innocent blood of the Jews that fled to them for shelter, or were making their escape through their country. Note, The innocent blood of God's people is precious to him, and not a drop of it shall be shed but it shall be reckoned for. In the last day this earth, which has been filled with violence against the people of God, shall be made a desolation, when it, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. And sooner or later the oppressors and persecutors of God's Israel will be brought down and laid in the dust; nay, they will at length be brought down and laid in the flames.

Secondly. It is promised that the church shall be very happy; and truly happy it is in spiritual privileges, even during its militant state, but much more when it comes to be triumphant. Three things are here promised it:

1. Purity. That is put last here, as a reason for the rest, ver. 21; but we may consider it first, as the ground and foundation of the rest. "I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed;" that is, their bloody, heinous sins, especially shedding innocent blood. That filth and guilt they had contracted by sin, which rendered them unfit for communion with God, and made them odious to his holiness, and obnoxious to his justice; this they shall be washed from in the fountain opened, Zec. xiii. 1. That shall be cleansed by the blood of Christ which could not be cleansed by the sacrifices and purification of the ceremonial law. Or, if we apply it to the happiness of the future state, it speaks the cleansing of the saints from all these corruptions from which they were not cleansed, either by ordinances or providences, in this world; there shall not be the least remains of sin in them there. Here, though they are washing daily, yet still there is something that is not cleansed; but in heaven, even that also shall be done away. And the reason is, because "the Lord dwells in Zion," dwells with his church, and much more gloriously with that in heaven, and "holiness becomes his house for ever;" for which reason, where he dwells there must be, there shall be, a perfection of holiness. Note, Though the refining and reforming of the church is work that goes on slowly, and still there is something we complain of that is not cleansed, yet there is a day coming when every thing that is amiss shall be amended, and the church shall be all fair, and no spot, no stain in her; and we must wait for that day.

2. Plenty, ver. 18. This is put first, because it speaks the reverse of the judgment threatened in the foregoing chapters. 1st. The streams of this plenty overflow the land, and enrich it. "The mountains shall drop new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk," such great abundance shall they have of suitable provision, both for babes and strong men. It speaks the abundance of vineyards, and all fruitful trees; and the abundance of cattle in the pastures that fill them with milk. And, to make the corn-land fruitful, "the rivers of Judah shall flow with water," so that the country shall be like the garden of Eden,—well watered every where and greatly enriched, Ps. lxv. 9. But this seems to be meant spiritually; the graces and comforts of the new covenant are compared to wine and milk, Isa. lv. 1; and the Spirit to "rivers of living water," Jno. vii. 38. And these gifts abound much more under the New Testament than they did under the Old. When believers receive grace for grace from Christ's fulness, when they are enriched with everlasting consolations, and "filled with joy and peace in believing," then the mountains drop new wine, and the hills flow with milk. "Drink ye," drink abundantly, O beloved. When there is a plentiful effusion of the Spirit of grace, then the "rivers of Judah flow with water," and make glad, not only "the city of our God," Ps. xlvi. 4, but the whole land. 2nd. The fountain of this plenty is in the house of God; thence the streams take their rise, as those "waters of the sanctuary," Eze. xlvii. 1, from "under the threshold of the house," and the river of life "out of the throne of God and the Lamb," Rev xxii. 1. The apostle, speaking of Zion, saith, "All my springs are in thee," Ps. lxxxvii. 7. Those that take temporal blessings to be meant in the former part of the verse, yet, by this fountain out of "the house of the Lord," understand the grace of God, which, if we abound in temporal blessings, we have so much the more need of, that we may not abuse them. Christ himself is this fountain, his merit and grace cleanse us, refresh us, and make us fruitful. This here is said to water the valley of Shittim, which lay a great way off from the temple at Jerusalem, on the other side of Jordan, and was a dry and barren valley, which intimates that gospel grace, flowing from Christ, shall reach far, even to the Gentile world, to the most remote regions of it, and shall make them to abound in the fruits of righteousness which had long laid as the barren wilderness. This grace is a fountain overflowing, ever-flowing, from which we may be continually drawing, and yet need not fear its being drawn dry. This fountain comes "out of the house of the Lord;" for those that would partake of the promised graces and comforts must diligently and constantly attend upon instituted ordinances. And from the house of the Lord above, from his temple in heaven, flows all that good which here we are daily tasting the streams of, but hope to be shortly, hope to be eternally, drinking at the fountain-head of.

3. Perpetuity. This crowns all the rest; ver. 20, "Judah shall dwell for ever," (when Egypt and Edom are made a desolation,) and Jerusalem shall continue "from generation to generation." This is a promise, and a precious promise it is; 1st. That the church of Christ shall continue in the world to the end of time. As one generation of professing Christians passeth away another shall come, in whom the throne of Christ shall endure for ever, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. 2nd. That all the living members of that church (Judah and Jerusalem are put for the inhabitants of that city and country, Mat. iii. 5,) shall be established in their happiness to the utmost ages of eternity. This new Jerusalem shall be from generation to generation, for it is a city that has foundations not made with hands, but eternal in the heavens

TO THE BOOK OF JOEL.

CHAP. I.—4. That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten. Bochart and others consider the four insects here enumerated, the gazam, the arbeh, the jakeh, and the chasil, denote four sorts of locusts. Some commentators think they are emblematical of the four monarchies, but the literal application, combining also a reference to the Chaldeans, seems most correct. The description of the ravages of locusts, in this and the following chapter, is exceedingly accurate as well as striking. Wherever they feed, the land, after their ravages, seems as if parched with fire. The head of the locust has some resemblance in shape to that of a horse, but its properties, its strength, swiftness, and fierceness may rather be alluded to here. The noise made by the approach of flights of locusts is heard afar off. Jackson describes the fear caused by their approach among the inhabitants of cultivated districts, and the joy of the wild Arabs at seeing them pass towards a fertile land, knowing that the desolation they cause will render the people and their goods an easy prey to their predatory inroads. Nothing can withstand or divert their progress, so vast are the swarms, extending miles in length, obscuring the light of the sun, and passing over or through every obstacle, devouring every sort of verdure, and reducing the trees to naked stems and boughs. Volney concludes his description by saying, 'Happily this calamity is not frequently repeated, for it is the inevitable forerunner of famine, and of the maladies it occasions.' Harmer states that the depredations of locusts injure the vines for many years, ver. 5. The locust is about three inches long, and in its general form resembles the grasshopper, and is eaten for food in times of scarcity. The vast swarms usually are carried forward by the wind till they fall into some sea, where they perish, and their myriads putrefying on the shore emit a most offensive smell, causing pestilential diseases in the neighbouring country.—Religious Tract Society's Commentary. Are the statements of Joel, in the first and second chapters, to be understood literally of these insects, or figuratively of enemies, that were to invade and lay waste the Holy Land? The latter is the more ancient opinion. It is that of the Targum, the Jews whom Jerome consulted, and Machiavel; it is, with various modifications, adopted by numerous Christian interpreters. On the other hand, not a few maintain that the language is to be understood literally of locusts. This interpretation has certainly much in its favour; and if it could without violence be applied throughout, might fairly be adopted. But the announcement of a second and more awful judgment, (ch. i. 15; ii. 1, 2,) the distinct recognition of a foreign rule, (ch. ii. 17,) and the assignment of the north as the native country of the enemy, (ch. ii. 20,) present insuperable obstacles to its adoption.—Dr. Henderson, who enumerates the authors referred to above. See Note on ch. ii. 9.

CHAP. II.—Joel now proceeds to introduce and describe the hostile army of the Assyrians in the same terms in which he had metaphorically described the locusts. In this description, he not only transfers the metaphor back to the proper subject from which it was taken, but converts it into an allegory, and at considerable length, and in the most minute manner, exhibits the invasion, the formidable character, and ravages of the barbarian foe. So perfectly is the allegorical veil woven throughout, that most commentators have been able to discover nothing more than natural locusts in the passage.—H. 8. Neither shall one thrust another. The locusts are remarkable for keeping their ranks and places with as much order and exactness as the best disciplined army. 9. They shall run to and fro. The fine conversion of the subjects is remarkable. The prophecy is delivered in the first chapter, "Awake, ye drunkards;" and repeated in the second, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion." In the first chapter, the locusts are described as a people, "For a nation is come up upon my land." But, that we may not be mistaken in the primary sense, namely, the plague of locusts, the ravages described are the ravages of insects. "They lay waste the vine, they bark the fig-tree." In this chapter the hostile people are described as locusts, "As the morning spread upon the mountains." "The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses, and as horsemen." But that we may not mistake the secondary sense, namely, the invasion of a foreign enemy, they are compared, we see, to a mighty army. In some places of this prophet dearth by insects must needs be understood; in others, desolation by war, so that both senses are of necessity to be admitted—a circumstance so far from inaccurate, that it gives the highest elegance to the discourse, and evinces an art in the contexture of the prophecy truly Divine.—Warburton's Div. Leg., iv., 467. 11. His army. We have here a key to the grand and beautiful description which runs through these two chapters. Every reader of taste must be struck with the poetical and sublime manner in which the allegory is conducted. There is not a more splendid piece of poetry extant.—Bishop Newcome. 20. The northern army. So called, says Lowth, because they entered the land at Hamath, one of the northern boundaries of it. M. Henry also says, 'that army of locusts and caterpillars that invaded you from the north.' Scott also hath the same comment. But to this view there is the objection not merely that locusts do not ordinarily come from the north, but that the original language denotes that the north was the native country of the subject of discourse. Now it is agreed on all hands, say Dr. Henderson, that the native country of the locusts is the region of Arabia, the Libyan deserts, and the Sahara of Egypt, so that they cannot be meant by the term here employed. On the supposition that by 'the northern' the Assyrians are meant, every difficulty vanishes. And that they may with the strictest propriety be so termed is proved by Zeph. ii. 13, "And he will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria." The Jews were accustomed to call Assyria and Babylonia the north, and the north country, because they lay in that direction from Palestine. We have adverted at much length to this subject, because there is so little of it in the commentary which refers to a literal invasion of locusts, to the almost total exclusion of the northern enemy which they symbolized. All, however, that is necessary in order to the profitable perusal, under God's blessing, of the Word and commentary thereon, is to keep the secondary sense referring to the Assyrians in view, as well as the primary allusion to the locusts; for so perfect is the allegory, that the description of the character, progress, and ravages of the one will, by this method, correctly guide us to all that it was intended to denote respecting the other. 28. And it shall come to pass, &c. These words are expounded by the apostle Peter in Acts ii. We subjoin A. Barnes' comment. "In the last days." Heb. Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, 'after these things,' or 'afterwards.' The expression "the last days," however, occurs frequently in the Old Testament: Gen. xlix. 1, Jacob called his sons, that he might tell them what should happen to them "in the last days," that is, in future times, (Heb. 'in after times;') Mic. iv. 1, "In the last days (Heb. 'in after times') the mountain of the Lord's house," &c.; Isa. ii. 2, "In the last days the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the tops of the mountains," &c. The expression, then, properly denoted the future times in general. But, as the coming of the Messiah was to the eye of a Jew the most important event in the coming ages,—the great, glorious, and crowning scene in all that vast futurity,—the phrase came to be regarded as properly expressive of that. And they spoke of future times, and of the last times, as the glad period which should be crowned and honoured with the presence and triumphs of the Messiah. It stood in opposition to the usual denomination of earlier times. It was a phrase in contrast with the days of the patriarchs, the kings, the prophets, &c. "The last days," or the closing period of the world, were the days of the Messiah. It does not appear from this, and it certainly is not implied in the expression, that they supposed the world would then come to an end. Their views were just the contrary. They anticipated a long and glorious time under the dominion of the Messiah, and to this expectation they were led by the promise that his kingdom should be for ever, that of the increase of his government there should be no end, &c. This expression was understood by the writers of the New Testament as referring undoubtedly to the times of the Gospel. And hence they often used it as denoting that the time of the expected Messiah had come, but not to imply that the world was drawing near to an end. Heb. i. 2, "God hath spoken in these last days by his Son." 1 Pet. i. 20, "Was manifest in these last times for you." 2 Pet. iii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 5; 1 Jno. ii. 18, "Little children, it is the last time, &c.; Jude 18. The expression "the last day," is applied by our Saviour to the resurrection and the day of judgment, Jno. vi. 39, 40, 44, 45; xi. 24; xii. 48. Here the expression means simply, in those future times, when the Messiah shall have come. I will pour out my Spirit. The expression in Hebrew is, 'I will pour out my Spirit.' The word pour is commonly applied to water, or to blood, to pour it out, or to shed it, Isa. lvii. 6; to tears, to pour them out, that is, to weep, &c., Ps. xlii. 4; 1 Sam. i. 15. It is applied to water, to wine, or to blood, in the New Testament. Mat. ix. 17; Rev. xvi. 1; Acts xxii. 20, "The blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed." It conveys also the idea of communicating largely, or freely, as water is poured freely from a fountain. Tit. iii. 5, 6, "The renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly." Thus Job, xxxvi. 27, "They (the clouds) pour down rain according to the vapour thereof." Isa. xliv. 3, "I will pour out water on him that is thirsty." Isa. xlv. 8, "Let the skies pour down righteousness." Mal. iii. 10, "I will pour you out a blessing." It is also applied to fury and anger, when God intends to say that he will not spare, but will signally punish, Ps. lxix. 24; Jer. x. 25. It is not unfrequently applied to the Spirit, Pr. i. 23; Isa. xliv. 3; Zec. xii. 10; and then it means that he will bestow large measures of spiritual influences. As the Spirit renews and sanctifies men, so to pour out the Spirit is to grant freely his influences to renew and sanctify the soul. My Spirit. The Spirit here denotes the third person of the Trinity, promised by the Saviour, and sent to finish his work, and apply it to men. The Holy Spirit is regarded as the source, or conveyer of all the blessings which Christians experience. Hence he renews the heart, Jno. iii. 5, 6. He is the source of all proper feelings and principles in Christians, or he produces the Christian graces, Gal. v. 22—25; Tit. iii. 5, 7. The spread and success of the Gospel is attributed to him, Isa. xxxii. 15, 16. Miraculous gifts are traced to him, especially the various gifts with which the early Christians were endowed, 1 Cor. xii. 4—10. The promise that he would pour out his Spirit means that he would, in the time of the Messiah, impart a large measure of those influences which it was his peculiar province to communicate to men. A part of them were communicated on the day of Pentecost, in the miraculous endowment of the power of speaking foreign languages, in the wisdom of the apostles, and in the conversion of the three thousand. And from Peter's vindication, in the book of Acts, of the scene on the day of Pentecost, we may learn also, 1. That revivals of religion are to be expected as a part of the history of the Christian church. He speaks of God's pouring out his Spirit, &c., as what was to take place in the last days, that is, in the indefinite and large tract of time which was to come under the administration of the Messiah. His remarks are by no means limited to the day of Pentecost. They are as applicable to future periods as to that time; and we are to expect it as a part of Christian history that the Holy Spirit will be sent down to awaken and convert men. 2. This will also vindicate revivals from most of the charges which have ever been brought against them. And if that excited deep interest in the apostles, if they felt deep concern to vindicate it from the charge brought against it, then Christians and Christian ministers now should feel similar solicitude to defend revivals, and not be found among their revilers, their calumniators, or their foes. There will be enemies enough of the work of the Holy Spirit without the aid of professed Christians; and that man possesses no enviable feelings or character who is found with the enemies of God and his Christ, in opposing the mighty work of the Holy Spirit on the human heart.——J. P. Smith says, 'that the prophet presents two facts. 1. The commencement of the Gospel dispensation, its spiritual nature, the Divine influence which would sustain it, and its extension to all ages, classes, and nations of men. This general fact is depicted, according to the established manner of the prophets, by grouping a number of particular images, derived from the modes in which the inspiration of God was communicated under the Jewish theocracy. He considers that the most certain principles of biblical interpretation compel us to understand the application of the prediction to the church under the New Testament, as consisting in the general fact of the operations of the Holy Spirit, and by no means in the identical modes specified, namely, prophesying, dreams, and visions. That influence was given by the glorified Redeemer in a new and more copious manner, but in modes suitable to the new state of things. These modes would, of course, include the temporary and miraculous operations of the kinds which Divine wisdom judged best, and would be conferred with a marked disregard to those distinctions and exclusions which the corrupt traditions and proud prejudices of the Jews had set up. Also, in the permanent operations of the Holy Spirit, in giving success to the ministry of the Gospel, and other means of instruction. 2. The Jewish war, and the miseries which came upon the nation, are described by these images and symbols, generally employed by the prophets to convey the most awful ideas of revolutionary calamities. He quotes many passages to shew that this imagery is applied by the prophets to denote events brought about, not miraculously, but by the constant providence and power of God in the changes of human society.

FAMINE, PESTILENCE, AND DESOLATION.

AN

PROPHECY OF AMOS,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THOUGH this prophet appeared a little before Isaiah, yet he was not, as some have mistaken, that Amos who was the father of Isaiah, (Isa. i. 1,) for in the Hebrew their names are very different; and their families too were of a different character, for Isaiah was a courtier, Amos a country farmer. Amos signifies a 'burthen,' whence the Jews have a tradition that he was of a slow tongue, and spoke with stammering lips; we may rather, in allusion to his name, say that his speech was weighty, and his word the burthen of the Lord. He was, as most think, of Judah, yet prophesied chiefly against Israel, and at Bethel, ch. vii. 18. Some think his style savours of his extraction, and is more plain and rustic than that of some other of the prophets; I do not see it so: but it is plain his matter agreed with that of his contemporary, Hosea, that "out of the mouth of these two witnesses the word might be established." It appears by his contest with Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, that he met with opposition in his work; but was a man of undaunted resolution in it, faithful and bold in reproving sin, and denouncing the judgments of God for it, and pressing in his exhortations to repentance and reformation: he begins with threatenings against the neighbour nations that were enemies to Israel, ch. i. and ii.; then calls Israel to account, and judgeth them for their idolatry, their unworthy walking under the favours God bestowed upon them, and their incorrigibleness under his judgments, ch. iii. and iv. He calls them to repentance, ch. v., rejecting their hypocritical sacrifices, unless they did repent. He foretells the desolations that were coming upon them notwithstanding their security, ch. vi., some particular judgments, ch. vii., particularly on Amaziah; and after other reproofs and threatenings, ch. viii. and ix., concludes with a promise of the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom, and the happiness of God's spiritual Israel therein; just as the prophecy of Joel concluded. These prophets having opened the wound in their reproofs and threatenings, which shew all wrong, in the promises of gospel grace open the remedy, which alone will set all to rights.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The general title of this prophecy, ver. 1, with the general scope of it, ver. 2. II. God's particular controversy with Syria, ver. 3—5; with Palestine, ver. 6—8; with Tyre, ver. 9, 10; with Edom, ver. 11, 12; and with Ammon, ver. 13—15; for their cruelty to his people, and the many injuries they had done them. This explains God's pleading with the nations, Joel iii. 2.

THE words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, which he saw concerning Israel in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the earthquake. 2 And he said,

The LORD will roar from Zion,
And utter his voice from Jerusalem;
And the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn,
And the top of Carmel shall wither.

Here is, First. The general character of this prophecy. It is the words which the prophet saw. Are words to be seen? Yes, God's words are; the apostles speak of the word of life, which they had not only heard, but which they had seen with their eyes, which they had looked upon, and which their hands had handled, 1 Jno. i. 1, such a real substantial thing is the word of God. The prophet saw these words, that is, 1. They were revealed to him in a vision, as John is said to see the voice that spake to him, Rev. i. 12. 2. That which was foretold by them was to him as certain as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes. It intimates how strong he was in that faith which is the "evidence of things not seen."

Secondly. The person by whom this prophecy was sent: "Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa," and was one of them. Some think he was a rich dealer in cattle; the word is used concerning the king of Moab, 2 Kin. iii. 4, he was "a sheepmaster." It is likely he got money by that business, and yet he must quit it to follow God as a prophet. Others think he was a poor keeper of cattle, for we find ch. vii. 14, 15, that he was withal a gatherer of wild figs, a poor employment, by which we may suppose he could but just get his bread, and that God took him, as he did David from following the flock, and Elisha from following the plough. Many were trained up for great employments in the quiet, innocent, contemplative business of shepherds. When God would send a prophet to reprove and warn his people, he employed a shepherd, a herdsman, to do it, for they had made themselves as the horse and mule that have no understanding; nay, worse than the ox that knows his owner. God sometimes "chooseth the foolish things of the world to confound the wise," 1 Cor. i. 27. Note, Those whom God has endued with abilities for his service ought not to be despised or laid aside for the meanness either of their original or of their beginnings. Though Amos himself is not ashamed to own that he was a herdsman, yet others ought not to upbraid him with it, or think the worse of him for it.

Thirdly. The persons concerned in the prophecy of this book. It is concerning Israel, the ten tribes, who were now ripened in sin, and ripening apace for ruin. God had raised them up prophets among themselves, ch. ii. 11, but they regarded them not, therefore God sends them one from Tekoa, in the land of Judah, that coming from another country he might be the more valued; and, perhaps, he was the rather sent out of his own country, because there he was despised for his having been a herdsman: see Mat. xiii. 55—57.

Fourthly. The time when these prophecies were delivered. 1. The book is dated, as laws used to be, by the reigns of the kings under whom the prophet prophesied. It was in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, when the affairs of that kingdom went very well, and of Jeroboam the second king of Israel, when the affairs of that kingdom went pretty well; yet then they must both be told both of the sins they were guilty of and the judgments that were coming upon them for those sins, that they might not with the present gleam of prosperity flatter themselves either into an opinion of their innocency or a confidence of their perpetual security. 2. It is dated by a particular event, to which his prophecy had a reference. It was "two years before the earthquake," that earthquake which is mentioned to have been in the days of Uzziah, Zec. xiv. 5, which put the nation into a dreadful fright, for it is there said they fled before it. But how could they flee from it? Some conjecture that this earthquake was at the time of Isaiah's vision, when "the posts of the door were moved," Isa. vi. 4. The tradition of the Jews is, that it happened just at the time when Uzziah presumptuously invaded the priest's office, and went in to burn incense, 2 Chr. xxvi. 16. Josephus mentions this earthquake, Antiq. ix. 11, and saith, 'that by it half of a mountain was removed and carried to a plain four furlongs off, and that it spoiled the king's gardens.' God by this prophet gave warning of it two years before, that God by it would shake down their houses, ch. iii. 15.

Fifthly. The introduction to these prophecies, containing the general scope of them; ver. 2, "The Lord will roar from Zion." His threatenings by his prophets, and the executions of those threatenings in his providence, will be as terrible as the roaring of a lion is to the shepherds and their flocks. Amos here speaks the same language with his contemporaries, Hosea, Hos. xi. 10, and Joel, Joel iii. 16. The lion roars before he tears, God gives warning before he strikes. Observe, 1. Whence the warning comes. From Zion and Jerusalem, from the oracles of God there delivered, for "by them is thy servant warned," Ps. xix. 11; or God, whose special residence is there, will issue out warrants, given at that court, as it were, for the executing of judgments on the land: see Jer. xxv. 30. In Zion was the mercy-seat; thence the Lord roars, intimating that God's acts of justice are consistent with mercy, allayed and mitigated by mercy, nay, as they are warnings, they are really acts of mercy. We are chastened that we may not be condemned. 2. What effect the warning hath. "The habitations of the shepherds mourn," either because they fear the roaring lion or because they feel what is signified by that comparison, the consequences of a great drought, ch. iv. 7, which made the top of Carmel, of the most fruitful fields, to wither, and become as a desert, Joel i. 12, 17.

3 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Damascus,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron:
4 But I will send a fire into the house of Hazael,
Which shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad.
5 I will break also the bar of Damascus,
And cut off the inhabitant from the plain of Aven,
And him that holdeth the sceptre from the house of Eden:
And the people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir,
saith the LORD.
6 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Gaza,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they carried away captive the whole captivity,
To deliver them up to Edom:
7 But I will send a fire on the wall of Gaza,
Which shall devour the palaces thereof:
8 And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod,
And him that holdeth the sceptre from Ashkelon,
And I will turn mine hand against Ekron:
And the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord GOD.
9 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Tyrus,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they delivered up the whole captivity to Edom,
And remembered not the brotherly covenant:
10 But I will send a fire on the wall of Tyrus,
Which shall devour the palaces thereof.
11 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Edom,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because he did pursue his brother with the sword,
And did cast off all pity,
And his anger did tear perpetually,
And he kept his wrath for ever:
12 But I will send a fire upon Teman,
Which shall devour the palaces of Bozrah.
13 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of the children of Ammon,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they have ripped up the women with child of Gilead,
That they might enlarge their border:
14 But I will kindle a fire in the wall of Rabbah,
And it shall devour the palaces thereof,
With shouting in the day of battle,
With a tempest in the day of the whirlwind:
15 And their king shall go into captivity,
He and his princes together, saith the LORD.

AMMON.—ver. 13.

What the Lord saith here may be explained by what he saith Jer. xii. 14, "Thus saith the Lord, against all my evil neighbours that touch the inheritance of my people Israel, Behold I will pluck them out." Damascus was a near neighbour to Israel on the north, Tyre and Gaza on the west, Edom on the south, Ammon and (in the next chapter) Moab on the east, and all of them had been one time, one way or other, pricking briars and grieving thorns to Israel, ill neighbours to them; and, because God espouseth his people's cause, he there calls them his evil neighbours, and here comes forth to reckon with them. The method taken in dealing with each of them is in part the same, and therefore we put them together, and yet in each there is something peculiar.

First. Let us see what is repeated, both by way of charge and by way of sentence, concerning them all. The controversy God hath with each of them is prefaced with, "Thus saith the Lord," Jehovah the God of Israel. Though those nations will not worship him as their God, yet they shall be made to know that they are accountable to him as their judge. The God of Israel is the God of the whole earth, and hath something to say to them that shall make them tremble. Against them the Lord roars out of Zion. And before God, by the prophet, threatens Israel and Judah, he denounceth judgments against these nations whom he made use of as scourges to them for their being so, which might serve for a check for their pride and insolence, and a relief to his people under their dejections, for hereby they might see that God had not quitted his interest in them, and therefore might hope they had not lost their interest in him. Now as to all these nations here arraigned,

1. The indictment drawn up against them all is thus far the same: 1st. That they are charged in general with "three transgressions," and with "four," that is, with many transgressions; as by one or two we mean a few, so by three or four we mean many; as in Latin, a man that is very happy is said to be terque quaterque beatus,—'three and four times happy;' or, with three and four, that is, with seven transgressions, a number of perfection, intimating that they have "filled up the measure of their iniquities," and are ripe for ruin; or, with three, that is, a variety of sins, and with a fourth especially, which is specified concerning each of them, though the other three are not, as Pr. xxx. 15, 18, 21, 29, where we read of "three things, yea, four," generally one seems to be more especially intended. 2nd. That the particular sin which is fastened upon as the fourth, and which alone is instanced, is the sin of persecution. It is some mischief or other done to the people of God that is particularly charged upon every one of them, for persecution is the measure-filling sin of any people; and it is this sin that will be particularly reckoned for, "I was hungry and you gave me no meat," much more if it may be said, I was hungry and you took my meat from me.

2. The judgment given against them all is thus far the same: 1st. That their sin being come to such a height, "God will not turn away the punishment thereof;" that is, though he has granted them a long reprieve, and has often turned away their punishment, yet now he will turn it away no longer, but justice shall take its course. 'I will not revoke it,' so some read it, that is, not recall the voice which is gone forth from Zion and Jerusalem, ver. 2, speaking death and terror to the sinful nations. It is an irrevocable sentence; God hath spoken it, and he will not call it back. Note, Though God bear long, he will not bear always, with those that provoke him, and when the decree brings forth it will bring up. 2nd. That God will kindle a fire among them. This is said concerning all these ill neighbours, ver. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14; God will send a fire into their cities. When fires are kindled that lay cities, towns, and houses in ashes, whether designedly or casually, God must be acknowledged in it; they are of his sending. Sin stirs up the fire of his jealousy, and that kindles other fires.

Secondly. Let us see what is mentioned, both by way of charge and by way of sentence, that is peculiar to each of them, that every one may take his portion.

1. Concerning Damascus, the head city of Syria, a kingdom that was often vexatious to Israel. 1st. The peculiar sin of Damascus was using the Gileadites barbarously. They "threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron," ver. 3, which may be understood either literally, of their putting the inhabitants of Gilead to the torture, or to cruel deaths, whom they got into their hands, as David put the Ammonites under saws and harrows, 2 Sam. xii. 31. We read with what inhumanity Hazael, king of Syria, prosecuted his wars with Israel, 2 Kin. viii. 12, he "dashed their children," and "ripped up their women with child;" and see what desolations he made in their land, 2 Kin. x. 32, 33. Or it may be taken figuratively, for his laying the country waste, and this very similitude is used in the history of it, 2 Kin. xiii. 7, he destroyed them, and made them like the dust by threshing. Note, Men often do that unjustly and wickedly, and shall be severely reckoned with for it, which yet God justly permits them to do. The church is called "God's threshing, and the corn of his floor," Isa. xxi. 10; but if men make it their threshing, and the chaff of their floor, they shall be sure to hear of it. 2nd. The peculiar punishment of Damascus is, First. That the fire which shall be sent shall fasten upon the court in the first place, not on the chief city, or the country towns, but on the house of Hazael which he built; and it "shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad," that is, the royal palaces inhabited by the kings of Syria, many of whom were of that name. Note, Even royal palaces are no fence against the judgments of God, though never so richly furnished, though never so strongly fortified. Secondly. That the enemy shall force his way into the city; ver. 5, "I will break the bar of Damascus," and then the gate flies open. Or it may be understood figuratively,—all that which is depended upon as the strength and safety of that great city shall fail, and prove insufficient. When God's judgments come with commission, it is in vain to think of turning them out. Thirdly. That the people shall be destroyed with the sword; "I will cut off the inhabitants from the plain of Aven, the valley of idolatry," for the gods of the Syrians were gods of the valleys, 1 Kin. xx. 23, were worshipped in valleys, as the idols of Israel were worshipped on the hills; "Him also that holdeth the sceptre" of power, some petty king or other that used to boast of the sceptre he held from Beth-eden, 'the house of pleasure.' Both those that were given to idolatry and those that were given to sensuality shall be cut off together. Fourthly. That the body of the nation shall be carried off; "The people shall go into captivity unto Kir," which was in the country of the Medes. We find this fulfilled, 2 Kin. xvi. 9, about fifty years after this, when "the king of Assyria went up against Damascus, and took it, and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Rezin," at the instigation of Ahaz, king of Judah.

2. Concerning Gaza, a city of the Philistines, and now the metropolis of that country. 1st. The peculiar sin of the Philistines was "carrying away captive the whole captivity," either of Israel or Judah, which some think refers to that inroad made upon Jehoram, when they took away all the king's sons, and all his substance, 2 Chr. xxi. 17. Or, perhaps, to their seizing those that fled to them for shelter, when Sennacherib invaded Judah, and selling them to the Grecians, Joel iii. 4, 6; or, as here, to the Edomites, who were always sworn enemies to the people of God. They spared none, but carried off all they could lay their hands on, designing, if possible, to "cut off the name of Israel," Ps. lxxxiii. 4, 7. 2nd. "The peculiar punishment of the Philistines is, that the fire which God will send shall devour the palaces of Gaza; and that the inhabitants of other cities of the Philistines, Ashdod (or Azotus), Ashkelon, and Ekron, should all be cut off, and God would make as thorough work with them in their ruin as they would have made with God's people when they carried away the whole captivity, for even the remnant of them shall perish, ver. 8. Note, God will make a full end of those that think to make a full end of his church and people.

3. Concerning Tyre, that famous city of wealth and strength, that was itself a kingdom, ver. 9. 1st. The peculiar sin of Tyre, is "delivering up the whole captivity to Edom;" that is, selling to the Edomites those of Israel that fled to them for shelter, or any way fell into their hands, nor caring what hardships they put upon them, so they could but make gain of them to themselves. Herein they forgot the "brotherly covenant," the league that was between Solomon and Hiram king of Tyre, 1 Kin. v. 13, which was so intimate, that Hiram calls Solomon his brother, 1 Kin. ix. 13. Note, It is a great aggravation of enmity and malice when it is the violation of friendship, and of a "brotherly covenant." 2nd. Here is nothing peculiar in the punishment of Tyrus, but that the palaces thereof shall be devoured, which was done when Nebuchadnezzar took it after thirteen years' siege. Their merchants were all princes, and their private houses were as palaces; but the fire shall make no more of them than cottages.

4. Concerning Edom, the posterity of Esau. 1st. Their peculiar sin was an unmerciful, unwearied pursuit of the people of God, and their taking all advantages against them to do them a mischief, ver. 11. He did pursue his brother with the sword, not only of old, when the king of Edom took up arms to oppose the children of Israel's passage through his border, Num. xx. 18, but ever since upon all occasions. They had not strength and courage enough to face them in the field of battle; but whenever any other enemy had put Judah or Israel to flight, then the Edomites set in with the pursuers, fell upon the rear, slew those that were half dead already, and (as is usual with cowards when they have an enemy at an advantage) they did "cast off all pity." Those that are least courageous are commonly most cruel. Edom was so; his malice 'destroyed his compassion,' so the word is. He stripped himself of the tenderness of a man, and put on the fierceness of a beast of prey, and as such a one he did tear; "his anger did tear perpetually." His cruelty was insatiable, and he never knew when he sucked enough of the blood of Israel, but like the horse-leech still cried, Give, give. Nay, he "kept his wrath for ever;" when he wanted objects of his wrath, and opportunity to shew it, yet he kept it in reserve, it rested in his bosom, he rolled it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, and had it ready to spit in the face of Israel upon the next occasion. Cursed be such cruel wrath and anger so fierce, so outrageous, which makes men like the devil, who continually seeks to devour, and unlike to God, who keepeth not his anger for ever. Edom's malice was unnatural, for thus he pursued his brother, whom he ought to have protected. It was hereditary, as if it had been entailed upon the family ever since Esau hated Jacob, and time itself could not wear it out; no, nor the brotherly carriage of Israel towards them, Deu. ii. 4, and the express law given to Israel, Deu. xxiii. 7, "Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite, for he is thy brother." 2nd. Here is nothing peculiar in the punishment; but, ver. 11, a fire shall be sent to devour their palaces. Note, The fire of our anger against our brethren kindles the fire of God's anger against us.

5. Concerning the Ammonites, ver. 13—15. 1st. See how violently the fire of their anger turned against the people of God. They not only triumphed in their calamities, as we find, Eze. xxv. 2, 6, but they did themselves use them barbarously; they "ripped up the women with child of Gilead," a piece of cruelty the very mention whereof strikes a horror upon one's mind. One would think it impossible that any of the human race should be so inhuman. Hazael was guilty of it, 2 Kin. viii. 12. It was done not only in a brutish rage, which falls without consideration upon all that comes before it, but with a devilish design to extirpate the race of Israel,—by killing not only all that were born, but all that were to be born, worse than Egyptian cruelty. It was "that they might enlarge their border," that they might make the land of Gilead their own, and there might be none to lay claim to it, or give them any disturbance in the possession of it. We find, Jer. xlix. 1, that the Ammonites "inherited Gad," that is, Gilead, under the pretence that Israel had no sons, no heirs. We know how heavy their doom was, and how heinous their crime, who said, "This is the heir, come let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours," by occupancy. See what cruelty covetousness is the cause of, and what horrid practices those are often put upon that are greedy to enlarge their own border. 2nd. See how violently the fire of God's anger burned against them. Shall not God visit for these things done to any of mankind, especially when they are done to his own people? Shall not his soul be avenged on such a nation as this? No doubt it shall. The fire shall be kindled with shouting in the day of battle, that is, war shall kindle the fire. It shall be a fire accompanied with the sword, or a roaring fire, which shall make a noise like that of soldiers ready to engage; and it shall be as a tempest in the day of the whirlwind, which comes swiftly, furiously, and bears down all before it. Or, this tempest and whirlwind shall be as bellows to the fire, to make it burn the stronger, and spread the farther. It is particularly threatened that their king and his princes shall go together into captivity, carried away by the king of Babylon, not long after Judah was. See what changes God's providence often makes with men, or rather their own sin; kings become captives, and princes prisoners. Milchom shall go into captivity; some understand it of the God of the Ammonites, whom they called Moloch—a king; "He and his princes," and his priests that attend him, shall "go into captivity." Their idol shall be so far from protecting them that it shall itself go into captivity with them. Note, Those who by violence and fraud seek to enlarge their own border will justly be expelled and excluded their own border; nor is it strange if those who make no conscience of invading others' rights be able to make no resistance against those that invade theirs.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter, I. God by the prophet proceeds in a like controversy with Moab, as before with other nations, ver. 1—3. II. He shews what quarrel he had with Judah, ver. 4, 5. III. He at length begins his charge against Israel, to which all that goes before is but an introduction. Observe, 1. The sins they are charged with: injustice, oppression, whoredom, ver. 6—8; 2. The aggravations of those sins; the temporal and spiritual mercies God had bestowed upon them, for which they had made him such ungrateful returns, ver. 9—12; 3. God's complaint of them for their sins, ver. 13; and his threatenings of their ruin, and their utter inability to prevent it, ver. 14—16.

THUS saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Moab,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because he burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime:
2 But I will send a fire upon Moab,
And it shall devour the palaces of Kirioth:
And Moab shall die with tumult,
With shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet:

RUINS IN MOAB.

3 And I will cut off the judge from the midst thereof,
And will slay all the princes thereof with him, saith the LORD.
4 Thus saith the LORD:
For three transgressions of Judah,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they have despised the law of the LORD,
And have not kept his commandments,
And their lies caused them to err,
After the which their fathers have walked:
5 But I will send a fire upon Judah,
And it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem.
6 Thus saith the LORD;
For three transgressions of Israel,
And for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;
Because they sold the righteous for silver,
And the poor for a pair of shoes;
7 That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor,
And turn aside the way of the meek:
And a man and his father will go in unto the same maid,
To profane my holy name:
8 And they lay themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge
By every altar,
And they drink the wine of the condemned
In the house of their god.

Here is, First. The judgment of Moab, another of the nations that bordered upon Israel. They are reckoned with, and shall be punished "for three transgressions and for four," as those before. Now,

1. Moab's fourth transgression, as theirs who were before set to the bar, was cruelty. The instance given refers not to the people of God, but to a heathen like themselves. The king of Moab "burnt the bones of the king of Edom into lime." We find there was war between the Edomites and the Moabites, in which the king of Moab in distress and rage offered his own son for a burnt offering to appease the deity, 2 Kin. iii. 26, 27; and it should seem that afterwards he or some of his successors, in revenge upon the Edomites, for bringing him to that extremity, having an advantage against the king of Edom, either seized him alive and burnt him to ashes, or slew him and burnt his body, or digged up the bones of their dead king, of that particularly who had so straitened him, and in token of his rage and fury burnt them to lime, and perhaps made use of the powder of his bones for the whitewashing of the walls and ceiling of his palace, that he might please himself with the sight of that monument of his revenge; est vindicta bonum vita jucundius ipsa,—'revenge is sweeter than life itself.' It is barbarous to abuse human bodies, for we ourselves also are in the body; it is senseless to abuse dead bodies, nay, it is impious, for we believe and look for the resurrection; and to abuse the dead bodies of the kings (whose persons and names ought to be in a particular manner respected and had in veneration) is an affront to majesty. It is an argument of a base spirit for those to trample upon a lion, who, were he alive, would tremble before him. 2. Moab's doom for this transgression is, 1st. A judgment of death. Those that deal cruelly shall be cruelly dealt with; ver. 2, "Moab shall die." The Moabites shall be cut off with the sword of war, which kills "with tumult, with shouting, and with sound of trumpet," circumstances that make it so much the more terrible, as the lion's roaring aggravates his tearing; "every battle of the warrior is with confused noise," Isa. ix. 5. 2nd. It is a judgment upon their judges, who had passed the sentence upon the bones of the king of Edom, that they should be burnt to lime; "I will cut him off," saith God, ver. 3; he shall know there is a judge that is higher than he. The king, the chief judge, and all the inferior judges and princes, shall be cut off together. If the people sometimes suffer for the sins of their princes, yet the princes themselves shall not escape; Jer. xlviii. 47, "Thus far is the judgment of Moab."

Secondly. Judah also is a near neighbour to Israel; and therefore, now justice is riding the circuit, that shall not be passed by. That nation had made itself like the heathen, and mingled itself with them, and therefore the indictment here runs against them in the same form in which it had run against all the rest; "For three transgressions of Judah, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof." Their sins are as many as the sins of other nations, and we find them huddled up with them in the same character; Jer. ix. 26, "Egypt and Judah and Edom,"—jumble them together, they are all alike. The sentence here also is the same; ver. 5, "I will send a fire upon Judah," though it is the land where God is known, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, though it is the holy city, and God has been "known in its palaces for a refuge," when time was, Ps. xlviii. 3. But the sin here charged upon Judah is different from all the rest. The other nations were reckoned with for injuries done to men, but Judah is reckoned with for indignities done to God, ver. 4. 1. They put contempt upon his statutes, and persisted in disobedience to them; "They have despised the law of the Lord," as if it were not worth taking notice of, nor had any thing in it valuable; and herein they despised the wisdom, justice, and goodness, as well as the authority and sovereignty of the Lawmaker. This they did in effect when they kept not his commandments, made no conscience of them, took no care about them. 2. They put honour upon his rivals, their idols, here called "their lies," which "caused them to err;" for "an image is a teacher of lies," Hab. ii. 18, and they that are led away into the error of idolatry are by that led into a multitude of other errors; uno dato absurdo mille sequuntur,—'one absurdity draws after it a thousand.' God is an infinite eternal Spirit; but when that truth of God is by idolatry changed into a lie all his other truths are in danger of being so changed likewise. Thus their idols caused them to err, and God justly gave them up to strong delusions. Nor was it any excuse for their sin, that they were the lies after which their fathers walked; for they should rather have taken warning than taken pattern by those that perished with these lies in their right hand.

Thirdly. We now at length come to the words which Amos saw concerning Israel. The reproofs and threatenings having walked the round, here they centre, here they settle. He begins with them as with the rest, "For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof;" if all these nations must be punished for their iniquities, shall Israel go unpunished? Observe here what their sins were for which God would reckon with them.

1. Perverting justice. This was the sin of those who were intrusted with the administration of justice, the judges and magistrates, and all parties concerned. They made nothing of a righteous man, and his righteous cause, when it came to be tried before them: for a piece of silver, sentence was passed, not according to the merits of the cause, but the bribe always turned the scale, and judgment was set to sale by auction to the highest bidder. They would sell the life and livelihood of a poor man "for a pair of shoes," for the least advantage to themselves that could be proposed to them. Give them but a pair of shoes, and the cause of a poor man, who could not give them so much as that, should be betrayed, and left at the mercy of those that will have no mercy. They will rather play at small game than sit out; "for a piece of bread such a man will transgress." Note, Those that will wrong their consciences for any thing will come at length to do it for next to nothing; those that begin to sell justice for silver will in time be so sordid as to sell it for a pair of shoes, for a pair of old shoes.

2. Oppressing the poor, and seeking to benefit themselves by doing them a mischief; they "pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor." They swallow up the poor with the utmost greediness, and make a prey of them that are in sorrow, with dust on their heads,—poor orphans that are in mourning for their parents; they catch at them to get their estates into their hands. They never rest till they have got the heads of the poor in the dust, to be trodden on. Or, "they pant after the dust of the earth," that is, silver and gold, white and yellow dust; they covet it earnestly, and levy it upon the head of the poor by their unjust exactions. Note, Men's seeking to enrich themselves by the impoverishing of others is a transgression which God will not long turn away the punishment of. This is "turning aside the way of the meek," contriving to do injury to those that they know are mild and patient, and will bear injury. They invade their rights, break their measures, and obstruct the course of justice in favour of them, not suffering them to go on with their righteous cause; this is turning aside their way. Note, The more patiently men bear the injuries that are done them, the greater is the sin of those that injure them, and the more occasion they have to expect that God will right them, and take vengeance for them. "I, as a deaf man, heard not," and then "thou wilt hear."

3. Abominable uncleanness; even incest itself, such as is not named among the Gentiles, that "a man should have his father's wife," 2 Cor. v. 1, his father's concubine; "A man and his father will go in unto the same young woman," as black an instance as any other of an unbounded promiscuous lust; and yet where the former iniquities of oppression and extortion are this also is found; for laws of modesty seldom hold those that have broken the bands of justice, and cast away its cords from them. This wickedness is such a scandal to religion, and the professors of it, that they who are guilty of it are looked as designing thereby to profane God's holy name, and to render it odious among the heathen, as if he countenanced the villanies which those who pretend relation to him allow themselves in, and were altogether such a one as they.

4. Regaling themselves, and yet pretending to honour their God with that which they had got by oppression and extortion, ver. 8. They add idolatry to their injustice, and then think to atone for their injustice with their idolatry. 1st. They make merry with that which they have unjustly squeezed from the poor. They "lay themselves down" at ease and in state, and stretch themselves upon clothes laid to pledge, which they ought to have restored the same night, according to the law, Deu. xxiv. 12, 13. And they "drink the wine of the condemned," of such as they have fined and laid heavy mulcts upon, spending that in sensuality which they had got by injustice. 2nd. They think to make atonement for this by feasting on the gains of oppression before their altars, and drinking this wine in the house of their god, in the temples where they worshipped their calves, as if they would make God a partner in their crimes, by making him a partner of the profits of them—service good enough for false gods, but the true God will not be thus mocked. He has declared he "hates robbery for burnt offerings," and cannot be served acceptably but with that which is got honestly.

9 Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them,
Whose height was like the height of the cedars,
And he was strong as the oaks; [beneath.
Yet I destroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from 10 Also I brought you up from the land of Egypt,
And led you forty years through the wilderness,
To possess the land of the Amorite.
11 And I raised up of your sons for prophets,
And of your young men for Nazarites. [LORD.
Is it not even thus, O ye children of Israel? saith the 12 But ye gave the Nazarites wine to drink;
And commanded the prophets,
Saying, Prophesy not.
13 Behold, I am pressed under you,
As a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves.
14 Therefore the flight shall perish from the swift,
And the strong shall not strengthen his force,
Neither shall the mighty deliver himself:
15 Neither shall he stand that handleth the bow;
And he that is swift of foot shall not deliver himself:
Neither shall he that rideth the horse deliver himself,
16 And he that is courageous among the mighty
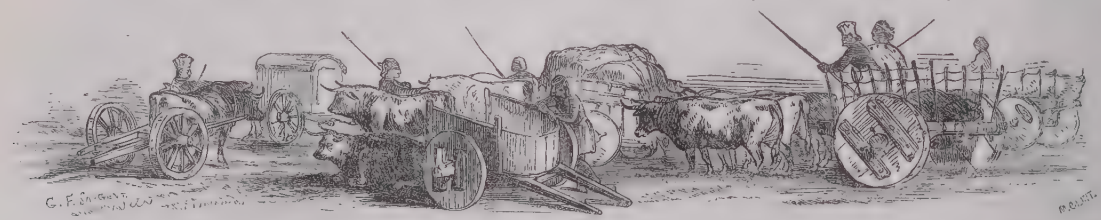
Shall flee away naked in that day, saith the LORD.



ANCIENT CARTS.—ver. 13.

Here, First. God puts his people Israel in mind of the great things he had done for them in putting them into possession of the land of Canaan, the greatest part of which these ten tribes now enjoyed, ver. 9, 10. Note, We need often to be minded of the mercies we have received, which are the heaviest aggravations of the sins we have committed. God gives liberally, and upbraids us not with our meanness and unworthiness, and the disproportion between his gifts and our merits; but he justly upbraids us with our ingratitude and ill requital of his favours, and tells us what he had done for us, to shame us for not rendering again according to the benefit done to us: "Son, remember," Israel, remember, 1. That God brought thee out of a house of bondage, rescued thee out of the land of Egypt, where else thou hadst perished in slavery. 2. That he led thee forty years through a desert land, and fed thee in a wilderness, where else thou hadst perished with hunger. Mercies to our ancestors were mercies to us, for if they had been cut off we had not been. 3. That he made room for them in Canaan, by extirpating the natives by a series of wonders little inferior to those by which they were redeemed out of Egypt; I "destroyed the Amorite before them," here put for all the devoted nations. Observe the magnificence of the enemies that stood in their way, which is taken notice of that God might be the more magnified in the subduing of them. They were of great stature, "whose height was like the height of the cedars," and the people of Israel were as shrubs to them; and of great strength, not only tall, but well set, "he was strong as the oaks." Their kingdom was eminent among the nations, and overtopped all its neighbours; the supports and defences of it seemed impregnable; it was as fine as the stately cedar, it was as firm as the sturdy oak, yet when God had a vine to plant there, Ps. lxxx. 8, 9, this Amorite is not only cut down but plucked up. "I destroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from beneath," so that the Amorites were no more a nation, nor ever read of any more. Thus highly did God value Israel; he gave men for them, and people for their life, Isa. xliii. 4. How ungrateful then were they who put such contempt upon him! 4. That he made them "possess the land of the Amorite;" not only put it into their hands, so that they became masters of it, jure belli, but gave them a better title to it, so that it became theirs by promise.

Secondly. He likewise upbraids them with the spiritual privileges and advantages they enjoyed as a holy nation, ver. 11. They had helps for their souls, which taught them how to make a good use of their temporal enjoyments, and were therefore more valuable. It is true the ten tribes had not God's temple, altar, and priesthood, and it was their own fault that they deserted them, and for that they might justly have been left in utter darkness; but God left not himself without witness, or them without guides, to shew them the way.

1. They had prophets that were powerful instructors in piety, Divinely inspired, and commissioned to make known the mind of God to them, to shew them what is pleasing to God, and what displeasing; to reprove them for their faults, and warn them of their danger; to direct them in their difficulties, and comfort them in their troubles. God raised them up prophets, spirited them for that work, and employed them in it. He raised them up of their sons, from among themselves, as Moses and Christ were raised up "from among their brethren," Deu. xviii. 15. It was an honour put upon their nation and upon their families that they had children of their own to be God's messengers to them, of their own language, not strangers sent from another country, whom they might suspect to be prejudiced against them and their land, but those whom they knew wished well to them. Note, Faithful ministers are great blessings to any people, and it is God that raiseth them up to be so, and they may justly be reckoned an honour to the families they are of.

2. They had Nazarites that were bright examples of piety; "I raised up of your young men for Nazarites," men that bound themselves by a vow to God and his service, and in pursuance of that denied themselves many of the lawful delights of sense, as drinking wine and eating grapes. There were some of their young men that were in their prime for the enjoyment of the pleasures of this life, and yet voluntarily abridged themselves of them; these God raised up by the power of his grace, to be monuments of his grace, to his glory, and to be his witnesses against the impieties of that degenerate age. Note, It is a great blessing to any place to have eminent good Christians in it, as to have eminent good ministers in it, for so they have examples to their rules. We must acknowledge that it bodes well to any people when God raiseth up numbers of hopeful young people among them; when he makes their young men Nazarites, devout and conscientious, and mortified to the pleasures of sense; and those that are such Nazarites, are "purer than snow, whiter than milk," they are indeed the polite young men, for their "polishing is of sapphire," Lam. iv. 7. They that have such men, such young men, among them have therein such an advantage both for direction and encouragement to be religious as they will be called to an account for another day if they do not improve. Israel is here reckoned with, not only for the prophets, but for the Nazarites raised up among them. Concerning the truth of this he appeals to themselves; "Is it not even thus, O ye children of Israel?" Can you deny it? Have not yourselves been sensible of the advantage you have had by the prophets and Nazarites raised up among you? Note, Sinners' own consciences will be witnesses for God that he has not been wanting to them in the means of grace; so that if they perish it is because they have been wanting to themselves in not improving those means. The men of Judah shall themselves "judge between God and his vineyard," whether he could have done more for it, Isa. v. 3, 4.

Thirdly. He chargeth them with the abuse of the means of grace they enjoyed, and the opposition they gave to God's designs in affording them those means, ver. 12. They were so far from walking in the light, that they rebelled against it and did what they could to extinguish it, that it might not shine in their faces to their conviction.

1. They did what they could to debauch good people, to draw them off from their seriousness in devotion and their strictness in conversation. "Ye gave the Nazarites wine to drink," contrary to their vow, that, having broken it in that instance, they might not pretend to keep it in any other. Some they surprised or allured into it, and "with their much fair speech caused them to yield;" others they forced and frightened into it, reproached and threatened them if they were more precise than their neighbours; and, by drawing them in to drink wine, they spoiled them for Nazarites. Note, Satan and his agents are very busy to corrupt the minds of young people that look heavenward, and many that we thought would have been Nazarites they have overcome by giving them wine to drink, by drawing them into the love of mirth and pleasure and drinking company. Multitudes of young men that bade fair for eminent professors of religion have "erred through wine," and been undone for ever. And how do the factors for hell triumph in the debauching of a Nazarite!

2. They did what they could to silence God's ministers, and to stop their mouths. Ye "commanded the prophets, saying, Prophesy not," and threatened them if they did prophesy, ch. vii. 12, as if God's messengers were bound to observe your orders, and might not deliver their errand unless you gave them leave; and so you not only received the grace of God, in raising up those prophets, in vain, but put the highest affront imaginable upon that God in whose name the prophets spoke. Note, Those have a great deal to answer for that cannot bear fruitful preaching, and those much more that suppress it.

Fourthly. He complains of the wrong they did him by their sins; ver. 13, "I am pressed under you," I am straitened by you, and know not what to do, Hos. xi. 8, 9. I am loaded and burthened by you, and can no longer bear it, and therefore I will ease me of my adversaries, Isa. i. 24. "I am pressed under you," and the load of your sins, "as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves," is loaded with corn, in the midst of the joy of harvest, as long as any will lie on. Note, The great God complains of sin, especially the sins of his professing people, as a burthen to him; he is "grieved with this generation," Ps. xcv. 10, "is broken with their whorish heart," Eze. vi. 9; a consideration which, if it make not the sinner's repentance very deep, it will make his ruin very great. The great God that upholds the world, and never complains that he is pressed under the weight of it, he fainteth not, neither is weary, yet complains of the sins of Israel, yea, and of their hypocritical services too, that he is "weary of bearing them," Isa. i. 14. No wonder the "creature groans, being burdened," Rom. viii. 22, when the Creator saith, "I am pressed under them."

Fifthly. He threatens them with unavoidable ruin. And so some read ver. 13, 'Behold, I will press,' or straiten, 'your place, as a cart full of sheaves presseth.' They shall be loaded with judgments till they shall sink under them, and shall make a noise as a cart overloaded doth. They that will not submit to the convictions of the word, that will neither be won by that nor by the conversation of those about them, shall be made to sink under the weight of God's judgments. If God load us daily with his benefits, and we, notwithstanding that, load him with our sins, how can we expect any other but that he should load us with his judgments? And it is here threatened in the last three verses, that when God comes forth to contend with this provoking people they shall not be able to stand before him, to flee from him, or to make their part good with him; for when God judgeth he will overcome. Though his patience be tired out, his power is not, and so the sinner shall find to his cost. When the Assyrian army comes to lay the country waste by sword or captivity, none shall escape, but every one shall have his share in the common desolation.

1. It will be in vain to think of fleeing from the enemy that comes armed with a commission to make all desolate. "The flight shall perish from the swift;" those that have been famed for happy escapes and happy retreats, their arts shall now fail them. They shall have no time to flee, or shall find no way to take; or they shall have no strength or spirit to attempt it. They shall be at their wits' end, and then they are soon at their flight's end. Are they as Asahel, as "swift of foot as a wild roe?" 2 Sam. ii. 18; yet like him they shall run the faster upon their own destruction; "He that is swift of foot shall not deliver himself," ver. 15. Or do they say as those, Isa. xxx. 16, "We will flee upon horses," and "we will ride upon the swift," yet they shall be overtaken; "neither shall he that rideth the horse deliver himself" from the pursuers; "a horse is a vain thing for safety."

2. It will be in vain to think of fighting it out. God is at war with them, and are they stronger than he? Is there any military force that can pretend to be a match for Omnipotence? No; "the strong shall not strengthen his force." He that has a habit of strength shall not be able to exert it when he has occasion for it. And the mighty, who should protect and deliver others, shall not be able to "deliver himself," to 'deliver his soul,' so the word is, shall not save his life. Let not the strong man, then, "glory in his strength," nor trust in it, but "strengthen himself in the Lord his God," for in him is everlasting strength. And as the bodily strength shall fail, so shall the weapons of war, the armour as well as the arm shall become insufficient; neither shall he stand that handles the bow, though he stand at a distance, but shall betake himself to flight, and not trust to his own bow to save him. Though the arm were never so strong, and the armour never so well fixed, neither will avail when the spirit fails; ver. 6, "He that is courageous among the mighty," that used to look danger in the face, and not be dismayed at it, he shall flee away naked in that day, not only disarmed, having thrown away his weapons, both offensive and defensive, but plundered of his treasure, which he thought to have carried away with him, and he shall think it as much a bargain that he has "his life for a prey." Thus when God pleaseth, "he taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth," and causeth them who used to boast of their courage and their daring enterprises in the field to wander and sneak "in a wilderness where there is no way," Job xii. 4.

CHAPTER III.

A stupid, senseless, heedless people are in this chapter called upon to take notice, I. Of the judgments of God denounced against them, and the warnings he gave them of those judgments; and to be hereby awakened out of their security, ver. 1—8. II. Of the sins that were found among them, by which God was provoked thus to threaten, thus to punish, that they might justify God in his controversy with them; and unless they repented and reformed, might expect no other but that God should proceed in his controversy, ver, 9—15.

HEAR this word that the LORD hath spoken against you, O children of Israel, against the whole family which I brought up from the land of Egypt, saying,

2 You only have I known
Of all the families of the earth:
Therefore I will punish you
For all your iniquities.
3 Can two walk together,
Except they be agreed?
4 Will a lion roar in the forest,
When he hath no prey?
Will a young lion cry out of his den,
If he have taken nothing?
5 Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth,
Where no gin is for him?
Shall one take up a snare from the earth,
And have taken nothing at all?
6 Shall a trumpet be blown in the city,
And the people not be afraid?
Shall there be evil in a city,
And the LORD hath not done it?
7 Surely the Lord GOD will do nothing,
But he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets.
8 The lion hath roared, who will not fear?
The Lord GOD hath spoken, who can but prophesy?

The scope of these verses is to convince the people of Israel that God had a controversy with them; that which the prophet has to say to them is to let them know that the Lord has something to say against them, ver. 1. They were his peculiar people above others, knew his name, and were called by it; nevertheless he hath something against them, and they are called to hear what it is, that they may consider what answer they shall make, as the prisoner at the bar is bid to hearken to his indictment. The children of Israel would not regard the words of counsel and comfort that God had many a time spoken to them, and now they shall be made to hear the word of reproof and threatening that the Lord hath spoken against them; for he will act as he hath spoken.

First. Let them know that the gracious cognizance God had taken of them, and the favour he had bestowed upon them, should not exempt them from the punishment due to them for their sins. It is a family that God "brought up from the land of Egypt," ver. 1, and it was no more than a family when it went down thither; thence God delivered it, thence he fetched it to be a family to himself. It is not only the ten tribes, the kingdom of Israel, that must take notice of this, but that of Judah also, for it is spoken against the whole family that God brought up out of Egypt. It is a family that God has bestowed distinguished favours upon, has owned in a peculiar manner; "You only have I known of all the families of the earth." Note, God's church in the world is a family dignified above all the families of the earth. Those that know God are known of him; in Judah is God known, and therefore Judah is more than any people known to God. God has known them, that is, he has chosen them, covenanted with them, and conversed with them as his acquaintance. Now one would think it should follow, Therefore, I will spare you, will connive at your faults, and excuse you; no, "Therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities." Note, The distinguished favours of God to us, if they do not serve to restrain us from sin, shall not serve to exempt us from punishment. Nay, the nearer any are to God in profession, and the kinder notice he has taken of them, the more surely, the more quickly, and the more severely will he reckon with them, if they, by a course of wilful sin, profane their character, disgrace their relation to him, violate their engagements, and put a slight upon the favours and honours with which they have been distinguished. Therefore they shall be punished because their sins dishonour him, affront him, and grieve him, more than the sins of others; and because it is necessary that God should vindicate his own honour, by making it appear that he hates sin, and hates it most in those that are nearest to him. If they be but as bad as others, they shall be punished as worse than others, because it is justly expected they should be so much better than others. Judgment begins at the house of God, begins at the sanctuary, for God will be sanctified either by or upon those that come nigh unto him, Lev. x. 3.

Secondly. Let them know that they could not expect any comfortable communion with God unless they first made their peace with him; ver. 3, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" No, how should they? Where there is no friendship there can be no fellowship; if two persons be at variance, they must first accommodate the matters in difference between them before there can be any interchanging of good offices. Israel had affronted God, had broken their covenant with him, and ill requited his favours to them; and yet they expected he should continue to walk with them,—should take their part, act for them, and give them assurances of his presence with them, though they took no care by repentance and reformation to agree with their adversary, and to turn away his wrath. But how can that be? saith God; while you continue to walk contrary to God, you can look for no other but that he should walk contrary to you, Lev. xxvi. 13. Note, We cannot expect that God should be present with us, or act for us, unless we be reconciled to him. God and man cannot "walk together except they be agreed;" unless we agree with God in our end, which is his glory, we cannot walk with him by the way.

Thirdly. Let them know that the warnings God gave them of judgments approaching were not causeless and groundless, merely to amuse them, but certain declarations of the wrath of God against them, which, if they did not speedily repent, they would infallibly feel the effects of; ver. 4, "Will a lion roar in the forest when he has no prey" in view? No, he roars upon his prey; nor will a "young lion cry out of his den," if the old lion has taken nothing to bring home to him. Nor would God thus give you warning, both by the threatenings of his word and by lesser judgments, if you had not by your sins made yourselves a prey to his wrath, nor if he were not really about to fall upon you with desolating, destroying judgments. Note, The threatenings of the word and providence of God are not bugbears to frighten children and fools, but are certain inferences from the sin of man, and certain presages of the judgments of God.

Fourthly. Let them know that, as their own wickedness was the procuring cause of these judgments, so they shall not be removed till they have done their work, ver. 5. When God is come forth to contend with a sinful people, it is necessary they should understand, 1. That it is their own sin that has entangled them; for, "can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth where no gin is for him?" No, nature doth not lay snares for the creatures, but the art of men. A bird is not taken in a snare by chance, but with the fowler's design: so the providence of God prepares trouble for sinners, and it is in the work of their own hands that they are snared. Affliction doth not spring out of the dust, but it is God's justice, and our own wickedness, that correct us. 2. It is nothing but their own repentance that can disentangle them; for shall one take up the snare from the earth which he laid with design, except he have taken something as he designed? So neither will God remove the affliction he hath sent till it have done its work, and accomplished that for which he sent it. If our hearts be duly humbled, and we are brought by our afflictions to confess and forsake our sins, then the snare has taken something, then the point is gained, the end is answered; and then, and not till then, the snare is broken,—is taken up from the earth, and we are delivered in love and mercy.

Fifthly. Let them know that all their troubles came from the hand of God's providence, and from the counsel of his will; ver. 6, "Shall there be evil in the city," in a family, in a nation, "and the Lord hath not done it," appointed it, and performed what he appointed? The evil of sin is from ourselves, it is our own doing; but the evil of troubles, personal or public, is from God, and is his doing; whoever are the instruments, God is the principal agent. "Out of his mouth both evil and good proceed." This consideration, that whatever evil is in the city the Lord hath done it, should engage us patiently to bear our share in public calamities, and to study to answer God's intention in them.

Sixthly. Let them know that their prophets, who give them warning of judgments approaching, deliver nothing to them but what they have received from the Lord, to be delivered to his people. 1. God makes it known beforehand to the prophets; ver. 7, "Surely the Lord Jehovah will do nothing," none of that evil in the city spoken of, ver. 6, "but he reveals it to his servants the prophets," though to others it is a secret. Therefore they know not what they do who make light of the warnings which the prophets give them in God's name. Observe, God's prophets are his servants, whom he employs to go on his errands to the children of men. The secret of God is with them; it is in some sense with all the righteous, Pr. iii. 32, with "all that fear God," Ps. xxv. 14, but in a peculiar manner with the prophets, to whom the spirit of prophecy is a spirit of revelation. It had put honour enough upon the prophets if it had been only said that sometimes God is pleased to reveal to his prophets what he designs to do; but it speaks something very great to say, He doth nothing but he reveals it to them, as if they were the men of his counsel. "Shall I hide from Abraham," who is a prophet, "the thing which I do," Gen. xviii. 17. God will therefore be sure to reckon with those who put contempt on the prophets whom he puts this honour upon. 2. The prophets cannot but make that known to the people which God has made known to them; ver. 8, "The Lord God has spoken, who can but prophesy." His prophets, to whom he hath spoken in secret by dreams and visions, cannot but speak in public to the people what they have heard from God. They are so full of those things themselves, so well assured concerning them, and so much affected with them, that they cannot but speak of them, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak; "I believed, therefore have I spoken," Acts iv. 26. Nay, and besides the prophetic impulse which went along with the inspiration, and made the word like a fire in their bones, Jer. xx. 9, they received a command from God to deliver what they had been charged with, and they had been false to their trust if they had not done it. Necessity was laid upon them, as upon the preachers of the Gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 16.

Seventhly. Let them know that they ought to tremble before God, upon the fair warning he had given them, as they would, 1. Upon the sounding of a trumpet, to give notice of the approach of the enemy, that all may stand upon their guard, and stand to their arms; "Shall a trumpet be blown in the city and the people not be afraid," or run together? as some read it, ver. 6. Will they not presently come together in a fright to consider what is best to be done for the common safety? Yet when God by his prophets gives them notice of their danger, and summons them to come and enlist themselves under his banner, it makes no impression; they will sooner give credit to a watchman on their walls than to a prophet sent of God; will sooner obey the summons of the governor of their city than the orders given them by the governor of the world. God saith, Hearken to the voice of the trumpet, but they will not hearken; nay, and they tell him plainly that they will not, Jer. vi. 17. 2. Upon the roaring of a lion. God is sometimes "as a lion, and a young lion to the house of Judah," Hos. v. 14. The lion roars before he tears, thus God warns before he wounds. If, therefore, the lion roars upon a poor traveller, as he did against Samson, Jud. xiv. 5, he cannot but be put into a mighty consternation; yet "the Lord roars out of Zion," ch. i. 2, and none are afraid; but they go on securely, as if they were in no danger. Note, The fair warning given to a careless world, if it be not taken, will aggravate its condemnation another day. The lion roared, and they were not moved with fear to prepare an ark. O the amazing stupidity of an unbelieving world, that will not be wrought upon, no, not by the terrors of the Lord!

9 Publish in the palaces at Ashdod,
And in the palaces in the land of Egypt,
And say, Assemble yourselves upon the mountains of Samaria,
And behold the great tumults in the midst thereof,
And the oppressed in the midst thereof.
10 For they know not to do right, saith the LORD,
Who store up violence and robbery in their palaces.
11 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
An adversary there shall be even round about the land;
And he shall bring down thy strength from thee,
And thy palaces shall be spoiled.
12 Thus saith the LORD;
As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion
Two legs, or a piece of an ear;
So shall the children of Israel be taken out
That dwell in Samaria in the corner of a bed,
And in Damascus in a couch.
13 Hear ye, and testify in the house of Jacob,
Saith the Lord GOD, the God of hosts,
14 That in the day that I shall visit the transgressions of Israel upon him
I will also visit the altars of Beth-el:
And the horns of the altar shall be cut off, and fall to the ground.
15 And I will smite the winter house with the summer house;
And the houses of ivory shall perish,
And the great houses shall have an end, saith the LORD.

Israel is here again convicted and condemned, and particular notice given of the crimes they are convicted of, and the punishments they are condemned to.

First. Notice is given of it to their neighbours. The prophet is ordered to publish it in the palace of Ashdod, one of the chief cities of the Philistines; nay, the summons must go farther, even to "the palaces in the land of Egypt." The great men of both those nations that dwell in the palaces, that are inquisitive concerning the affairs of the neighbour nations, and are conversant with the public intelligence, let them assemble themselves "upon the mountains of Samaria," ver. 9. There, upon a throne, high and lifted up, the judgment is set; Samaria is the criminal that is to be tried. Let them be present at the trial; for it shall be (as trials used to be) public, in the face of the country; let them make an appointment to meet there from all parts, to judge between God and his vineyard. God appeals to all impartial righteous men, Eze. xxiii. 45. They will all subscribe to the equity of his proceedings, when they see how the case stands. Note, God's controversies with sinners do not fear a scrutiny. Even Philistines and Egyptians will be made to see and say that the ways of the Lord are equal, but our ways are unequal. They are likewise summoned to attend, not only that they may justify God, and be witnesses for him that he deals fairly, but that they may themselves take warning; for if judgment begin at the house of God, as they see it doth, what shall be the end of those that are strangers to him? 1 Pet. iv. 17; "If this be done in a green tree, what shall be done in a dry?" Or, this intimates that the sin of Israel had been so notorious that the neighbour nations could come in witnesses against them, and therefore it was fit their punishment should be so. If it could have been concealed we would have said, "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon;" but why should their friends consult their reputation, when they themselves do not consult it? If they are grown impudent in sin let them bear the shame; publish it in Ashdod, in Egypt.

1. Let them see how black the charge is, and how well proved. Let them observe the behaviour of the inhabitants of Samaria; let them look off from the adjacent hills, and they may see how rude and boisterous they are, and hear how loud the cry of their sin is, as was that of Sodom. 1st. Look into their streets, and you will see nothing but riot and disorder, "great tumults in the midst thereof." Reason and justice are upon all occasions run down by the noise and fury of an outrageous mob, the dominion of which is the sin and shame of any people, and is likely to be their ruin. 2nd. Look into their prisons, and you see them filled with injured innocents; the oppressed are in the midst thereof, thrown down and crushed by their oppressors, overpowered and overwhelmed, and "they had no comforter, Eccl. iv. 1. 3rd. Look into their courts of justice, and they who preside in those courts "know not to do right," because they have been always accustomed to do wrong. They act as if they had no notion at all of the thing called justice, are in no care to do justice themselves or to see that others do justice. 4th. Look into their treasures and stores, and you see them replenished with violence and robbery, with that which was unjustly got, and is still unjustly kept; thus they have heaped treasure together for the last days, but it will prove a "treasure of wrath against the day of wrath." It may be well said, those know not to do right who think to enrich themselves by doing wrong.

2. Let them see how heavy the doom is, and how well executed, ver. 11, 12. 1st. Their country shall be invaded and ruined; and observe how the punishment answers the sin, First. Great tumults are in the midst of the land, and therefore "an adversary shall be even round about the land;" the Assyrian forces shall surround it, and break in upon it on every side. Note, When sin is harboured and indulged in the midst of a people, they can expect no other but that adversaries should be round about them, so that go which way they will they go into the mouth of danger, Lu. xix. 43. Secondly. They strengthened themselves in their wickedness, but the enemy shall bring down their strength from them,—that strength which they abused in oppressing the poor, and doing violence to all about them. Note, That power which is made an instrument of unrighteousness will justly be brought down and broken. Thirdly. They stored up "robbery in their palaces," and therefore their palaces shall be spoiled; for what is got and kept wrongfully will not be kept long. Even palaces will be no protection to fraud and oppression; but the greatest of men, if they have spoiled others, shall themselves be spoiled; for the Lord is the avenger of all such. 2nd. Their countrymen shall not escape, ver. 12. They shall be in the hands of the enemy, as a lamb in the mouth of a lion, all devoured and eaten up; and they shall be utterly unable to make any resistance. And if any do make their escape, so as neither to fall by the sword nor to go into captivity, yet they shall be very few, and those of the meanest and least considerable, like two legs or shanks of a lamb, or, it may be, a piece of an ear, which the lion drops, or the shepherd takes from him when he has eaten the whole body; so perhaps here and there one may escape from Samaria and from Damascus, when the king of Assyria shall fall upon them both, but none to make any account of. And those that do escape, it shall be with the utmost difficulty and hazard, by hiding themselves in "the corner of a bed," or under the bed's feet, which intimates that their spirits shall be quite cowed and broken, and they shall sneak shamefully in the time of danger. They shall not hide themselves in dens and caves, but in the corner of a bed, or the piece of a bed, such as poor people must be content with. They shall very narrowly escape, as it is foretold concerning the last destruction of Jerusalem, that there shall be "two in a bed together, one taken and the other left." Note, When God's judgments come forth against a people with commission, it will be in vain to think of outrunning them. Some make their dwelling in the corner of a bed, and in a couch, to speak their present security and sensuality. They are at ease, as in a bed or on a couch, but when God comes to contend with them, he shall make them uneasy, shall take them away out of the bed of their sloth and slumber. Those that stretch themselves lazily upon their couches when God's judgments are abroad, shall go captive with the first that go captive.

Secondly. Notice is given of it to themselves, ver. 12. Let this be testified, and heard in the house of Jacob, among all the seed of Israel, for it is spoken by the Lord God, the God of hosts, who hath authority to pass this sentence, and ability to execute it. Let them know from him that the day is at hand when God will "visit the transgression of Israel upon him," that is, when he will inquire into them and reckon for them. There will come a day of visitation, a day of punishment; and in that day all those things they are proud of, and put confidence in, shall fail them, and so they shall smart for the sins they have been guilty of about them.

1. Woe to their altars, for God will visit them. He will inquire into the sins they have been guilty of at their altars, and bring into the account all their superstition and idolatry,—all their expenses on their false gods, and all their expectations from them; and he will lay the altars themselves under the marks of his displeasure, for the horns of the altar shall be cut off and fall to the ground, and with them the altar itself demolished and broken to pieces. We find the altar at Bethel prophesied against, 1 Kin. xiii. 2, and immediately rent, ver. 3; and that prophecy fulfilled when Josiah "burnt men's bones upon it," 2 Kin. xxiii. 15, 16. This here seconds that prophecy, and seems to point at the same event. Note, If men will not destroy idolatrous altars God will, and those with them that held them in veneration. Some make "the horns of the altar" to signify all those things which they flee to for refuge, and trust in, and which they make their sanctuary. They shall all be cut off, so that they shall have nothing to take hold of.

2. Woe to their houses, for God will visit them too. He will inquire into the sins they have been guilty of in their houses, the robbery they have stored up in their houses, and the luxury in which they lived. And, ver. 15, "I will smite the winter house with the summer house." Their nobility and gentry, and rich merchants, had their winter houses in the city and their summer houses in the country; so nice were they in guarding against the inconveniences of the winter when the country was thought too cold, and of the summer when the city was thought too hot, though the climate of that good land was so temperate, like that of ours, that neither the cold nor heat were ever in extremity. They indulged a foolish affectation of change and variety, but God will either by war or by the earthquake smite both the winter house and the summer house; neither shall serve to shelter them from his judgments. The houses of ivory, (so called because either the ceiling, or wainscot, or some of the ornaments of them, were edged or inlaid with ivory,) those shall perish,—shall be burnt, or pulled down, and "the great houses shall have an end;" the most splendid and spacious houses, the houses of their great men, they shall no longer be, or at least be no longer theirs. Note, The pomp and pleasantness of men's houses will be so far from fortifying them against God's judgments, that it will make them the more grievous and vexatious, as their extravagance about them will be put upon the score of their sins and follies.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter, I. The oppressors in Israel are threatened for their oppression of the poor, ver. 1—3. II. The idolaters in Israel being joined to idols, are given up to their own hearts' lusts, ver. 4, 5. III. All the sins of Israel are aggravated from their incorrigibleness in them, and their refusal to return and reform, notwithstanding the various rebukes of providence they had been under, ver. 6—11. IV. They are invited yet at length to humble themselves before God, since it is impossible for them to make their part good against him, ver. 12, 13.

HEAR this word, ye kine of Bashan,
That are in the mountain of Samaria,

Which oppress the poor, which crush the needy,
Which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink.
2 The Lord GOD hath sworn by his holiness,
That, lo, the days shall come upon you,
That he will take you away with hooks,
And your posterity with fishhooks.
3 And ye shall go out at the breaches,
Every cow at that which is before her;
And ye shall cast them into the palace, saith the LORD.
4 Come to Beth-el, and transgress;
At Gilgal multiply transgression;
And bring your sacrifices every morning,
And your tithes after three years:
5 And offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven,
And proclaim and publish the free offerings:
For this liketh you, O ye children of Israel, saith the Lord GOD.

It is here foretold, in the name of God, that oppressors shall be humbled, and idolaters shall be hardened.

First. That proud oppressors shall be humbled for their oppressions; for he that doth wrong shall receive according to the wrong that he has done. Now observe,

1. How their sin is described, ver. 12. They are compared to the kine of Bashan, which were a breed of cattle very large and strong, especially if, though bred there, they were fed upon the mountains of Samaria, where the pastures were extraordinarily fat. Amos had been a herdsman, and he speaks in the dialect of his calling, comparing the rich and great men, that lived in luxury and wantonness, to the kine of Bashan, that were wanton and unruly, would not be kept within the bounds of their own pasture, but broke through the hedges, broke down all the fences, and trespassed upon the neighbouring grounds; and not only so, but pushed and gored the lesser cattle that were not a match for them. They that had their summer houses upon the mountains of Samaria, when they went thither for fresh air, were as mischievous as the kine upon the mountains of Bashan, and as injurious to those about them.

1st. They oppress the poor and needy themselves; they crush them to squeeze something to themselves out of them. They take advantage of their poverty and necessity, and inability to help themselves, to make them poorer and more necessitous than they are. They made use of their power, as judges and magistrates, for the invading of men's rights and properties, the poor not excepted; for they made no conscience of robbing even the hospital.

2nd. They are in confederacy with them that do so. They "say to their masters," that is, to the masters of the poor, that abuse them, and violently take from them what they have, when they ought to have relieved them—they say to them, Bring, and let us drink, let us feast with you upon the gains of your oppression, and then we will protect you, and stand by you in it, and reject the appeals of the poor against you. Note, What is got by extortion is commonly made use of as "provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof," and therefore men are tyrants to the poor, because they are slaves to their appetites. "Bring, and let us drink," is the language of those that crush the needy; as if the tears of the oppressed mingled with their wine made it drink the better. And by their associations for drinking and revelling, and an excess of riot, they strengthen their combinations for persecution and oppression, and harden the hearts of one another in it.

2. How their punishment is described, ver. 2, 3. God will "take them away with hooks, and their posterity with fish-hooks;" that is, he will send the Assyrian army upon them, that shall make a prey of them; shall not only inclose the body of the nation in their net, but shall angle for particular persons, and take them prisoners and captives as with hooks and fish-hooks, shall draw them out of their own land, as fish are drawn out of the water, which is their element, they and their children with them. Or, they in their day shall be drawn out by one victorious enemy, and their posterity in their day by another; so that, by a succession of destroying judgments, they shall at length be wholly extirpated. These kine of Bashan thought they could no more be drawn out with a hook and a cord than the leviathan can, Job li. 1, 2. But God will make them know he has a hook for their nose, and a bridle for their jaws, Isa. xxxvii. 29. The enemy shall take them away as easily as the fisherman takes away the little fish, and shall make it their sport and recreation. When the enemy has made himself master of Samaria, then, 1st. Some shall attempt to escape by flight. Ye "shall go out at the breaches" made in the wall of the city, "every cow at that which is before her," to shift for their own safety, and make the best of their way. And now the unruly kine of Bashan are tamed, and are themselves crushed, as they crushed the poor and needy. Note, Those to whom God has given a good pasture, if they are wanton in it, will justly be turned out of it. And those who will not be kept within the hedge of God's precepts forfeit the benefit of the hedge of God's protection, and will be forced in vain to flee through the breaches they have themselves fearfully made in that hedge. 2nd. Others shall think to shelter themselves, or at least their best effects, in the place, because it is a castle well fortified, and a garrison well manned. 'Ye shall throw yourselves,' so some read it, or throw them, that is, your posterity, your children, or whatever is dear to you, into the palace, where the enemy will find it ready to be seized. Note, What is got by oppression cannot long be enjoyed with satisfaction.

3. How their sentence to this punishment is ratified. "The Lord God has sworn it by his holiness." He had often said it, and they regarded it not, they thought God and his prophets did but jest with them; therefore he swears it in his wrath, and what he hath sworn he will not revoke. He swears by his holiness, that attribute of his which is so much his glory, and which is so much glorified in the punishment of wicked people. For, as sure as God is a holy God, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, shall reap the same.

Secondly. That obstinate idolaters shall be hardened in their idolatries; ver. 4, 5, "Come to Bethel, and transgress." It is spoken ironically; Do so, take your course; multiply your transgressions by multiplying your sacrifices, "for this liketh you." But what will ye do in the end hereof? Here we see, 1. How intent they were upon the service of their idols, and how willing they were to be at cost upon them. They brought their sacrifices, and their tithes, and their free offerings, hoping that therein they should be accepted of God, but it was all an abomination to him. The profuseness of idolaters in the service of their false gods may shame our straithandedness in the service of the true and living God. 2. How they mimicked God's institutions. They had their daily sacrifice at the altar of Bethel, as God had at his altar. They had their thank offerings, as God had, only they allowed leaven in them, which God had forbidden, because the priests did not like to have the bread so heavy and tasteless as it would be if it had not leaven in it, or something to ferment it. Holy bread would not serve them, unless it were pleasant bread. 3. How well pleased they were with these services themselves. "This liketh you, O ye children of Israel:" so ye love. What was their own invention they were fond of, and wedded to, and thought it must therefore be pleasing to God, because it was agreeable to their own fancy. 4. How they are upbraided with it. "Come to Bethel," to Gilgal, bring the sacrifices and tithes yourselves, proclaim and publish to the nation the free offerings, pressing them to bring in abundance of such. Go on in this way; that is, 1st. It is plain you are resolved to do it, whatever God and conscience say to the contrary. 2nd. Your prophets shall let you alone in it, and not admonish you as they have done, for it is to no purpose; "Let no man strive to rebuke his neighbour." 3rd. Your foolish hearts shall be more and more darkened and besotted, and you shall be quite given up to these strong delusions, to believe a lie. 4th. What will you get by it? Come to Bethel, and multiply your sacrifices, and see what the better you will be, what returns you will have to your sacrifices, what stead they will stand you in, in the day of distress; "You shall be ashamed at Bethel your confidence," Jer. xlviii. 13. 5th. Come and transgress, come and multiply your transgression, that you may fill up the measure of your iniquity, and be ripened for ruin. Thus Christ said to Judas, "What thou doest, do quickly;" and to the Jews, "Fill ye up the measure of your fathers," Mat. xxiii. 32.

6 And I also have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities,
And want of bread in all your places:
Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.
7 And also I have withholden the rain from you,
When there were yet three months to the harvest:
And I caused it to rain upon one city,
And caused it not to rain upon another city:
One piece was rained upon,
And the piece whereupon it rained not withered.
8 So two or three cities wandered unto one city, to drink water;
But they were not satisfied:
Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.
9 I have smitten you with blasting and mildew:
When your gardens and your vineyards
And your fig trees and your olive trees increased,
The palmerworm devoured them:
Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.
10 I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt:
Your young men have I slain with the sword,
And have taken away your horses;
And I have made the stink of your camps to come up unto your nostrils:
Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.
11 I have overthrown some of you,
As God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah,
And ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning:
Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.
12 Therefore thus will I do unto thee, O Israel:
And because I will do this unto thee,
Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.
13 For, lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind,
And declareth unto man what is his thought,
That maketh the morning darkness,
And treadeth upon the high places of the earth,
The LORD, The God of hosts, is his name.

Here, First. God complains of his people's incorrigibleness under the judgments which he had brought upon them, in order to their humiliation and reformation. He had by several tokens intimated to them his displeasure, with this design, that they might by repentance make their peace with him, but it had not the effect. It is five times repeated in these verses, as the burthen of the charge, "Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord;" you have been several times corrected, but in vain. You are not reclaimed, there is no sign of amendment. You have been sent for by one messenger after another, but you have not come back, you have not come home. 1. This intimates that that which God designed in all his providential rebukes was to reduce them to their allegiance, to influence them to return to him. 2. That, if they had returned to their God, they would have been accepted, he would have bid them welcome, and the troubles they were in should have been removed. 3. That the reason why God sent farther troubles was, because former troubles had not done the work, otherwise it is no pleasure to the Almighty that he should afflict. 4. That God was grieved at their obstinacy, and took it unkindly that they should force him to do that which he did so unwillingly: "You have not returned to me," from whom you have revolted; to me, with whom ye are in covenant; to me, that stand ready to receive you; to me, who have so often called you. Now, to aggravate their incorrigibleness, and to justify himself in inflicting greater judgments, he recounts the lesser judgments with which he had tried to bring them to repentance.

1st. There had sometimes been a scarcity of provisions, though there was no visible cause of it; ver. 6, "I have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities," for you had no meat to chew whereby your teeth might be fouled, especially no flesh, which dirties the teeth; or 'emptiness of teeth,' nothing to fill your mouth with. Bread, the staff of life, has been wanting, for you have sown much and brought in little, as Hag. i. 9. Some think this refers to that seven years' famine that was in Elisha's time, which we read of, 2 Kin. viii. 1. Now when God thus "took away their corn in the season thereof," because they had prepared it for Baal, they should have said, "We will go and return to our first husband," having paid dear for leaving him; but it had not that effect; "They have not returned to me, saith the Lord."

2nd. Sometimes they had wanted rain, and then of course they wanted the fruits of the earth. This evil was of the Lord; "I have withholden the rain from you." God has the key of the clouds, and if he shut, who can open? ver. 7. The rain was withheld "when there were yet three months to the harvest," at the time when they used to have it, and therefore the withholding of it was an extraordinary thing; and if the course of nature was altered, they must therein own the hand of the God of nature; and it was at a time when they most needed it, and therefore the want of it was a very sore judgment, and blasted their expectations of a crop at harvest. And one circumstance which made this very remarkable was, that when there were some places that wanted rain, and withered for want of it, there were other places near adjoining that had it in abundance. God "caused it to rain upon one city, and not upon another," in the same country; nay, he caused it to rain upon one field, one piece of a field, and it was thereby made fruitful and flourishing; but on the next field, on the other side the hedge, nay, on another part of the same field, it rained not at all, and it was so long without rain that all the products of it withered. No doubt this was literally true, and there were many instances of it which were generally taken notice of. Now, First. By this it appeared that the withholding of the rain was not casual, but by a Divine direction and disposal; that the cloud which watereth the earth is "turned round about by the counsels of God, to do whatsoever he commandeth it, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy," Job xxxvii. 12, 13. Rain doth not go by planets, (as common people speak,) but as God sends it by his winds. Secondly. We have reason to think that those cities on which it rained not were the most famous for wickedness, such as Bethel and Gilgal, ver. 4; and that those on which it rained were such as retained something of religion and virtue among them. And so in the town-fields it rained or rained not upon the piece, according as the owner was; for we are sure the curse of the Lord is in the house and upon the ground of the wicked, but he blesseth the habitation of the just, and his field is a field that the Lord has blessed. Thirdly. It would be the greater grief and vexation to those whose fields withered for want of rain, to see their neighbours' fields well watered and flourishing. "My servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry," Isa. lxv. 13; the "wicked shall see it and be grieved." Probably those that were oppressed were rained upon, and so they recovered their losses, while the oppressors withered, and so lost their gains. Fourthly. Yet, as to the nation in general, it was a mixture of mercy with the judgment, and consequently strengthened the call to repentance and reformation, and encouraged them to hope for all mercy in their returns to God, since there was so much mercy in God's rebukes of them. But, because they did not make a good use of this gracious allay to the extremity of the judgment, they had not the benefit of it which otherwise they might have had; for, ver. 8, "Two or three cities wandered" at uncertainty, as beggars, "unto one city to drink water," and, if possible, to have some to carry home with them, but "they were not satisfied." It was but here and there one city that had water, while many wanted, and then it was not as usual, usus communis aquarum,—'Water is free to all.' They that had it had occasion for it, or knew not how soon they might, and therefore could afford but little to them that wanted, saying, "Lest there be not enough for us and you." They that came drank water, but they were not satisfied, because they drank it by measure, and with astonishment; and they that "drink of this water shall thirst again," Jno. iv. 13. They were not satisfied, because their desires were greedy, and what they had God did not bless to them, Hag. i. 6. And now one would think, when they met with all this disappointment, they should have considered their ways, and repented; but it had not that effect; "Yet have ye not returned to me," no, not so much as to pray in a right manner for the former and latter rain, Zec. x. 1. See the folly of carnal hearts; they will wander from city to city, from one creature to another, in pursuit of satisfaction, and still they miss of it; they labour for that which satisfieth not, Isa. lv. 2; and yet, after all, they will not return to God, will not incline their ear to him in whom they might have satisfaction. The preaching of the Gospel is as rain, God sometimes blesseth one place with it more than another; some countries, some cities, are like Gideon's fleece, wet with this dew, while the ground about is dry. All withers where this rain is wanting. But it were well if people were but as wise for their souls as they are for their bodies, and, when they have not this rain for them, would go and seek it where it is to be had; and if they seek aright, they shall not seek in vain.

3rd. Sometimes the fruits of their ground were eaten up by caterpillars, or blasted with mildew, ver. 9. Heaven and earth are armed against those who have made God their enemy. When God pleased, that is, when he was displeased, First. They suffered by a malignant air, the influences of which, either too hot or too cold, blasted their fruits, with a force that could be neither discerned nor resisted, and against which there was no defence. Secondly. They suffered by malignant animals. Their vineyards and gardens yielded their increase in great abundance, so did their fig-trees and olive-trees, but the palmer-worms devoured them before the fruit was ripe and fit to be gathered in. This was either the same judgment with that which we read of, Joel i. 4, 6, or a lesser judgment of the same nature sent before, to give warning of that. But they did not take warning; "Yet have ye not returned to me."

4th. Sometimes the plague had raged among them, and the sword of war had cut off multitudes, ver. 10. The pestilence is God's messenger, this he sent among them, with directions whom to strike dead, and it was done. It was a "pestilence after the manner of Egypt;" deaths were scattered among them by the hand of a destroying angel, at midnight. And perhaps this pestilence, as that of Egypt, fastened upon the firstborn. 'In the way of Egypt,' so the margin; when they were making their escape to Egypt, or going thither to seek for aid, the pestilence seized them by the way, and stopped their journey. The sword of war is likewise "the sword of the Lord;" this was drawn among them with commission; and then it slew their young men, the strength of the present generation and the seed of the next. God saith, I have slain them; he avows the execution; "The slain of the Lord are many." The enemy took away their horses, and converted them to their own use. And the dead carcases of those that were slain, either by the sword or pestilence, were so many, and, for want of surviving friends, were left so long unburied, that the stench of their camps came up into their nostrils, and was both noisome and dangerous, and might put them in mind of the offensiveness of their sin to God. And yet this did not prevail to humble and reclaim them; "You have not returned to him that smiteth you." Such a rueful, woful sight as this prevailed not to make them religious.

5th. In these and other judgments some were remarkably cut off, and made monuments of justice; others were remarkably spared, and made monuments of mercy; the setting of which the one over against the other one would have thought likely to work upon them; but it had not its effect, ver. 11. First. Some were quite ruined, their families destroyed, and themselves in them. "I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah;" perhaps consumed them with lightning, as Sodom was, or the houses some other way burnt to the ground, and the inhabitants in them. Sodom and Gomorrah are said to be condemned with an overthrow, and so made an example, 2 Pet. ii. 6. God had threatened to destroy the whole land with such an overthrow as that of Sodom, Deu. xxix. 23. But he began with some particular places first, to give them warning, or perhaps with some particular persons, whose sins went before-hand to judgment. Secondly. Others very narrowly escaped. Ye were, many of you, "as a firebrand plucked out of the burning," like Lot out of Sodom, when the fire had already kindled upon you; and yet you hate sin never the more for the danger it has brought you to, nor love God ever the more for the deliverance he wrought for you. You that have been so signally delivered, and in such a distinguishing way, yet "have not returned unto me."

Secondly. God in the close calls upon his people, yet at length, in this their day, to understand the things that belong to their peace before they were hid from their eyes, ver. 12, 13. Observe here,

1. How God threatens them with sorer judgments than any they had yet been under. Therefore, seeing you have not been wrought upon by correction hitherto, "Thus will I do unto thee, O Israel." He doth not say how he will do, but it shall be something worse than had come yet, Jno. v. 14. Or, thus I will go on to do unto thee, following one judgment with another, like the plagues of Egypt, till I have made a full end. Nothing else but reformation will prevent the ruin of a sinful people. If they turn not to him, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. "I will punish you yet seven times more, if you will not be reformed;" so it was written in the law, Lev. xxvi. 23, 24.

2. How he awakens them therefore to think of making their peace with God. Seeing "I will do this unto thee," and there is no remedy, "Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel;" that is, 1st. Consider how unable thou art to meet him as a combatant. Some make it to be spoken by way of irony or challenge: Prepare to meet God that is coming forth to contend with thee. What armour of proof canst thou put on? What courage canst thou steel thyself with? Alas, it is but putting briars and thorns before a consuming fire, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5. Art thou able with less than ten thousand to meet Him that comes out against thee with more than twenty thousand? Lu. xiv. 31. 2nd. Resolve, therefore, to meet him as a penitent, as a humble supplicant; to meet him as thy God, in covenant with thee, to submit, and stand it out no longer. We must prepare to "meet God in the way of his judgments," Isa. xxvi. 8, to "take hold on his strength that we may make peace." Note, Since we cannot flee from God, we are concerned to prepare to meet him, and therefore he gives us warning, that we may prepare. When we are to meet him in his ordinances, we must prepare to meet him, prepare to seek him.

3. How he sets forth the greatness and power of God, as a reason why we should prepare to meet him, ver. 13. If he be such a God as he is here described to be, it is folly to contend with him, and our duty and interest to make our peace with him; it is good having him our friend, and bad having him our enemy. 1st. He "formeth the mountains;" made the earth, the strongest, stateliest parts of it, and by the word of his power still upholdeth it and them. Whatever are the products of the everlasting mountains, he formed them; whatever salvation is hoped for from hills and mountains, he is the founder of it, Ps. lxxxix. 11, 12. He that formed the great mountains can make them plain when they stand in the way of his people's salvation. 2nd. He createth the wind; the power of the air is derived from him, and directed by him; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures, and orders from what point of the compass it shall blow, and he that made it rules it: even the winds and the seas obey him. 3rd. He declares unto man what are his thoughts; he makes known his counsel by his servants the prophets to the children of men—the thought of his justice against impenitent sinners, and the thought of good he thinks toward those that repent. He can also make known, for he perfectly knows, the thought that is in man's heart, he understands it afar off, and in the day of conviction will set the evil thoughts, among other the sins of sinners, in order before them. 4th. He often "makes the morning darkness," by thick clouds overspreading the sky presently after the sun rose bright and glorious; so, when we look for prosperity and joy, he can dash our expectations with some unlooked-for calamity. 5th. He "treads upon the high places of the earth," is not only higher than the highest, but has dominion over all; tramples upon proud men, and upon the idols that they worshipped in the highest places. 6th. Jehovah, "the God of hosts is his name," for he has his being of himself, and is the fountain of all being, and all the hosts of heaven and earth are at his command. Let us humble ourselves before this God, prepare to meet him, and give all diligence to make him our God; for happy the people whose God he is, that have all this power engaged for them.

CHAPTER V.

The scope of this chapter is to prosecute the exhortation given to Israel, in the close of the foregoing chapter, to prepare to meet his God: he here tells them, I. What preparation they must make, they must seek the Lord, and not seek any more to idols, ver. 4—8; they must seek good and love it, ver. 14, 15. II. Why they must make this preparation to meet their God, 1. Because of the present deplorable condition they were in, ver. 1—3. 2. Because it was by sin that they were brought into such a condition, ver. 7, 10—12. 3. Because it would be their happiness to seek God, and he was ready to be found of them, ver. 8, 9, 14. 4. Because he would proceed in his wrath to their utter ruin if they did not seek him, ver. 5, 6, 13, 16, 17. 5. Because all their confidence would fail them, if they did not seek unto God, and make him their friend. 1st. Their profane contempt of God's judgments, and setting them at defiance, would not secure them, ver. 18—20. 2nd. Their external services in religion, and their shows of devotion, would not avail to turn away the wrath of God, ver. 21—24. 3rd. Their having been long in possession of church privileges, and in a course of holy duties, would not be their protection, while all along they had kept up their idolatrous customs, ver. 25—27. They have therefore no way left them to save themselves, but by repentance and reformation.

HEAR ye this word which I take up against you,
Even a lamentation, O house of Israel.
2 The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise:
She is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her
3 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [up.
The city that went out by a thousand shall leave an hundred,
And that which went forth by an hundred shall leave ten,
To the house of Israel.

This chapter begins as those two next foregoing began, with "Hear this word." Where God has a mouth to speak we must have an ear to hear; it is our duty, it is our interest; yet so stupid are the most of men, that they need to be again and again called upon to hear the word of the Lord, to give audience, to give attention: "Hear this word." This convincing, awakening word must be heard and heeded, as well as words of comfort and peace; the word that is taken up against us, as well as that which makes for us; for, whether we hear or forbear, the word of God shall take effect, and not a tittle of it shall fall to the ground. It is the word which I take up, not the prophet only, but the God that sent him. It is "the word that the Lord hath spoken," ch. iii. 1. The word to be heard is a lamentation, a lamentable account of the present calamitous state of the kingdom of Israel, and a lamentable prediction of its utter destruction. Their condition is sad; "The virgin of Israel is fallen," ver. 2, is come down from what she was. That state, though not pure and chaste as a virgin, yet was beautiful and gay, and had her charms, looked high herself, and was courted by many as a virgin; but she is fallen into contempt and poverty, and is universally slighted. Nay, and their condition is helpless; she shall no more rise, shall never recover her former dignity again. God had lately begun to cut Israel short, 2 Kin. x. 32; and, because they repented not, it was not long before he cut Israel down.

First. Their princes that should have helped them up were disabled; she is "forsaken upon her land." Not only those she was in alliance with abroad failed her, but her friends at home deserted her. She had not been carried captive into a strange land if she had not first been forsaken upon her own land, and thrown to the ground there, and all her true interests abandoned by those that should have had them at heart. There is none to raise her up, none that can do it, none that care to lend her a hand.

Secondly. Their people that should have helped them up were diminished, ver. 3. The city that had a militia a thousand strong, and in the beginning of the war had furnished out a thousand effective men, able-bodied and well armed, when they come to review their troops after the battle, shall find but a hundred left; and in proportion, the city that sent out a hundred shall have but ten come back; so great a slaughter shall be made, and so few left to the house of Israel for the public service and safety, scarce one in ten shall escape of the hands that should relieve this abject, this dejected nation. Note, The lessening of the numbers of God's spiritual Israel, by death or desertion, is just matter for lamentation; for, by whom shall Jacob arise? by whom shall the decays of piety be repaired when he is thus made small?

4 For thus saith the LORD unto the house of Israel,
Seek ye me, and ye shall live:
5 But seek not Beth-el, nor enter into Gilgal,
And pass not to Beer-sheba:
For Gilgal shall surely go into captivity,
And Beth-el shall come to nought.
6 Seek the LORD, and ye shall live;
Lest he break out like fire in the house of Joseph,
And devour it, and there be none to quench it in Beth-el
7 Ye who turn judgment to wormwood,
And leave off righteousness in the earth,
8 Seek him that maketh the seven stars and Orion,
And turneth the shadow of death into the morning,
And maketh the day dark with night:
That calleth for the waters of the sea,
And poureth them out upon the face of the earth:
The LORD is his name:
9 That strengtheneth the spoiled against the strong,
So that the spoiled shall come against the fortress.
10 They hate him that rebuketh in the gate,
And they abhor him that speaketh uprightly

11 Forasmuch therefore as your treading is upon the poor,
And ye take from him burdens of wheat:
Ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them;
Ye have planted pleasant vineyards, but ye shall not drink wine of them.
12 For I know your manifold transgressions and your mighty sins:
They afflict the just, they take a bribe,
And they turn aside the poor in the gate from their right.
13 Therefore the prudent shall keep silence in that time;
For it is an evil time.
14 Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live:
And so the LORD, the God of hosts, shall be with you,
As ye have spoken.
15 Hate the evil, and love the good,
And establish judgment in the gate:
It may be that the LORD God of hosts will be gracious
Unto the remnant of Joseph.

This is a message from God to the house of Israel, in which,

First. They are told of their faults, that they might see what occasion there was for them to repent and reform, and that when they were called to return, they might not need to ask, Wherein shall we return? God tells them in general; ver. 12, "I know your manifold transgressions, and your mighty sins," and you shall be made to know them too. In our penitent reflections upon our sins we must consider, as God doth in his judicial remarks upon them, and will do in the great day,

1. That they are very numerous; they are our manifold transgressions, sins of various kinds, and often repeated. O what a multitude of vain and vile thoughts lodge within us! What a multitude of idle, foolish, wicked words have been spoken by us! In what a multitude of instances have we gratified and indulged our corrupt appetites and passions! And how many are our omissions of duty, and in duty! Who can understand his errors? Who can tell how oft he offends? God knows how many, just how many, our transgressions are; none of them pass him unobserved: we know they are to us innumerable, more than the hairs of our head, and we have reason to see what danger we have brought ourselves into, and what abundance of work we have made for repentance by our manifold transgressions, by the numberless numbers of our sins of daily incursion.

2. That some of them are very heinous; they are our mighty sins; sins that are more exceeding sinful in their own nature, and by being committed presumptuously, and with a high hand. Sins against the light of nature, flagrant crimes, that are mighty to overpower your convictions, and to pull down judgments upon you. He instances some of these mighty sins:

1st. They corrupted the worship of God, and turned to idols; that is implied, ver. 5: that they had sought to Bethel, where one of the golden calves was; they had frequented Gilgal, a place which they chose to set up idols in, because it had been made famous in the days of Joshua by God's wonderful appearances to and for his people. Beersheba likewise, a place that had been famous in the days of the patriarchs, was now another rendezvous of idols; as we find also, ch. viii. 14; and thither they passed, though it lay at a distance in the land of Judah. Now, having thus shamefully gone a whoring from God, no doubt they were concerned to return to him.

2nd. They perverted justice among themselves; ver. 7, ye "turn judgment to wormwood;" that is, you make your administration of justice bitter and nauseous, and highly displeasing both to God and man: that fruit is become a weed, a weed in the garden. As nothing more venerable, nothing more valuable, than justice duly administered, so nothing is more hurtful, nothing more abominable, than designedly doing wrong, under colour and pretence of doing right. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'The best, when corrupted, become the worst.' Ye "leave off righteousness in the earth;" as if those that do wrong were accountable to the God of heaven only, and not to the princes and judges of the earth. Thus it was as before the flood, when the earth was filled with violence.

3rd. They were very oppressive to the poor, and made them poorer; they trod upon the poor, ver. 11, trampled upon them, hectored over them, made them their footstool, and were most imperious and barbarous to those that were most obsequious and submissive. They cared not what shame and slavery they put them to who were poor, and such as they could get nothing by. That was it that the judges aimed at,—nothing but to enrich themselves, and therefore they took from the poor burthens of wheat, took it by extortion, either by way of bribe or usury. The poor had no other way to save themselves from being trodden upon, and trodden to dirt by them, but by presenting to them horse-loads of that corn which they and their families should have had to subsist upon, and they forced them to do it. They took from the poor 'debts of wheat,' so some read it; it was legally due, either for rent, or for corn lent; but they exacted it with rigour from those who were disabled by the providence of God to pay it, as Neh. v. 2, 5. In demanding and recovering even a just debt, we must take heed lest we act either unjustly or uncharitably. This sin of oppression they are again charged with; ver. 22, "They afflict the just," by turning the edge of the law and of the sword of justice against those that are the innocent and quiet in the land; they therefore hated men because they were more righteous than themselves, and he that departed from evil thereby made himself a prey to them. They take a bribe from the rich to patronize and protect them in oppressing the poor; so that he who has money in his hand is sure to have the judge and judgment on his side, be his cause never so bad. Thus they turn aside the poor in the gate, in the courts of justice, from their right. If the poor sue for their right, who cannot bribe them, or are so honest that they will not, though they have it never so clear in view, and never so near, yet they are turned away from it by their unrighteous sentence, and cannot come at it; and "therefore the prudent will keep silence," ver. 13. Men will reckon it their prudence, when they are wronged and injured, to be silent, and make no complaints to the magistrates, for it will be to no purpose, they shall not have justice done them.

4th. They were malicious persecutors of God's faithful ministers and people, ver. 10. Their hearts were so fully set in them to do evil, that they could not bear to be reproved, First. By the ministry of the word; by the reading and expounding of the law, and the messages which the prophets delivered to them in the name of the Lord. They "hate him that rebuketh in the gate," in the gate of the Lord's house, or in the courts of justice, or in the places of concourse, where wisdom is lifting her voice, Pr. i. 21. Reprovers in the gate are reprovers by office; these they hated, counting them their enemies, "because they told them the truth," as Ahab hated Micaiah. They not only despised them, but had an enmity to them, and sought to do them mischief. Those that hate reproof love ruin. Secondly. By the conversation of their honest neighbours. Though things were generally very bad, yet there were some among them that spoke uprightly, that made conscience of what they said; and as it was their praise, so it was the shame of those that spoke deceitfully, and condemned them, as Noah's faith condemned the unbelief of the old world, and for that reason they abhorred him. They were such inveterate enemies to the thing called honesty, that they could not endure the sight of an honest man. All that have any sense of the common interest of mankind will love and value such as speak uprightly, for veracity is the bond of human society. To what a pitch of folly and madness then were they arrived, who, having banished all notions of justice out of their own hearts, would have them banished out of the world too, and so put mankind into a state of war, for they "abhor him that speaketh uprightly?" and for this reason, "the prudent shall keep silence in that time," ver. 13. Prophets cannot, dare not, keep silence; the impulse they are under will not allow them to act by prudential considerations; they must cry aloud and not spare; but as for other wise and good men, they shall keep silence, and shall reckon it is their prudence to do so, because it is an evil time. 1*st.* They shall think it dangerous to complain, and therefore shall keep silence. This was one way in which they afflicted the just, that by false suggestions, and strained inuendoes, they made men offenders for a word, Isa. xxix. 21; and therefore the prudent, who were wise as serpents, because they knew not how what they said might be misinterpreted and misrepresented, were so cautious as to say nothing, lest they should run themselves into a premunire, because it was an evil time. Note, Through the iniquity of the times, as good men are hid, so good men are silent, and it is their wisdom to be so. Little said soon amended. But it is their comfort that they may speak freely to God when they know not who else they can speak freely to. 2*nd.* They shall think it fruitless to reprove. They see what wickedness is committed, and their spirits are stirred up as Paul's at Athens; but they shall think it prudent not to bear an open testimony against it, because it is to no purpose. They are "joined to their idols, let them alone." "Let no man strive or rebuke another," for it is but casting pearls before swine. The cautious men will say to a bold reprover, as Erasmus to Luther, Abi in cellam, et dic, miserere mei, Domine,—'Away to thy cell, and cry, Have mercy on me, O Lord!' Let grave lessons and counsels be kept for better men and better times. And there is a time to keep silence, as well as a time to speak, Eccl. iii. 7. Evil times will not bear plain dealing; that is, evil men will not. And the men the prophet here speaks of had reason to think themselves evil men indeed, when wise and good men thought it in vain to speak to them, and were afraid of having any thing to do with them.

Secondly. They are told of their danger, and what judgments they lay exposed to for their sins. 1. The places of their idolatry are in danger of being ruined, in the first place; ver. 5, Gilgal, the head-quarters of idolatry, shall "go into captivity," not only its inhabitants but its images, and Bethel with its golden calf "shall come to nought." The victorious enemy shall make nothing of it, so easily shall it be spoiled, and shall bring it to nothing, so effectually shall it be spoiled. Idols were always vanity and things of nought, and so they shall prove when God appears to abolish them. 2. The body of the kingdom is in danger of being ruined by them, ver. 6. There is danger lest, if you seek him not in time, he "break out like a fire in the house of Joseph, and devour it;" for our God is a righteous judge, is a consuming fire, and the men of Israel, as criminals, are stubble before him. Woe to those that make themselves fuel to the fire of God's wrath. It follows, and "there shall be none to quench it in Bethel." There their idols were, and their idolatrous priests; thither they brought their sacrifices, and there they offered up their prayers; but God tells them, that when the fire of his judgments kindled upon them, all the gods they served at Bethel should not be able to quench it, should not turn away the judgment, or be any relief to them under it. Thus they that make an idol of the world will find it insufficient to protect them when God comes to reckon with them for their spiritual idolatry. 3. What they have got by oppression and extortion shall be taken from them; ver. 11, "Ye have built houses of hewn stone," which you thought would be lasting, "but ye shall not dwell in them," for your enemies shall burn them down, or possess them for themselves, or take you into captivity. "Ye have planted pleasant vineyards," have contrived how to make them every way agreeable, and have promised yourselves many a pleasant walk in them, but ye shall be forced to walk off, and shall never "drink wine of them." The law had tenderly provided, that if a man had built a house, or planted a vineyard, he should be at liberty to return from the wars, Deu. xx. 5, 6; but now the necessity would be so urgent, that it would not be allowed, all must go to the battle, and many of those who had lately been building and planting should fall in battle, and never enjoy what they had been labouring for. What is not honestly got is not likely to be long enjoyed.

Thirdly. They are told their duty, and have great encouragement to set about it in good earnest, and good reason. The duties here prescribed to them are, godliness and honesty,—seriousness in their applications to God, and justice in their dealings with men; and each of these is here pressed upon them, with proper arguments to enforce the exhortation.

1. They are here exhorted to be sincere and devout in their addresses to God; ver. 4, God saith to the house of Israel, "Seek ye me," and good reason, for "should not a people seek unto their God?" Isa. viii. 19; Whither else should they go but to their protector? Israel was a prince with God, let his descendants seek the Lord as he did, and they shall be so too. Now, in order to their doing this, they must abandon their idolatries. God is not sought truly if he be not sought only, for he will endure no rivals. "Seek ye the Lord, and seek not Bethel," ver. 5; consult not your idol oracles, nor ask at the mouth of the priest of Bethel: seek not to the golden calf there for protection, nor bring your prayers and sacrifices any longer thither, or to Gilgal, for you forsake your own mercies if you observe those lying vanities; but seek the Lord, ver. 6, 8, inquire after him, inquire of him, seek to know his mind as your rule, to secure his favour as your felicity. To press this exhortation we are bid to consider,

1st. What we shall get by seeking God; it will be our life, we shall find him, and shall be happy in him. So he tells them himself; ver. 4, "Seek ye me, and ye shall live." So the prophets tell them; ver. 6, "Seek the Lord, and ye shall live." They that seek perishing gods shall perish with them, ver. 5, but they that seek the living God shall live with him. Ye shall be delivered from the killing judgments which you are threatened with; your nation shall live, shall recover from its present languishings; your souls shall live, you shall be sanctified and comforted, and made for ever blessed; "Ye shall live."

2nd. What a God he is whom we are to seek, ver. 8, 9. First. He is a God of almighty power himself. The idols were impotent things, could do neither good nor evil, and therefore it was folly either to fear or trust them. But the God of Israel doth every thing, and can do any thing, and therefore we ought to seek to him; he challengeth our homage who has all power in his hand, and it is our interest to have him on our side. Divers proofs and instances are here given of God's power, as Creator in the kingdom of nature, both the founding and governing of that kingdom: compare ch. iv. 13. 1st. The stars are the work of his hands; those stars which the heathens worshipped; ver. 26, "the stars of your God," those stars are God's creatures and servants. "He maketh the seven stars and Orion," two very remarkable constellations, which Amos, a herdsman, while he kept his cattle by night, had particularly observed the motions of. He made them at the first, he still maketh them to be what they are to this earth, and either binds or looses the sweet influences of Pleiades and Orion, the two constellations mentioned, Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31, to which passages Amos here seems to refer, putting them in mind of those ancient discoveries of the glory of God, before he was called the God of Israel. 2nd. The constant succession of day and night is under his direction, and is kept up by his power and providence. It is he that turns the night, which is dark as "the shadow of death, into the morning," by the rising of the sun, and by the setting of the sun "makes the day dark with night." And the same power can, for humble penitents, easily turn affliction and sorrow into prosperity and joy; but can as easily turn the prosperity of presumptuous sinners into darkness, into utter darkness. 3rd. The rain riseth and falls as he appoints. He "calls for the waters of the sea," out of them vapours are drawn up by the heat of the sun, which gather into clouds, and are poured out "upon the face of the earth," to water it, and make it fruitful. This was the mercy that had been withholden from them of late, ch. iv. 7, and therefore to whom should they apply themselves but to him who had power to give it? For all the vanities of the heathen could not give rain, nor could the heavens of themselves give showers, Jer. xiv. 22; it is God that has made these things, Jehovah is his name, the name by which the God of nature, the God of the whole earth, has made himself known to his people Israel, and covenanted with them. Secondly. As he is a God of almighty power himself, so he giveth strength and power unto his people that seek him, and renews strength to those that had lost it, if they wait upon him for it; for, ver. 9, he "strengthens the spoiled against the strong," to such a degree, that the spoiled came against the fortress, and made bold and brave attacks upon those that had spoiled them. This is an encouragement to the people to seek the Lord, that if they do so they shall find him able to retrieve their affairs when they are brought to the lowest ebb. Though they are the spoiled, and their enemies are the strong, if they can but engage God for them, they shall soon recruit, so as the next time to be not only the aggressors, but the conquerors; they "come against the fortress," to make reprisals and become masters of it.

2. They are here exhorted to be honest and just in their dealings with men, ver. 14, 15, where observe,

1st. The duty required. Seek good and not evil. Hate the evil and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate, re-establish it there whence it has been banished, ver. 7. Note, Things are not so bad but that they may be amended if the right course be taken; we must not despair but that grievances may be redressed, and abuses rectified; justice may yet triumph there where injustice tyrannizeth. In order to this, good must be loved and sought, evil must be hated and no longer sought; we must love good principles, and adhere to them; love to do good, and abound in it; love good people, and good converse, and good duties; and whatever good we do, we must do it from a principle of love, do it of choice and with delight. And they who thus love good will seek it, will contrive to do all the good they can, and inquire for opportunities to do it, and endeavour it to the utmost of their power. They will also hate evil, will abhor the thoughts of doing an unjust thing, and abstain from all appearance of it. In vain do we pretend to seek God in our devotions, if we do not seek God in our whole conversation.

2nd. The reasons annexed. First. This is the sure way to be happy ourselves, and to have the continual presence of God with us. "Seek good and not evil, that ye may live," may escape the punishment of the evil you have sought and loved. Righteousness delivereth from death, that ye may have the favour of God, which is your life, which is better than life itself, that ye may have comfort in yourselves, and may live to some good purpose. You shall live, for "so the Lord God of hosts shall be with you," and be your life. Note, Those that keep in the way of duty have the presence of God with them, as the God of hosts, a God of almighty power. He will be with you "as ye have spoken," that is, as ye have gloried; you shall have that really, which, while ye went on in unrighteous ways, you only seemed to have, and boasted of as if you had. They that truly repent and reform enter into the enjoyment of that comfort which before they had only flattered themselves with the imagination of. Or, as ye have prayed when you sought the Lord; live up to your prayers, and you shall have what you pray for. Secondly. This is the likeliest way to make the nation happy. If you seek and love that which is good, you may contribute to the saving of the land from ruin. "It may be the Lord God of hosts will be gracious to the remnant of Joseph:" though there is but a remnant left, if God be gracious to that remnant, it will rise to a great nation again; and if some among them turn from sin, especially if judgment be established in the gate, though we cannot be certain, yet there is great probability that public affairs will take a new and happy turn, and every thing will mend, if men mend their lives. Temporal promises are made with an 'It may be,' and our prayers must be accordingly.

16 Therefore the LORD, the God of hosts, the Lord, saith
Wailing shall be in all streets; [thus;
And they shall say in all the highways, Alas! alas!
And they shall call the husbandman to mourning,
And such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing.
17 And in all vineyards shall be wailing:
For I will pass through thee, saith the LORD.
18 Woe unto you that desire the day of the LORD!
To what end is it for you?
The day of the LORD is darkness, and not light.
19 As if a man did flee from a lion,
And a bear met him;
Or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall,
And a serpent bit him. [light?
20 Shall not the day of the LORD be darkness, and not Even very dark, and no brightness in it?

Here is, First. A very terrible threatening of destruction approaching, ver. 16, 17. Because they would not take the right course to obtain the favour of God, God would take an effectual course to make them feel the weight of his displeasure. The threatening is introduced with more than ordinary solemnity, to strike an awe upon them. It is not the word of the prophet only, if so it might be made light of, but it is the Lord Jehovah, that has an infinite, eternal being, it is the God of hosts, that has a boundless, irresistible power, and it is Adonai, the Lord, that has an absolute, incontestable sovereignty, and an universal dominion; it is he that saith it, who can and will make his words good. And he hath said, 1. That the land of Israel shall be put into mourning, true mourning; that all places shall be filled with lamentation for the calamities coming upon them. Look into the cities, and "wailing shall be in all streets," in the great streets, in the bye-streets. Look into the country, and "they shall say in all the highways, Alas! Alas!" we are all undone. The lamentation shall be so great as not to be confined within doors, nor kept within the bounds of decency, but it shall be proclaimed in the streets and highways, and run wild. The husbandman shall be called from the plough by the calamities of his country to the natural expressions of mourning. And because those will come short of the merits of the cause, such as are skilful of lamentation shall be called to artificial mourning, to put accents upon the lamentations of the real mourners with their Ahone, Ahone. Even in all vineyards, where there used to be nothing but mirth and pleasure, there shall be general wailing, when a foreign force invades the country, lays all waste, and there is no making any head against it, no weapons left but prayers and tears. 2. That the land of Israel shall be brought to ruin, and the advances of that ruin are the occasions of all this wailing. "I will pass through thee," as the destroying angel passed through the land of Egypt to destroy the firstborn, but then passed over the houses of the Israelites. God's judgments had often passed by them, but now they shall pass through them, shall run them through.

Secondly. A just and severe reproof to those who made light of these threatenings, and impudently bid defiance to the justice of God and his judgments, ver. 18. Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord, that really wish for times of war and confusion, as some do who have restless spirits and long for changes, or who choose to fish in troubled waters, hoping to raise their families, as some had done, upon the ruins of their country. But the prophet tells them this should be so great a desolation that nobody could get by it. Or, it is spoken to those who, in their wailings and lamentations for the calamities they were in, wished they might die and be rid out of their misery, as Job did, with passion. The prophet shews them the folly of this: Do they know what death is to those that are unprepared for it, and how much more terrible it will be than any thing that can befall them in this life? Or, rather, it is spoken to those who speak jestingly of that day of the Lord which the prophets spoke so seriously of; they desired, that is, they challenged it; they said, Let him do his worst, "let him make speed," and "hasten his work," Isa. v. 19. "Where is the promise of his coming," 2 Pet. iii. 4. It intimates, 1. That they do not believe it. They say they wish it would come, because they do not believe it will ever come, nor will they believe it unless they see it. 2. That they do not fear it. Though they may have some belief of it, yet they have so little consideration of it, and their mind is so intent upon other things, that they are under no apprehension at all of peril from it; instead of having the conscience to dread it, they have the curiosity to desire it. In answer to this,

1. He shews the folly of those that impudently wished for any of God's judgments, and made a jest of any of the terrors of the Lord. To what end is it for you that the day of the Lord should come? You will find it both certain and sad; not a thing to be bantered, for it is neither a thing to be questioned whether it will come or no, nor a thing to be turned off with a slight when it doth come. "The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light," ver. 18. "Shall it not be so?" ver. 20. Do not your own consciences tell you it will be so, that it will be very dark, and no brightness in it? Note, The day of the Lord will be a dark, dismal, gloomy day to all impenitent sinners; the day of judgment will be so, and sometimes the day of their present trouble. And when God makes a day dark, all the world cannot make it light.

2. He shews the folly of those that impatiently wished for a change of God's judgments, in hopes the next would be better and more tolerable. They desire the day of the Lord in hopes to mend themselves, though their hearts and lives be not amended, or, however, to know the worst. But the prophet tells them they know not what they ask; ver. 19, it is "as if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him," a beast of prey more cruel and ravenous than a lion; or, as if a man, to escape all dangers abroad, "went into the house" for security, and "leaned his hand on the wall" to rest himself, and there "a serpent bit him." Note, Those that are not reformed by the judgments of God will be pursued by them, and if they escape one, another stands ready to seize them; "Fear, and the pit, and the snare" surround them, Isa. xxiv. 17, 18. It is madness therefore to defy the day of the Lord.

21 I hate, I despise your feast days,
And I will not smell in your solemn assemblies.
22 Though ye offer me burnt offerings and your meat offer-
I will not accept them: [ings,
Neither will I regard the peace offerings of your fat beasts.
23 Take thou away from me the noise of thy songs;
For I will not hear the melody of thy viols.
24 But let judgment run down as waters,
And righteousness as a mighty stream.

IDOL CARS.—FROM SIDONIAN COINS.—ver. 26.

25 Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings
In the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel?
26 But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch
And Chiun your images,
The star of your god, which ye made to yourselves.
27 Therefore will I cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus,
Saith the LORD, whose name is The God of hosts.

The scope of these verses is to shew how little God valued their shows of devotion, nay, how much he detested them, while they went on in their sins. Observe,

First. How unpleasing, nay, how displeasing, their hypocritical services were to God. They had their feast days at Bethel, in imitation of those at Jerusalem, in which they pretended to rejoice before God; they had their solemn assemblies for religious worship, in which they put on the gravity of those who come before God as his people come, and sit before him as his people sit; they offered to God burnt offerings, to the honour of God, together with the meat offerings that by the law were to be offered with them; they offered the peace offerings, to implore the favour of God, and they offered them of fat beasts they had, ver. 22. In imitation likewise of the temple music, they had "the noise of their songs," and "the melody of their viols," ver. 23, vocal and instrumental music with which they praised God: with these services they hoped to make God amends for the sins they had committed, and to obtain leave to go on in sin; and therefore they were so far from being acceptable to God that they were abominable. He hated, he despised their feast days, not only despised them as no valuable services done to him, but hated them as an affront and provocation to him, as we hate to see men dissemble with us, pretend a respect for us when really they have none. Nothing more hateful, more despicable than hypocrisy; "He that blesseth his friend with a loud voice it shall be counted a curse," when it appears his heart is not with him. God will not smell in their solemn assemblies, for there is nothing in them that is grateful to him, but a great deal that is offensive. Their sacrifices are not to him "of a sweet smelling savour," as Noah's was, Gen. viii. 21. He will not accept them, he will not regard them, will not take any notice of them; he will not "hear the melody of their viols," for when sin is a jar in the harmony it grates in his ears; "Take it away," saith God, I cannot bear it. Now this speaks, 1. That sacrifice itself is of small account with God, in comparison with moral duties; to love God and our neighbour is better than all burnt offerings and sacrifice. 2. That the sacrifice of the wicked is really an abomination to him, Pr. xv. 8. Dissembled piety is double iniquity, and so it will be found when, if any place in hell be hotter than another, that will be the hypocrite's portion.

Secondly. What it was that he required in order to the acceptableness of their sacrifices, and without which no sacrifice would be acceptable; ver. 24, "Let judgment run down as waters" among you, and "righteousness as a mighty stream," that is, 1. Let there be a general reformation of manners among you. Let religion, God's judgment and righteousness, have its due influence upon you; let your land be watered with it, and let it bear down all the opposition of vice and profaneness; let it run wide as overflowing waters, and return strong as a mighty stream. 2. In particular, let justice be duly administered by magistrates and rulers; let not the current of it be stopped by partiality and bribery, but let it come freely, as waters do, in the natural course; let it be pure as running waters, not muddled with corruption, or whatever may pervert justice. Let it run like a mighty stream, and not suffer itself to be obstructed, or its course retarded, by the fear of man; let all have free access to it, as a common stream, and have benefit by it, as "trees planted by the rivers of waters." The great thing laid to Israel's charge was turning "judgment into wormwood," ver. 7; in that matter therefore they must reform, Zec. vii. 9. This was it that God desired more than sacrifices, Hos. vi. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 22.

Thirdly. What little stress God had laid upon the law of sacrifices, though it was his own law, in comparison with the moral precepts; ver. 25, "Did ye offer to me sacrifices in the wilderness forty years?" No, you did not; for the greatest part of that time sacrifice was very much neglected, because of the unsettledness of their state. After the second year the passover was not kept till they were come into Canaan, and other institutions were in like manner intermitted; and yet, because God will have mercy and not sacrifice, he never imputed the omission to them as their fault, but continued his care of them, and kindness to them; that was not it, but their murmuring and unbelief, for which God was displeased with them. He that so owned his people, though they did not sacrifice, when in other things they kept close to him, will certainly disown them, though they do sacrifice, if in other things they depart from him. But though ritual sacrifices may thus be dispensed with, spiritual sacrifices will not; even justice and honesty will not excuse for the want of prayer and praise, a broken heart, and the love of God. Stephen quotes this passage, Acts vii. 42, to shew the Jews that they ought not to think it strange, the repeal of the ceremonial law, when from the beginning it was comparatively made light of: compare Jer. vii. 22, 23.

Fourthly. What little reason they had to expect that their sacrifices should be acceptable to God, when they and their fathers had been all along addicted to the worship of other gods. So some take ver. 25, 'Did you offer to me sacrifices?' that is, To me only? No, and therefore not at all to me acceptably; for the law of worshipping the Lord our God is, that him only we must serve. "But you have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch," ver. 26, little shrines that you made to carry about with you; pocket idols, for your private superstition, when you durst not be seen to do it publicly. You have had the images of your Moloch, your king, probably representing the sun, that sits king among the heavenly bodies, and Chiun, or Remphan, as Stephen calls it, Acts vii. 43, after the Septuagint, which it is supposed represented Saturn, the highest of the seven planets. The worship of the sun, moon, and stars, was the most ancient, most general, and most plausible idolatry; they made to themselves the star of their God, some particular star which they took to be their god, or the name of which they gave to their god. This idolatry Israel was from the beginning prone to, Deu. iv. 19; and those that retain an affection for false gods cannot expect the favour of the true God.

Fifthly. What punishment God would inflict upon them for their persisting in idolatry; ver. 27, "I will cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus." They were led captive by Satan into idolatry, and therefore God caused them to go into captivity among idolaters, and hurried them into a strange land, who were so fond of strange gods. They were carried beyond Damascus; their captivity by the Assyrians was far beyond that by the Syrians; for, if lesser judgments do not the work for which they were sent, God will send greater. Or, the captivity of Israel under Shalmaneser was far beyond that of Damascus under Tiglath-pileser, and much more grievous and destructive, which was foretold, ch. i. 5; for as the sins of God's professing people are greater than the sins of others, so it may be expected their punishment will be proportionable. We find the spoil of Damascus and that of Samaria carried off together by the king of Samaria, Isa. viii. 4; Stephen reads it, "I will carry you away beyond Babylon," Acts vii. 43; farther than Judah shall be carried, so far farther as not to return. And to make this sentence appear both the more certain and the more dreadful, he that passeth it calls himself "the Lord, whose name is the God of hosts," and who is therefore able to execute the sentence, having hosts at command.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter we have, I. A sinful people studying to put a slight upon God's threatenings, and to make them appear trivial; confiding in their privileges and pre-eminences above other nations, ver. 2, 3; and their power, ver. 13; and wholly addicted to their pleasures, ver. 4—6. II. A serious prophet studying to put a weight upon God's threatenings, and to make them appear terrible, by setting forth the severity of those judgments that were coming upon these sensualists, ver. 7; God's abhorring them, and abandoning them and theirs to death, ver. 8—11; and bringing utter desolation upon them, since they would not be wrought upon by the methods he had taken for their conviction, ver. 11—14.

WOE to them that are at ease in Zion,
And trust in the mountain of Samaria,
Which are named chief of the nations,
To whom the house of Israel came!
2 Pass ye unto Calneh, and see;
And from thence go ye to Hamath the great:
Then go down to Gath of the Philistines:
Be they better than these kingdoms?
Or their border greater than your border?
3 Ye that put far away the evil day,
And cause the seat of violence to come near;
4 That lie upon beds of ivory,
And stretch themselves upon their couches,
And eat the lambs out of the flock,
And the calves out of the midst of the stall;
5 That chant to the sound of the viol,
And invent to themselves instruments of musick, like [David;
6 That drink wine in bowls,
And anoint themselves with the chief ointments:
But they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.
7 Therefore now shall they go captive with the first that go captive,
And the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed.

The first words of the chapter are the contents of these verses; but they sound very strange, and contrary to the sentiments of a vain world, "Woe to them that are at ease!" We are ready to say, Happy they that are at ease, that neither feel any trouble nor fear any, that lie soft and warm, and lay nothing to heart; and wise, we think, are they that do so, that bathe themselves in the delights of sense, and care not how the world goes. These are looked upon as doing well for themselves that do well for their bodies, and make much of them; but against them this woe is denounced, and we are here told what their ease is, and what the woe is.

First. Here is a description of their pride, security, and sensuality, for which God would reckon with them.

1. They were vainly conceited of their own dignities, and thought those would secure them from the judgments threatened, and be their defence against the wrath both of God and man. 1st. Those that dwell in Zion thought that was honour and protection enough for them, and they might there be quiet from all fear of evil—because it was a strong city, well fortified both by nature and art, (we read of Zion's strongholds, and her bulwarks;) and because it was a royal city, where was set the thrones of the house of David, (it was the head city of Judah, and therefore truly great;) and especially because it was the holy city, where the temple was, and the testimony of Israel. They that dwelt there doubted not but that God's sanctuary would be a sanctuary to them, and would shelter them from his judgments. The "temple of the Lord are these," Jer. vii. 4. They are haughty because of the holy mountain, Zeph. iii. 11. Note, Many are puffed up with pride, and rocked asleep in carnal security, by their church privileges, and the place they have in Zion. 2nd. Those that dwelt in the mountain of Samaria, though it was not a holy hill, like that of Zion, yet they trusted in it, because it was the metropolis of a potent kingdom, and perhaps, in imitation of Jerusalem, was the head-quarters of its religion; and by lapse of time the hill of Shemer became with them in as good repute as the hill of Zion ever was. They hoped for salvation from those hills and mountains. 3rd. Both these two kingdoms valued themselves upon their relation to Israel, that prince with God, which they looked upon as making them the "chief of the nations," more ancient and honourable than any of them; the 'firstfruits of the nation,' so the word is, dedicated to God, and sanctifying the whole harvest. The house of Israel came to them, that is, was divided into those kingdoms Zion and Samaria were the mother cities of. Those that were at ease were the princes and rulers, the great men, that were chief of the nations, chief of those two kingdoms, and to whom, having their residence in Zion and Samaria, the whole house of Israel applied themselves for judgment. Note, It is hard to be great and not to be proud. Great nations and great men are apt to overvalue themselves and to overlook their neighbours, because they think they a little overtop them. But, for a check to their pride and security, the prophet bids them take notice of these cities that were within the compass of their knowledge, that had been as illustrious in their time as ever Zion and Samaria were, and yet were destroyed, ver. 2. Go to Calneh, which was an ancient city, built by Nimrod, Gen. x. 10, and see what is come of that,—it is now in ruins; so is Hamath the great, one of the chief cities of Syria. Sennacherib boasts of "destroying the gods of Hamath." Gath was likewise made desolate by Hazael not long ago, 2 Kin. xii. 17. Now, were "they better than those kingdoms of Judah and Israel?" Yes, they were, and "their border greater than your border," so that they had more reason than you to be confident of their own safety. Yet you see what has become of them, and dare you be secure? "Art thou better than populous No?" Nah. iii. 8. Note, The examples of others' ruin forbid us to be secure.

2. They persisted in their wicked courses upon a presumption that they should never be called to an account for them; ver. 3, "Ye put far away the evil day," the day of reckoning, as a thing that shall never come; or ye look upon it as at such a distance that it makes no impression at all upon you; ye put it far away, and think ye can still put it yet farther, and adjourn it de die in diem,—'from day to day;' and therefore ye "cause the seat of violence to come near," that is, ye venture upon all acts of injustice and oppression, and have "fellowship with the throne of iniquity, which frameth mischief by a law," Ps. xciv. 20: ye cause that to come near, as if that would be your protection from these judgments which really ripens you for them. Note, Therefore men take sin to be near them, because they take judgments to be far off from them; but they deceive themselves who thus mock God.

3. They indulged themselves in all manner of sensual pleasures and delights, ver. 4—6. These Israelites were perfect epicures and slaves to their appetites. Their dignities (in consideration of which they ought to have been examples of self-denial and mortification) they thought would justify them in their sensuality. The gains of their oppression and violence they thought would bear the charge of it; and they put the evil day at a distance, that that might give them no disturbance in it. That which they are here charged with is not in itself sinful, these things might be soberly and moderately used, but they placed their happiness in the gratification of their carnal appetites; and though they were men in office, that had business to mind, they gave themselves up to their pleasures, spent their time in them, and threw away their thoughts, and cares, and estates upon them; they were in these enjoyments as in their element. Their hearts were upon them, they exceeded all bounds in them, and this at a time when God in his providence was calling them to "weeping and mourning," Isa. xxii. 12, 13. When they were under guilt and wrath, and the judgments of God were ready to break in upon them, they called for wine and strong drink, presuming that "to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant," Isa. lvi. 12, thus walking contrary to God, and setting his justice at defiance. 1st. They were extravagant in their furniture. Nothing would serve them but beds of ivory to sleep upon, or to sit on to their meat, when sackcloth and ashes had better become them. 2nd. They were lazy, and humoured themselves in the love of ease. They did not only lie down, but stretched themselves upon their couches, when they should have stirred up themselves to their business. They were willingly slothful, and took a pride in doing nothing. They abounded in superfluities, so the margin reads it, when many of their poor brethren wanted necessaries. 3rd. They were nice and curious in their diet, must have every thing of the best, and abundance of it. They "eat the lambs out of the flock," (lambs by wholesale,) and "the calves out of the midst of the stall," the fattest they could lay their hands on; and these perhaps not out of their own flock, and their own stall, but taken by oppression from the poor. 4th. They were merry and jovial, and diverted themselves at their feasts with music and singing. They "chant to the sound of the viol," sing and play in concert, and they invent new-fashioned instruments of music, striving herein, more than in any thing else, to excel their ancestors; they set their wits to work to contrive how to please their fancy. Some men never shew their ingenuity but in their luxury; on that they bestow all their faculty of invention and contrivance. They invent "instruments of music, like David," entertain themselves with that which formerly used to be the entertainment of kings only. Or, it intimates their profaneness in their mirth: they mimicked the temple music, and made a jest of that, because, it may be, it was old-fashioned, and they took a pride in bantering it, as the Babylonians did when they urged the captives to sing them the songs of Zion. Such was Belshazzar's profaneness when he drank wine in temple bowls, and such theirs that sing vain and loose songs in psalm tunes, on purpose to ridicule a Divine institution. 5th. They drink to excess, and never think they can pour down enough. They "drink wine in bowls," not in glasses or cups, (as Jer. xxxv. 5;) they hate to be stinted, and must have large draughts, and therefore make use of vessels that they can steal a draught out of. 6th. They affect the strongest perfumes, they "anoint themselves with the chief ointments," to please the smell, and to make them more in love with their own bodies, and to guard against those presages of putrefaction which they carry about with them while they live. No ordinary ointments would serve their turn—they must have the chief, such as were far-fetched and dear bought, when cheaper would have served as well.

4. They had no concern at all for the interests of the church of God, and of the nation, that were sinking and going to decay, "They are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." The church of God, including both the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, (which are called Joseph, Ps. lxxx. 1,) was in distress,—invaded, insulted, and broken in upon; their own kingdom, which they were intrusted with the government of the affairs of, which they were the directors of, the peace of which they were the conservators of, great breaches were made upon it, upon its peace and welfare; and they were so besotted, that they were not aware of them, so indulgent of their pleasures, that they never laid them to heart, and had such an aversion to the thing called business, that they were in no care and concern to get them repaired. It is all one to them whether the nation sink or swim, so that they can but lie at ease and live in pleasure. Particular persons that belonged to Joseph were in affliction, and they took no cognizance of their case, of the wrongs and hardships they sustained, and the troubles they were in; nor took any care to relieve them, or right them: contrary to the temper of holy Job, who, when he was in prosperity, wept with him that was in misery, and his soul was grieved for the poor, Job xxx. 25. Some think that, in calling the afflicted church Joseph here, there is an allusion to the story of Pharaoh's butler, who, when he was preferred to give the cup again into his master's hand, "remembered not Joseph, but forgat him," Gen. xl. 21, 23. Thus they "drank wine in bowls," but "were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." Note, Those are commonly careless of others' troubles that are set upon their own pleasures; and it is a great offence to God when his church is in affliction and we are not grieved for it, nor lay it to heart.

Secondly. Here is the doom passed upon them; ver. 7, "Therefore now shall they go captive with the first that go captive," and shall fall into all the miseries that attend captives; and the banquet of them that stretched themselves upon their couches shall be removed. Their plenty shall be taken from them, and they from it, because they made it the food and fuel of their lusts. 1. They that lived in luxury shall lose even their liberty, and, by being brought into servitude, shall be justly punished for the abuse of their dignity and dominion. 2. They that trusted in the delights and pleasures of their own land shall be carried away into a strange land, and so made ashamed of their pride and confidence: they shall go captive. 3. They that placed their happiness in the pleasures of sense, and set their hearts upon them, shall be deprived of those pleasures; their banquet shall be removed, and they shall know what it is to fare hard. 4. Those that stretched themselves shall be made to contract themselves, and to come in a less compass. 5. Those that put the evil day far from them shall find it nearer to them than it is to others; "they shall go captive with the first," who flattered themselves with hopes, that, if trouble did come, they should be the last that should be seized by it. Those are ripening apace for trouble themselves, that lay not to heart the troubles of others and of the church of God. Those that give themselves to mirth when God calls them to mourning, will find it is a sin that shall not go unpunished, Isa. xxii. 14.

8 The Lord GOD hath sworn by himself,
Saith the LORD the God of hosts,
I abhor the excellency of Jacob, and hate his palaces:
Therefore will I deliver up the city with all that is therein.
9 And it shall come to pass, if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die. 10 And a man's uncle shall take him up, and he that burneth him, to bring out the bones out of the house, and shall say unto him that is by the sides of the house, Is there yet any with thee? and he shall say, No. Then shall he say, Hold thy tongue: for we may not make mention of the name of the LORD.

BURNING THE DEAD.

11 For, behold, the LORD commandeth,
And he will smite the great house with breaches,
And the little house with clefts.
12 Shall horses run upon the rock?
Will one plow there with oxen?
For ye have turned judgment into gall,
And the fruit of righteousness into hemlock:
13 Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought,
Which say, Have we not taken to us horns by our own strength?
14 But, behold, I will raise up against you a nation, O house of Israel,
Saith the LORD the God of hosts;
And they shall afflict you from the entering in of Hemath
Unto the river of the wilderness.

In the former part of the chapter we had these secure Israelites loading themselves with pleasures, as if they could never be made merry enough; here we have God loading them with punishments, as if they could never be made miserable enough. And observe,

First. How strongly this burthen is bound on, not to be shaken off by their presumption and security; for it is bound by "the Lord, the God of hosts," by his mighty, his almighty hand, which none can resist. It is bound with an oath, which puts the sentence past revocation: "The Lord God hath sworn," and he will not repent; and, since he could swear by no greater, he hath sworn by himself. How dreadful, how miserable is the case of those whose ruin, whose eternal ruin, God himself hath sworn, who can execute his purpose, and cannot alter it?

Secondly. How heavy this burthen lies. Let us see the particulars.

1. God will abhor and abandon them; and that speaks misery enough, all misery. "I abhor the excellency of Jacob," all that which they are proud of, and value themselves upon, and for which they call and count themselves the chief of the nations. Their visible church-membership, and the privileges of that, their temple, altar, and priesthood, these were more than any thing the excellencies of Jacob; but, when these were profaned and polluted by sin, God abhorred them; he hated and despised them, ch. v. 21. Note, God abhors that form of godliness which hypocrites keep up, while they abhor the power of it; and if he abhors their temple for the iniquity of that, no marvel that he hates their palaces for the injustice and oppression he finds there. Note, That creature which we take such a complacency and put such a confidence in, as to make it a rival with God, is thereby made abominable to him. He hates the palaces of sinners, for the sake of the wickedness of them which dwell therein; Pr. iii. 33, "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked." And if God abhor them, presently it follows, he will "deliver up the city, with all that is therein," deliver it up into the hands of the enemy, that will lay it waste, and make a prey of all its wealth. Note, Those that are abhorred and abandoned of God are undone to all intents and purposes.

2. There shall be a great and general mortality among them, that, ver. 9, "If there remain ten men in one house" that have escaped the sword of the enemy, yet they shall be met with another way; they shall all die by famine or pestilence. In the most sickly times, if there be ten in a house, one may hope at least the one half of them will escape, according to the proportion of two in a bed, one taken, and the other left; but here not one of ten shall live to bury the rest. Another instance of the greatness of the mortality is, ver. 10, that the nearest relations of the dead shall be forced with their own hands to wind up their bodies and bury them, for want of other hands to be employed in it; that is all that the next of kin, to whom the right of redemption belongs, can do for them, and with great reluctancy will they do that. It intimates that the young people shall be cut off soonest; for the uncle that survives is ordinarily the senior relation. When the uncle comes with the sexton, or "him that burneth," to "bring out the bones out of the house," he shall say to him that he sees next about the house, "Is there yet any with thee?" Are there any left alive? and he shall say, No, this is the last; now the whole family is cut off by death, and neither root nor branch remains. But that which makes this judgment the more grievous is, that their hearts seem to be hardened under it. When he that was found by the sides of the house began to enter into discourse with those that were carrying off the dead, they shall say, "Hold thy tongue;" do not stand preaching to us about the hand of providence in this calamity, for we may not make mention of the name of the Lord. God is so angry with us that there is no speaking to him; he is so extreme to mark what we do amiss that we dare not so much as make mention of his name. Thus the foolishness of men perverteth their way, and brings them into distress, and then their heart fretteth against the Lord. Even then they will not take notice of his hand, nor suffer those about them to do it. Perhaps it was forbidden by some of the idolatrous kings to make mention of the name of Jehovah, as by the law of Moses it was forbidden to make mention of the names of the heathen gods. We may not do it without incurring the penalty. Note, Those hearts are wretchedly hardened indeed that will not be brought to make mention of God's name, and to worship him, when the hand of God is gone out against them; and when, as here, sickness and death are in their families. Thus those heap up wrath who cry not when God binds them.

3. Their houses shall be destroyed; ver. 11, God will "smite the great houses with breaches, and the little house with clefts;" they shall both be cracked, so as to lose their beauty and strength, and to be hastening towards a fall. The princes' palaces are not above the rebukes of Divine justice, nor the poor men's cottages beneath it; neither shall escape. When sin has marked them for ruin, God will find ways to bring it about. It is by order from him that breaches are made.

Thirdly. How justly they are thus burthened. If we understand the matter aright, we shall say, The Lord is righteous.

1. The methods used for their reformation have been all fruitless and ineffectual; ver. 12, "Shall horses run upon the rock?" to hurl and harrow the ground there; or, "Will one plough there with oxen?" No, for there will be no profit to countervail the pains. God had sent them his prophets to break up their fallow ground, but they found them as hard and inflexible as the rock, rough and rugged, and they could do no good with them, nor work upon them; and therefore they shall not attempt it any more. They will not be reclaimed, and therefore shall not be reproved, but quite abandoned. Note, Those who will not be husbanded as fields and vineyards shall be rejected as barren rocks and deserts, Heb. vi. 7, 8.

2. They had abused their power to the wrong and oppression of many, whose injured cause the sovereign Judge would not only right, but revenge. "Ye have turned judgment into gall," which is nauseous, "and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock," which is noxious. It would make one sick to see how those that were intrusted with the administration of public justice bear down equity with that power with which they ought to have defended and supported it, and so turned its own artillery against itself. Note, When our services of God are soured with sin his providences will justly be embittered to us.

3. They had set the judgments of God at defiance, and, confiding in their own strength, thought themselves a match for Omnipotence; ver. 13, they "rejoiced in a thing of nought," pleased themselves with a fancy that no evil should befall them, though they had no ground at all for that confidence, nothing to trust to that would bear any weight. They said, "Have we not taken to us horns?" are we not arrived to great dignity and dominion? have we not pushed down our enemies, and pushed on our victories? and this "by our own strength," our own conduct and courage, our own wealth and military force? Who then need we be afraid of? Who then need we make court to? Not God himself. Note, Prosperity and success commonly make men secure and haughty; and those that have done much think they can do any thing, any thing without God, nay, any thing against him. But those who trust in their own strength rejoice in a thing of nought, and so they will find. Probably they did not say this with their lips, totidem verbis,—'in so many words;' but it was the language of their hearts and of their actions, both which God understands.

Fourthly. How easily and effectually this burthen shall be brought upon them, ver. 14. He that brings it upon them is "the Lord the God of hosts," who both may do and can do what he pleaseth; who has all creatures at his command, and who, when he has work to do, will not want instruments to do it with. Though they are the house of Israel, yet he will raise up against them a nation which they feared not, but had many a time hoped in, even the Assyrians; and this nation shall afflict them, bring them into straits, and put them to pain, from "the entering in of Hamath," in the north, to "the river of the wilderness," the river of Egypt, Sihor or Nile, in the south. The whole nation hath shared in the iniquity, and therefore must expect to share in the calamity. Note, When men are any way instruments of affliction to us, we must see God raising them up against us, for they are his hand, the rod, the sword in his hand. The Lord hath bidden Shimei curse David.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter we have, I. God contending with Israel, by the judgments brought on their land. 1. They are threatened with lesser judgments, but are reprieved, and the judgments turned away at the prayer of Amos, ver. 1—6. 2. God's patience is at length worn out by their obstinacy, and they are rejected, and sentenced to utter ruin, ver. 7—9. II. Israel contending with God, by the opposition given to his prophet. 1. Amaziah informs against Amos, ver 10, 11, and doth what he can to rid the country of him, as a public nuisance, ver. 12, 13. 2. Amos justifies himself in what he did as a prophet, ver. 14, 15; and denounceth the judgments of God against Amaziah his persecutor, ver. 16, 17; for when the contest is between God and man, it is easy to foresee, it is very easy to foretell, who will come off with the worst of it.

THUS hath the Lord GOD shewed unto me; and, behold, he formed grasshoppers in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth; and, lo, it was the latter growth after the king's mowings.
2 And it came to pass, that when they had made an end of eating the grass of the land, then I said,

O Lord GOD, forgive, I beseech thee:
By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.
3 The LORD repented for this:
It shall not be, saith the LORD.

4 Thus hath the Lord GOD shewed unto me: and, behold, the Lord GOD called to contend by fire, and it devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part.
5 Then said I,

O Lord GOD, cease, I beseech thee:
By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.
6 The LORD repented for this:
This also shall not be, saith the Lord GOD.

7 Thus he shewed me: and, behold, the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumbline, with a plumbline in his hand. 8 And the LORD said unto me, Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A plumbline. Then said the Lord,

Behold, I will set a plumbline in the midst of my people Israel:
I will not again pass by them any more:
9 And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate,
And the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste;
And I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword.

We here see that God bears long, but he will not bear always, with a provoking people; both these God here shewed the prophet; "Thus hath the Lord God shewed me," ver. 1; and again, ver. 4, and "thus he shewed me," ver. 7. He shewed him what was present, foreshewed him what was to come, gave him the knowledge both of what he did and of what he designed; for the Lord God "revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets," ch. iii. 7.

First. We have here two instances of God's sparing mercy, remembered in the midst of judgment, the narratives of which are so like one another, that they will be best considered together, and very considerable they are.

1. God is here coming forth against this sinful nation, first by one judgment and then by another.

1st. He begins with the judgment of famine. The prophet saw this in vision; he saw God forming grasshoppers or locusts, and bringing them up upon the land to eat up the fruits of it, and so to strip it of its beauty, and starve its inhabitants, ver. 1. God formed these grasshoppers, not only as they were his creatures, and much of the wisdom and power of God appears in the formation of minute animals—as much in the structure of an ant as of an elephant—but as they were instruments of his wrath: God is said to frame evil against a sinful people, Jer. xviii. 11. These grasshoppers were framed on purpose to eat up the grass of the land, and vast numbers of them were prepared accordingly. They were sent "in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth, after the king's mowings." See here how the judgment was mitigated by the mercy that went before it. God could have sent these insects to eat up the grass at the beginning of the first growth in the spring, when the grass was most needed, was most plentiful, and was the best in its kind; but God suffered that to grow, and suffered them to gather it in. The king's mowings were safely housed, for "the king himself is served from the field," Eccl. v. 9, and could as ill be without his mowings as without any other branch of his revenues. Uzziah was now king of Judah, who loved husbandry, 2 Chr. xxvi. 10. But the grasshoppers were commissioned to eat up only the latter growth, (the edgrew we call it in the country,) the after-grass, which is of little value in comparison with the former. The mercies which God gives us, and continues to us, are more numerous and more valuable than those he removes from us, which is a good reason why we should be thankful, and not complain. The remembrance of the mercies of the former growth should make us submissive to the will of God, when we meet with disappointments in the latter growth. The prophet in vision saw this judgment prevailing far. These grasshoppers eat up the grass of the land, which should have been for the cattle, which the owners must of course suffer by. Some understand this figuratively, of a wasting, destroying army brought upon them. In the days of Jeroboam the kingdom of Israel began to recover itself from the desolations it had been under in the former reigns, 2 Kin. xiv. 25; the latter growth shot up, after the mowings of the kings of Syria, which we read of 2 Kin. xiii. 3. And then God commissioned the king of Assyria with an army of caterpillars to come upon them, and lay them waste; that nation spoken of ch. vi. 14, which afflicted them "from the entering of Hamath to the river of the wilderness," which seems to refer to 2 Kin. xiv. 25; where Jeroboam is said to have restored their coast "from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain." God can then bring all to ruin when we think all is in some good measure repaired.

2nd. He proceeds to the judgment of fire, to shew that he has many arrows in his quiver, many ways of humbling a sinful nation; ver. 4, "The Lord God called to contend by fire." He contended; for God's judgments upon a people are his controversies with them, in them he prosecutes his action against them; and his controversies are neither causeless nor groundless. He "called to contend;" he did by his prophets give them notice of his controversy, and drew up a declaration setting forth the meaning of it. Or, he called for his angels, or other ministers of his justice that were to be employed in it. A fire was kindled among them; by which is meant, either a great drought,—the heat of the sun, which should have warmed the earth, scorched it, and burnt up the roots of the grass, which the locusts had eaten the spires of; or a raging fever, which was a fire in their bones, which devoured and eat up multitudes; or lightning, fire from heaven, which consumed their houses, as Sodom and Gomorrah were consumed, ch. iv. 11; or it was the burning of their cities, either by accident or by the hand of the enemy, for fire and sword used to go together,—thus were the towns wasted, as the country was by the grasshoppers. This fire which God called for did terrible execution; it "devoured the great deep," as the fire that fell from heaven on Elijah's altar licked up the water that was in the trench. Though the water designed for the stopping and quenching of this fire were as the water of the great deep, yet it devoured it; for who or what can stand before a fire kindled by the wrath of God? It did "eat up a part," a great part, of the cities where it was sent. Or it was as the fire at Taberah, which consumed the outermost parts of the camp, Num. xi. 1; when some were overthrown others were "as brands plucked out of the fire." All deserved to be devoured, but it ate up only a part, for God doth not stir up all his wrath.

2. The prophet goes forth to meet him in the way of his judgments, and by prayer seeks to turn away his wrath, ver. 2. When he saw in vision what dreadful work these caterpillars made, that they had eaten up in a manner all the grass of the land—he foresaw they would do so, if suffered to go on—then he said, "O Lord God, forgive, I beseech thee," ver. 2; "cease, I beseech thee," ver. 5. He that foretold the judgment in his preaching to the people, yet deprecated it in his intercessions for them. "He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee;" it was the business of prophets to pray for those whom they prophesied to, and so to make it appear that, though they denounced, they did not desire, the woful day. Therefore God shewed his prophets the evils coming, that they might befriend the people, not only by warning them, but by praying for them, and standing in the gap to turn away God's wrath, as Moses that great prophet often did. Now observe here,

1st. The prophet's prayer, "O Lord God." First. "Forgive, I beseech thee," and take away the sin, ver. 2. He sees sin at the bottom of the trouble, and therefore concludes that the pardon of sin must be at the bottom of the deliverance, and prays for that in the first place. Note, Whatever calamity we are under, personal or public, the forgiveness of sin is that which we should be most earnest with God for. Secondly. "Cease, I beseech thee," and take away the judgment; cease the fire, cease the controversy; "cause thine anger towards us to cease." This follows from the forgiveness of sin; take away the cause, and the effect will cease. Note, Those whom God contends with will soon find what need they have to cry for a cessation of arms; and there is hope that, though God had begun and proceeded far in his controversy, yet it may be obtained.

2nd. The prophet's plea to enforce this prayer; "By whom shall Jacob arise, for he is small?" ver. 2, and it is repeated ver. 6, and yet no vain repetition. Christ in his agony prayed earnestly, saying the same words again and again. First. It is Jacob that he is interceding for; the professing people of God, called by his name, calling on his name, the seed of Jacob, his chosen, and in covenant with him. It is Jacob's case that is in this prayer spread before the God of Jacob. Secondly. Jacob is small, very small, already, weakened and brought low by former judgments; and therefore if these come he will be quite ruined and brought to nothing. The people are few, the dust of Jacob is now soon counted, which, when time was, was innumerable. Those few are feeble; it is "the worm Jacob," Isa. xli. 14; they are unable to help themselves or one another. Sin will soon make a great people small, will diminish the numerous, impoverish the plenteous, and weaken the courageous. Thirdly. By whom shall he arise? He is fallen, and cannot help himself up, and he has no friend to help him, none to raise him, unless the hand of God do it. What will become of him, then, if the hand that should raise him be stretched out against him? Note, When the state of God's church is very low and very helpless, it is proper to be recommended by our prayers to God's pity.

3. God graciously lets fall his controversy in answer to the prophet's prayer, once again; ver. 3, "The Lord repented for this." He did not change his mind, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? But he changed his way, took another course, and determined to deal in mercy, and not in wrath. He said, "It shall not be;" and again, ver. 5, "This also shall not be." The caterpillars were countermanded, were remanded, a stop put to the progress of the fire, and thus a reprieve was granted. See the power of prayer, of effectual fervent prayer, how much it avails, what great things it prevails for. A stop has many a time been put to a judgment by making supplication to the Judge. This was not the first time that Israel's life was begged, and so saved. See what a blessing praying people, praying prophets, are to a land, and therefore how highly they ought to be valued. Ruin had many a time broken in, if they had not stood in the breach, and made good the pass. See how ready, how swift God is to shew mercy, how he waits to be gracious. Amos moves for a reprieve, and obtains it, because God inclines to grant it, and looks about to see if there be any that will intercede for it, Isa. lix. 16. Nor are former reprieves objected against farther instances of mercy, but are rather encouragements to pray and hope for them. This also shall not be, any more than that. It is the glory of God that he multiplies to pardon, that he spares and forgives to more than seventy times seven times.

Secondly. We have here the rejection of those at last who had been often reprieved, and yet never reclaimed; reduced to straits, and yet never reduced to their God and their duty. This is represented to the prophet by a vision, ver. 7, 8, and an express prediction of utter ruin, ver. 9.

1. The vision is of a plumb-line, a line with a plummet at the end of it, such as masons and bricklayers use to run up a wall by, that they may work it straight and true, and by rule. 1st. Israel was a wall, a strong wall, which God himself had reared as a bulwark, or wall of defence to his sanctuary, which he set up among them. The Jewish church saith of herself, Cant. viii. 10, "I am a wall, and my breasts like towers." This wall was made by a plumb-line, very exact and firm. So happy was its constitution, so well compacted, and every thing so well ordered according to the model, it had long stood fast as a wall of brass. But, 2nd. God now stands upon this wall, not to hold it up, but to tread it down, or rather to consider what he shall do with it. He stands upon it "with a plumb-line in his hand," to take measure of it, that it may appear to be a bowing, bulging wall. Recti est index sui et obliqui,—'This plumb-line would discover where it was crooked.' Thus God would bring the people of Israel to the trial, would discover their wickedness, and shew wherein they erred; and he would likewise bring his judgments upon them according to equity, would set a "plumb-line in the midst of them," to mark how far their wall must be pulled down, as David measured the Moabites with a line, 2 Sam. viii. 2, to put them to death. And when God is coming to the ruin of a people, he is said to "lay judgments to the line, and righteousness to the plummet," for when he punisheth it is with exactness. It is now determined, I will not again pass by them any more; they shall not be spared and reprieved as they have been, their punishment shall not be turned away, ch. i. 3. Note, God's patience, that has long been sinned against, will at length be sinned away; and the time will come when those that have been spared often shall be no longer spared; "My Spirit shall not always strive." After frequent reprieves, yet a day of execution will come.

2. The prediction is of utter ruin, ver. 9. 1st. The body of the people shall be destroyed, with all those things that were their ornament and defence. They are here called Isaac as well as Israel, the house of Isaac, ver. 16, some think in allusion to the signification of Isaac's name; it is, 'laughter;' they shall become a jest among all their neighbours, they shall laugh at them. The desolation shall fasten upon their high places and their sanctuaries, either their castles or their temples, both built on high places. Their castles they thought safe, and their temples sacred as sanctuaries; these shall be laid waste, to punish them for their idolatry, and to make them ashamed of their carnal confidences, which were the two things for which God had a controversy with them. When these were made desolate, they might read their sin and folly in their punishment. 2nd. The royal family shall sink first, as an earnest of the ruin of the whole kingdom. "I will rise against the house of Jeroboam," Jeroboam the Second, who was now king of the ten tribes; his family was extirpated in his son Zacharias, that was "slain with the sword before the people" by Shallum, who conspired against him, 2 Kin. xv. 10. How unrighteous soever the instruments were, God was righteous, and in them God rose up against that idolatrous family. Even kings' houses will be no shelter against the sword of God's wrath.

10 Then Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear all his words. 11 For thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land. 12 Also Amaziah said unto Amos, O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there: 13 But prophesy not again any more at Beth-el: for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court. 14 Then answered Amos, and said to Amaziah, I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was an herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit:

SYCAMORE FIGS.

15 And the LORD took me as I followed the flock, and the LORD said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel. 16 Now therefore hear thou the word of the LORD: Thou sayest, Prophesy not against Israel, and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac. 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD;

Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city,
And thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword,
And thy land shall be divided by line;
And thou shalt die in a polluted land:
And Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land.

One would have expected that what we met with in the former part of the chapter should, 1st. Have awakened the people to repentance, when they saw that therefore they were reprieved that they might have space to repent, and that they could not obtain a pardon unless they did repent. 2nd. That it should have endeared the prophet Amos to them, who had not only shewed his goodwill to them, in praying against the judgments that invaded them, but had prevailed to turn away those judgments, which, if they had had any sense of gratitude, would have gained him an interest in their affections. But it fell out quite contrary; they continue impenitent, and the next news we hear of Amos is that he is persecuted. Note, As it is the praise of great saints that they pray for those who are enemies to them, so it is the shame of many great sinners that they are enemies to those who pray for them, Ps. xxxv. 13, 15; cix. 4. We have here,

First. The malicious information brought to the king against the prophet Amos, ver. 10, 11. The informer was Amaziah, "the priest of Bethel," the chief of the priests that ministered to the golden calf there; the president of Bethel, so some read it, that had the principal hand in civil affairs there. He complained against Amos, not only because he prophesied without license from him, but because he prophesied against his altars, which would soon have been deserted and demolished if Amos's preaching could but have gained credit. Thus the shrine-makers at Ephesus hated Paul, because his preaching tended to spoil their trade. Note, Great pretenders to sanctity are commonly the worst enemies to those who are really sanctified. Priests have been the most bitter persecutors. Amaziah brings an information to Jeroboam against Amos. Observe,

1. The crime he is charged with is no less than treason. "Amos hath conspired against thee," to depose and murder thee; he aims at succeeding thee, and therefore is taking the most effectual way to weaken thee; he sows the seeds of sedition in the hearts of the good subjects of the king, and makes them disaffected to him and his government, that he may draw them by degrees from their allegiance. Upon this account "the land is not able to bear his words." It is slily insinuated to the king that the country was exasperated against him, and it is given in as their sense that his preaching was intolerable, and such as nobody could be reconciled to, such as the times would by no means bear, that is, the men of the times would not. Both the impudence of his supposed treason and the ill influence it would have upon the country are intimated in that part of the charge, that he conspired against the king in the midst of the house of Israel. Note, It is no new thing for the accusers of the brethren to misrepresent them as enemies to the king and kingdom, as traitors to their prince, and troublers of the land, when really they are the best friends to both; and it is common for designing men to assert that as the sense of the country which is far from being so. And yet here I doubt it was too true that the people could not bear plain dealing any more than the priests.

2. The words laid in the indictment for the support of this charge, ver. 11. "Amos saith," and they have witnesses ready to prove it, "Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall be led away captive;" and from hence they infer that he is an enemy to his king and country, and not to be tolerated. See the malice of Amaziah; he doth not tell the king how Amos had interceded for Israel, and by his intercession had turned away first one judgment and then another, and did not let fall his intercession till he saw the decree was gone forth. He doth not tell him that these threatenings were conditional; and he had often assured them that if they would repent and reform the ruin should be prevented. Nay, it was not true that he said, "Jeroboam shall die by the sword," nor did he so die, 2 Kin. xiv. 28, but that God would "rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword," ver. 9. God's prophets and ministers have often had occasion to make David's complaint, Ps. lvi. 5, "Every day they wrest my words." But shall it be made the watchman's crime, when he sees the sword coming, to give warning to the people that they may get themselves secured? or the physician's crime to tell his patient of the danger of his disease, that he may use means for the cure of it? What enemies are foolish men to themselves, to their own peace, to their best friends! It doth not appear that Jeroboam took any notice of this information; perhaps he reverenced a prophet, and stood more in awe of the Divine authority than Amaziah his priest did.

Secondly. The method he used to persuade Amos to withdraw and quit the country, ver. 12, 13. When he could not gain his point with the king to have Amos imprisoned, banished, or put to death, or at least to have him frightened into silence or flight, he tried what he could do by fair means to get rid of him; insinuated himself into his acquaintance, and, with all the arts of wheedling, endeavoured to persuade him to go prophesy in the land of Judah, and not at Bethel. He owns him to be a seer, and doth not pretend to enjoin him silence, but suggests to him, 1st. That Bethel was not a proper place for him to exercise his ministry in, for it was the king's chapel, or sanctuary, where he had his idols, and their altars and priests; and it was the king's court, or the house of the kingdom, where the royal family resided, and where were set the thrones of judgment; and therefore prophesy not any more here. And why not? First. Because Amos is too plain and blunt a preacher for the court and the king's chapel. They that wear silk and fine clothing, and speak silken, soft words, are fit for king's palaces. Secondly. Because the worship that is in the king's chapel will be a continual vexation and trouble to Amos; let him, therefore, get far enough from it, and what the eye sees not the heart grieves not for. Thirdly. Because it was not fit that the king and his house should be affronted in their own court and chapel by the reproofs and threatenings which Amos was continually teasing them with in the name of the Lord, as if it were the prerogative of the prince and the privilege of the peers, when they are running headlong upon a precipice, not to be told of their danger. Fourthly. Because he could not expect any countenance or encouragement there, but on the contrary to be bantered and ridiculed by some, and to be threatened and browbeaten by others. However, he could not think to make any converts there, or to persuade any from that idolatry which was supported by the authority and example of the king. To preach his doctrine there was but, as we say, to run his head against a post, and therefore prophesy no more there. But, 2nd. He persuades him that the land of Judah was the fittest place for him to set up in; "Flee thee away" thither with all speed, "and there eat bread, and prophesy there." There thou wilt be safe, there thou wilt be welcome; the king's court and chapel there are on thy side; the prophets there will second thee, the priests and princes there will take notice of thee, and allow thee an honourable maintenance. See here, First. How willing wicked men are to get clear of their faithful reprovers, and how ready to say to the seers, See not, or see not for us; the two witnesses were a torment to them that dwelt on the earth, Rev. xi. 10; and it were indeed pity that men should be tormented before the time, but that it is in order to the preventing of eternal torment. Secondly. How apt worldly men are to measure others by themselves. Amaziah, as a priest, aimed at nothing but the profits of his place, and he thought Amos, as a prophet, had the same views, and therefore adviseth him to prophesy there, where he might eat bread, where he might be sure to have his belly full; whereas Amos was to prophesy where God appointed him, and where there was most need of him, not where he would get most money. Note, Those that make gain their godliness, and are governed by the hopes of wealth and preferment themselves, are ready to think these the most powerful inducements with others also.

Thirdly. The reply which Amos made to these suggestions of Amaziah's. He did not consult with flesh and blood, nor was it his care to enrich himself, but to make full proof of his ministry, and to be found faithful in the discharge of it; not to sleep in a whole skin, but to keep a good conscience; and therefore he resolves to abide by his post, and in answer to Amaziah,

1. He justifies himself in his constant adherence to his work and to his place, ver. 15. And that which he is sure will not only bear him out, but bind him to it, is, that he had a Divine warrant and commission for it. "I was no prophet, or prophet's son," neither born nor bred to the office; not originally designed for a prophet, as Samuel and Jeremiah; not educated in the schools of the prophets, as many others were; but "I was a herdman," a keeper of cattle, and "a gatherer of sycamore fruit." Our sycamores bear no fruit, but it seems theirs did, which Amos gathered, either for his cattle, or for himself and family, or to sell. He was a plain countryman, bred up and employed in country work, and used to country fare. He followed the flocks as well as the herds, and thence God took him and bid him, "Go, prophesy to his people Israel," deliver to them such messages as he should from time to time receive from the Lord. God made him a prophet, and a prophet to them, appointed him his work, and appointed him his post. Therefore he ought not to be silenced, for, 1st. He could produce a Divine commission for what he did. He did not run before he was sent, but pleads, as Paul, that he was "called to be an apostle," and men will find it is at their peril if they contradict and oppose any that come in God's name; if they say to his seers, See not, or silence those whom he has bid to speak; such fight against God. An affront done to an ambassador is an affront to the prince that sends him. Those that have a warrant from God ought not to fear the face of man. 2nd. The mean character he wore before he received that commission strengthened his warrant, so far was it from weakening it. First. He had no thoughts at all of ever being a prophet, and therefore his prophesying could not be imputed to a raised expectation, or a heated imagination, but purely to a Divine impulse. Secondly. He was not educated or instructed in the art or mystery of prophesying, and therefore he must have his abilities for it immediately from God, which is an undeniable proof that he had his mission from him. The apostles, being originally unlearned and ignorant men, evidenced that they owed their knowledge to their having been with Jesus, Acts iv. 13. When the treasure is put into such earthen vessels, it is thereby made to appear that the "excellency of the power is of God, and not of man," 2 Cor. iv. 7. Thirdly. He had an honest calling, by which he could comfortably maintain himself and his family, and therefore did not need to prophesy for bread, as Amaziah suggested, ver. 12; did not take it up as a trade to live by, but as a trust to honour God and do good with. Fourthly. He had all his days been accustomed to a plain, homely way of living, among poor husbandmen, and never affected either gaieties or dainties, and therefore would not have thrust himself so near the king's court and chapel if the business God had called him to had not called him thither. Fifthly. Having been so meanly bred, he could not have had courage to speak to kings and great men, especially to speak such bold and provoking things to them, if he had not been animated by a greater spirit than his own. If God that sent him had not strengthened him, he could not thus have set his face as a flint, Isa. l. 7. Note, God often chooseth the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty; and a herdman of Tekoa puts to shame a priest of Bethel, when he receives from God authority and ability to act for him.

2. He condemns Amaziah for the opposition he gave him, and denounceth the judgments of God against him, not from any private resentment or revenge, but in the name of the Lord, and by authority from him, ver. 16, 17. Amaziah would not suffer Amos to preach at all, and therefore he is particularly ordered to preach against him: "Now therefore hear thou the word of the Lord," hear it and tremble. Those that cannot bear general woes may expect woes of their own. The sin he is charged with is forbidding Amos to prophesy; we do not find that he beat him, or put him in the stocks, only enjoined him silence: "Prophesy not against Israel, and drop not thy word against Isaac." He must not only not thunder against them, but he must not so much as drop a word against them; he cannot bear, no not the most gentle distilling of that rain, that small rain. Let him therefore hear his doom.

1st. For the opposition which he gave to Amos God will bring ruin upon himself and his family. This was the sin that filled the measure of his iniquity. First. He shall have no comfort in any of his relations, but be afflicted in those that were nearest to him. His "wife shall be a harlot;" either she shall be forcibly abused by the soldiers, as the Levite's concubine by the men of Gibeah, they "ravished the women in Zion," Lam. v. 11; or she shall herself wickedly play the harlot, which, though her sin, her great sin, would be his affliction, his great affliction and reproach, and a just punishment upon him for promoting spiritual whoredom. Sometimes the sins of our relations are to be looked upon as the judgments of God upon us. His children, though they keep honest, yet shall not keep alive. His "sons and his daughters shall fall by the sword" of war, and he himself shall live to see it. He had trained them up in iniquity, and therefore God will cut them off in it. Secondly. He shall be stripped of all his estate; it shall fall into the hand of the enemy, and be divided by line, by lot, among the soldiers. What is ill got will not be long kept. Thirdly. He shall himself perish in a strange country; not in the land of Israel, which had been holiness to the Lord, but in a polluted land, in a heathen country, the fittest place for such a heathen to end his days in, that hated and silenced God's prophets, and contributed so much to the polluting of his own land with idolatry.

2nd. Notwithstanding the opposition he gave to Amos, God will bring ruin upon the land and nation. He was accused for saying, Israel shall be led away captive, ver. 11, but he stands to it, and repeats it, for the unbelief of man shall not make the word of God of none effect. The "burthen of the word of the Lord" may be striven with, but it cannot be shaken off. Let Amaziah rage and fret, and say what he will to the contrary, "Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his own land." Note, It is to no purpose to contend with the judgments of God, for when God judgeth he will overcome. Stopping the mouths of God's ministers will not stop the progress of God's word, for it shall not return void.

CHAPTER VIII.

Sinful times are here attended with sorrowful times, so necessary is the connexion between them; it is threatened here, again and again, that the laughter shall be turned into mourning. I. By the vision of a basket of summer fruit is signified the hastening on of the ruin threatened, ver. 1—3; and that shall change their note. II. Oppressors are here called to an account for their abusing of the poor; and their destruction is foretold, which will set them on mourning, ver. 4—10. III. A famine of the word of God is here made the punishment of a people that go a whoring after other gods, ver. 11—14; yet for this, which is the most mournful judgment of all, they are not here brought in mourning.

THUS hath the Lord GOD shewed unto me: and behold a basket of summer fruit. 2 And he said, Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A basket of summer fruit. Then said the LORD unto me,

The end is come upon my people of Israel;
I will not again pass by them any more.
3 And the songs of the temple shall be howlings
In that day, saith the Lord GOD:
There shall be many dead bodies in every place;
They shall cast them forth with silence.

The great reason why sinners defer their repentance de die in diem,—'from day to day,' is because they think God thus defers his judgments; and there is no song wherewith they so effectually sing themselves asleep as that, "My Lord delays his coming;" and therefore God by his prophets frequently represents to Israel the day of his wrath, not only as just and certain, but as very near, and hastening on apace. So he doth in these verses:

First. The approach of the threatened ruin is represented by "a basket of summer fruit" which Amos saw in vision, for the Lord shewed it him, ver. 1, and obliged him to take notice of it; ver. 2, "Amos, what seest thou?" Note, It concerns us to inquire whether we do indeed see that which God has been pleased to shew us, and hear what he has been pleased to say to us; for many a thing God speaks, God shews, once, yea twice, and men perceive it not. Are we in the midst of the visions of the Almighty? let us consider what we see. He saw "a basket of summer fruit" gathered, and ready to be eaten, which signified, 1. That they were ripe for destruction, rotten ripe, and it was time for God to put in the sickle of his judgments, and to cut them off; nay, the thing was in effect done already, and they lay ready to be eaten up. 2. That the year of God's patience was drawing towards a conclusion; it was autumn with them, and their year would quickly have its period in a dismal winter. 3. Those we call summer fruits that will not keep till winter, but must be used presently, an emblem of this people, that had nothing solid or consistent in them.

Secondly. The intent and meaning of this vision is no more than this, it signifies that "the end is come upon my people Israel." The word that signifies "the end" is ketz, which is of near affinity with kitz, the word used for "summer fruit." God had long spared them and bore with them, but now his patience is tired out. They are indeed his people Israel, but their end, that latter end they had been so often minded of, but had so long forgotten, is now come. Note, If sinners do not make an end of sin, God will make an end of them, yea, though they be his people Israel. What was said, ch. vii. 8, is here repeated as God's determinate resolution, "I will not again pass by them any more," they shall not be connived at as they have been, nor the judgment coming turned away.

Thirdly. The consequent of this shall be a universal desolation, ver. 3. When the end is come, sorrow and death shall ride in triumph; they use to go together, and shall at length go away together, when in heaven "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow," Rev. xxi. 4. But here in a sinful world, in a sinful nation, 1. Sorrow reigns, reigns to that degree that "the songs of the temple shall be howlings." The songs of God's temple at Jerusalem, or rather of their idol temples, where they used, when in honour of the golden calves they had eaten and drunk, to rise up to play. They were, perhaps, wanton and profane songs, and it is certain, sooner or later, those will be turned into howlings; or if they had a sound and show of piety and religion, yet not coming from the heart, nor being sung to the glory of God, he valued them not, but would justly turn them into howlings. Note, Mourning will follow sinful mirth, yea, and sacred mirth too, if it be not sincere. And when God's judgments are abroad, they will soon turn the greatest joy into the greatest heaviness—the temple songs, that used to sound so pleasant, not only into sighs and groans, but into loud howlings that seem so dismal. They shall come to the temple, and finding that in ruins, there they shall howl most bitterly. 2. Death reigns, reigns to that degree that there shall be dead bodies, "many dead bodies in every place," (Ps. cx. 6,) slain by the sword or pestilence; so many, that the survivors shall not bury them with the usual pomp and solemnity of funerals; they shall not so much as have the bell tolled, but they shall "cast them forth with silence," shall bury them in the dead of the night, and charge all about them to be silent, and take no notice of it; either because they have not wherewithal to bear the charges of a funeral, or because the killing disease being infectious, none would come near them, or for fear the enemy should be provoked if they should be known to lament their slain. Or, they shall charge themselves and one another silently to submit to the hand of God in these desolating judgments, and not to repine and quarrel with him. Or it may be taken, not for a patient, but a sullen silence; their hearts shall be hardened, and all these judgments shall not extort from them one word of acknowledgment, either of God's righteousness or their own unrighteousness.

4 Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy,
5 Even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying,
When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn?
And the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat,
Making the ephah small, and the shekel great,
And falsifying the balances by deceit?
6 That we may buy the poor for silver,
And the needy for a pair of shoes;
Yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat?
7 The LORD hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob,
Surely I will never forget any of their works.
8 Shall not the land tremble for this,
And every one mourn that dwelleth therein?
And it shall rise up wholly as a flood; [Egypt.
And it shall be cast out and drowned, as by the flood of 9 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord
That I will cause the sun to go down at noon, [GOD,
And I will darken the earth in the clear day:
10 And I will turn your feasts into mourning,
And all your songs into lamentation;
And I will bring up sackcloth upon all loins,
And baldness upon every head;
And I will make it as the mourning of an only son,
And the end thereof as a bitter day.

God is here contending with proud oppressors, and shewing them,

First. The heinousness of the sin they were guilty of. In short, they had the character of the unjust judge, Lu. xviii. 2, that neither feared God nor regarded man.

1. Observe them in their devotions, and you will say they have no reverence for God. As bad as they are, they do indeed keep up a show and form of godliness, they observe the sabbath and the new moon, they put some difference between those days and other days; but they were soon weary of them, and had no affection at all to them, but their hearts were wholly set upon the world and the things of it. It is a sad character which this gives of them, that they said, "When will the sabbath be gone that we may sell corn?" Yet it is still the character of many that are called Christians. 1st. They were sick of sabbath days. When will they be gone? They were weary of the restraints of the sabbaths and the new moons, and therefore wished them over, because they might do no servile work therein. They were weary of the work and business of the sabbaths and new moons, snuffed at it, Mal. i. 13, and were as Doeg, "detained before the Lord," 1 Sam. xxi. 7; they would rather have been any where else than about God's altars. Note, Sabbath days and sabbath work are a burthen to carnal hearts, that are always afraid of doing too much for God and eternity. Can we spend our time better than in communion with God? And how much time do we spend pleasantly with the world? Will not the sabbath be gone before we have done the work of it, and reaped the gains of it? Why then should we be in such haste to part with it? 2nd. They were fond of market days. They longed to be selling corn, and setting forth wheat. When they were employed in religious services they were thinking of their marketings, their hearts "went after their covetousness," Eze. xxxiii. 31, and thus made my Father's house a house of merchandize, nay, a den of thieves. Therefore they were weary of holy duties, because their worldly business stood still the while; in which they were as in their element, but in God's sanctuary as a fish upon dry ground. Note, Those are strangers to God, and enemies to themselves, that love market days better than sabbaths, that would rather be selling corn than worshipping God.

2. Observe them in their conversations, and you will see they have no regard to man; and this commonly follows upon the former. Those that have lost the savour of piety will not long retain the sense of common honesty. These here neither do justly nor love mercy.

1st. They cheat those they deal with. When they sell their corn they impose upon the buyer, both in giving out the goods, and in receiving the money for them. They measure him the corn by their own measure, and pretend to give him what he agreed for, but they make the ephah small. The measure is scanty, and not statute measure, and so they wrong him that way. When they receive his money they must weigh it in their own scales, by their own weights, and the shekel they weigh by is above standard; they make "the shekel great," so that the money, being found too light, must have more added to it, and so they cheat that way too, and this under colour and pretence of exactness in doing justice. By such wicked practices as these men shew such a greediness of the world, such a love of themselves, such a contempt of mankind in general, and of the particular persons they deal with, and of the sacred laws of justice, as speaks them to have in their hearts neither the fear nor love of that God who hath so plainly said that false weights and balances are an abomination to him. Another instance of their fraudulent dealing is, that they "sell the refuse of the wheat," and, taking advantage of their neighbours' ignorance or necessity, make them take it at the same price at which they sell the finest of the wheat.

2nd. They are barbarous and unmerciful to the poor. They "swallow up the needy," and "make the poor of the land to fail." First. They valued themselves so much by their wealth, that they looked upon all that were poor with the highest contempt imaginable. They hated them, could not endure them, but abandoned them, and therefore did what they could to make them cease; not by relieving them, to make them cease to be poor, but by banishing and destroying them, to make them cease to be, or at least to be in their land. But he who thus reproacheth the poor despiseth his Maker, in whose hands rich and poor meet together. Secondly. They were so eager to increase their wealth, and make it more, that they robbed the poor to enrich themselves; and therefore they fastened upon the poor to make a prey of them, because they were not able to right themselves, nor to resist or revenge the violence of their oppressors. Those riches that are got by the ruin of the poor will bring ruin on those that get them. They swallowed up the poor by making them hard bargains, and cheating them in those bargains; for therefore they "falsify the balances by deceit," not only that they may enrich themselves, may have money at command, and so may have every thing else, as they think, at command too, but that they may impoverish those about them, and bring them so low, that they may force them to become slaves to them; and so, having drained them of every thing else, they may have their labour for nothing, or next to nothing. Thus they "buy the poor for silver;" they bring them and their children into bondage, because they have not wherewithal to pay for the corn they have bought: see Neh. v. 2—5. And there were so many that were reduced to this extremity that the price was very low; and the oppressors had beat it down so, that you might buy a poor man to be your slave "for a pair of shoes." Property was first invaded, and then liberty. It is the method of oppressors first to make men beggars, and then make them their vassals. Thus is the dignity of the human nature lost in the misery of those that are trampled on, and the tenderness of it in the sin of those that trample on them.

Secondly. Observe the grievousness of the punishment that shall be inflicted on them for this sin. When the poor are injured they will cry unto God, and he will hear their cry, and reckon with those that are injurious to them; for, they being his receivers, he takes the wrongs done to them as done to himself, Ex. xxii. 23, 24.

1. God will remember their sin against them. He hath "sworn by the excellency of Jacob," ver. 7, by himself, for he can swear by no greater; and who but he is the glory and magnificence of Jacob? He hath sworn by those tokens of his presence with them, and his favour to them, which they had profaned and abused, and had done what they could to make them detestable to him; for he is said, ch. vi. 8, to "abhor the excellency of Jacob." He swears in his wrath, swears by his own name, that name which was so well known, and was so great in Israel. He swears, "Surely I will never forget any of their works;" but upon all occasions they shall be remembered against them; for more is implied than is expressed. I will never forget them, is as much as to say, I will never forgive them; and then it speaks the case of these unjust, unmerciful men to be miserable indeed, eternally miserable. Woe, and a thousand woes, to that man that is cut off by an oath of God from all benefit by pardoning mercy; and those have reason to fear judgment without mercy that have shewed no mercy.

2. He will bring utter ruin and confusion upon them. It is here described largely, and in a great variety of emphatical expressions, that, if possible, they might be frightened into a sincere repentance and reformation. 1st. There shall be a universal terror and consternation. "Shall not the land tremble for this?" ver. 8; this land out of which you thought to have driven the poor. "Shall not every one mourn that dwelleth therein?" Certainly they shall. Note, Those that will not tremble and mourn as they ought for national sins shall be made to tremble and mourn for national judgments. Those that look unconcerned upon the sins of the oppressors, which should make them tremble, and upon the miseries of the oppressed, which should make them mourn, God will find out a way to make them tremble at the fury of those that oppress them, and mourn for their own losses and sufferings by it. 2nd. There shall be a universal deluge and desolation. When God comes forth against them, the waters of trouble and calamity shall "rise up wholly as a flood," that swells when it is dammed up, and soon overflows its banks. Every thing shall make against them. That with which they thought to check the progress of God's judgments shall but make them rise the higher. Judgments shall force their way, as the breaking forth of waters. The whole land "shall be cast out and drowned," and laid under water, as the land of Egypt is every year by the overflowing of its river Nile. Or, the expressions may allude to some former judgments of God. Their ruin "shall rise up wholly as a flood," as Noah's flood, which overwhelmed the whole world, so shall this the whole land; and the land shall be "cast out and drowned, as by the flood of Egypt;" that is, as Pharaoh and his Egyptians were buried in the Red Sea, which was to them the flood of Egypt; both which judgments, as this here threatened, were the punishment of violence and oppression, which the Lord is the avenger of.

3. It shall surprise them, and come upon them when they little think of it; ver. 9, "I will cause the sun to go down at noon," when it is in its full strength and lustre; at their noon, when they promise themselves a long afternoon, and think they have at least half a day good before them. The earth shall be darkened "in the clear day," when every thing looks pleasant and hopeful. Thus uncertain are all our creature comforts and enjoyments, even life itself. The highest degree of health and prosperity often proves the next degree to sickness and adversity; Job's sun went down at noon. Many are taken away in the midst of their days, and their sun goes down at noon; in the midst of life we are in death. Thus terrible are the judgments of God to those that sleep in security, they are to them as the sun's going down at noon; the less they are expected the more confounding they are. When they cry peace and safety, then sudden destruction comes, comes as a snare, Lu. xxi. 35.

4. It shall change their note, and mar all their mirth; ver. 10, "I will turn your feasts into mourning;" as, ver. 3, "the songs of the temple into howlings." Note, The end of the sinner's mirth and jollity is heaviness. As to the upright there "ariseth light in the darkness," which gives them the "oil of joy for mourning," so on the wicked there falls darkness in the midst of light, which turns their laughter into mourning, their joy into heaviness. So great, so general shall the desolation be, that "sackcloth shall be brought upon all loins, and baldness upon every head," instead of the well-set hair, and the rich garments they used to wear. The mourning at that day shall be as "mourning for an only son," which speaks the most bitter and lasting lamentation; but is there no hope that when things are at the worst they will mend, that at evening time it will yet be light? No, even "the end thereof shall be as a bitter day," a day of bitter mourning. The state of impenitent sinners grows worse and worse, and the last of all will be the worst of all. "This shall ye have at my hand, ye shall lie down in sorrow."

11 Behold, the days come, saith the Lord GOD,
That I will send a famine in the land,
Not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water,
But of hearing the words of the LORD:
12 And they shall wander from sea to sea, [and fro
And from the north even to the east, they shall run to
To seek the word of the LORD, and shall not find it.
13 In that day shall the fair virgins and young men faint for thirst.
14 They that swear by the sin of Samaria,
And say, Thy god, O Dan, liveth;
And, The manner of Beer-sheba liveth;
Even they shall fall, and never rise up again.

In these verses is threatened,

First. A general judgment of spiritual famine coming upon the whole land; a famine of the word of God, the failing of oracles, and the scarcity of good preaching. This is spoken of as a thing at some distance; the days come, they will come hereafter, when another kind of darkness shall come upon the land of light. When Amos prophesied, and for a considerable time after, there was great plenty of prophets, abundant opportunities of hearing the word of God, in season and out of season; they had precept upon precept, and line upon line. Prophecy was their daily bread, and it is likely they surfeited upon it, as Israel on the manna, and therefore God threatens that hereafter he will deprive them of this privilege. Probably in the land of Israel there were not so many prophets, about the time that the destruction came upon them, as there were in the land of Judah; and when the ten tribes went into captivity they "saw not their signs," there were no more any prophets, none to "shew them how long," Ps. lxxiv. 9. The Jewish church, after Malachi, had no prophets for many ages; and some think this threatening looks farther yet, to the blindness which has in part happened to Israel in the days of the Messiah, and the veil that is on the heart of the unbelieving Jews. They reject the Gospel, and the ministers of it, that God doth send to them, and covet to have prophets of their own, as their fathers had; but they shall have none, the kingdom of God being taken from them and given to another people. Observe here,

1. What the judgment itself is that is threatened. It is a famine, a scarcity, not of bread and water, which are the necessary supports of the body, and the want of which is very grievous, but much sorer judgment than that, even "a famine of hearing the words of the Lord." There shall be no congregations for ministers to preach to, nor any ministers to preach; nor any instructions and abilities given to those that do set up for preachers, to enable them for their work. The word of the Lord shall be precious and scarce; there shall be no vision, 1 Sam. iii. 1; they shall have the written word, Bibles to read, but no ministers to explain and apply it to them; the water in the well, but nothing to draw. It is a gracious promise, Isa. xxx. 20, that though they have a scarcity of bread, they shall have plenty of the means of grace; God will "give them the bread of adversity, and the water of affliction," but their eyes shall see their teachers; and it was a common saying among the puritans, that brown bread and the Gospel are good fare; but it is here a threatening, that on the contrary they should have plenty enough of bread and water, and yet their teachers should be removed. Now, 1st. This was the departure of a great part of their glory from their land. This made their nation great and high, that to them were committed the oracles of God; but, when those were taken from them, their beauty was stained, and their honour laid in the dust. 2nd. This was a token of God's highest displeasure against them. Surely he was angry indeed with them, when he would no more speak to them as he had done, and had abandoned them to ruin, when he would no more afford them the means of bringing them to repentance. 3rd. This made all the other calamities that were upon them truly melancholy, that they had no prophets to instruct and comfort them from the word of God, nor to give them any hopeful prospect. We should say at any time, and will say in a time of trouble, that a famine of the word of God is of all others the sorest famine, the heaviest judgment.

2. What will be the effect of this; ver. 12, "They shall wander from sea to sea," from the sea of Tiberias to the Great Sea, from one border of the country to another, to see if God will send them prophets either by sea or land from other countries, since they have none among themselves. They shall go from the north to the east; when they are disappointed in one place they shall try another, and shall "run to and fro" as men at a loss, and in a hot pursuit, "to seek the word of the Lord," to inquire if there be any prophets, any prophecy, any message from God; but they "shall not find it." 1st. Though to many this is no affliction at all, yet some will be very sensible of it as a great grievance, and will gladly travel far to hear a good sermon; but they shall sensibly feel the loss of those mercies which others have foolishly sinned away. 2nd. Even those that slighted prophets when they had them shall wish for them, as Saul did for Samuel, when they are deprived of them: many never know the worth of mercies till they feel the want of them. Or it may be meant thus, though they should thus wander from sea to sea in quest of the word of God, yet they shall not find it. Note, The means of grace are moveable things, and the candlestick, when we think it stands most firm, yet may be removed out of its place, Rev. ii. 5, and those that now slight "the days of the Son of man" may wish in vain to see them. And in the day of this famine "the fair virgins and the young men shall faint for thirst," ver. 13. Those who one would think could well enough have borne the toil yet shall sink under it. The Jewish churches, and the masters of their synagogues, some take to be meant by the virgins and the young men; these shall lose the word of the Lord and the benefit of Divine revelation, and shall faint for want of it, shall lose all their strength and beauty. Those that trust to their own merit and righteousness, and think they have no need of Christ, others take to be meant by the fair virgins and the choice young men; those shall faint for thirst, when those that hunger and thirst after the righteousness of Christ shall be abundantly satisfied and filled.

Secondly. The particular destruction of those that were ringleaders in idolatry, ver. 14. Observe, 1. The sin they are charged with. They "swear by the sin of Samaria," that is, by the god of Samaria, the idol that was worshipped at Bethel, not far off from Samaria. Thus did they glory in their shame, and swear by that as their god, which was their iniquity, thinking that could help them which would certainly ruin them, and giving the highest honour to that which they should have looked upon with the utmost abhorrence and detestation. They say, "Thy god, O Dan, liveth;" that was the other golden calf, a dumb dead idol, and yet is caressed and complimented as if it had been the living and true God. They say, "the manner," or way, "of Beer-sheba liveth." They swear by the religion of Beer-sheba, the way and manner of worship used there, which they looked upon as sacred, and therefore swear by it, and appealed to it as a judge of controversy. Thus the papists swear by the mass, as "the manner of Beer-sheba." 2. The destruction they are threatened with. Those who thus give that honour to idols which is due to God alone will find the God they affront is thereby made their enemy, so that "they shall fall," and the gods they serve cannot stand their friends, so that they shall "never rise again." They will find that God is jealous, and will resent the indignity done him; and that he will be victorious, and it is to no purpose to contend with him.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have, I. Judgments threatened which the sinner shall not escape, ver. 1—4; which an almighty power shall inflict, ver. 5, 6; which the people of Israel have deserved, as a sinful people, ver. 7, 8; and yet it shall not be the utter ruin of their nation, ver. 8; for a remnant of good people shall escape, ver. 9; but the wicked ones shall perish, ver. 10. II. Mercy promised which was to be bestowed in the latter days, ver. 11—15; as appears by the application of it to the days of the Messiah, Acts xv. 16. And with those comfortable promises, after all the foregoing rebukes and threatenings, the book concludes.

I SAW the Lord standing upon the altar: and he said,
Smite the lintel of the door, that the posts may shake:
And cut them in the head, all of them;
And I will slay the last of them with the sword:
He that fleeth of them shall not flee away,
And he that escapeth of them shall not be delivered.
2 Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them; [them down:
Though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring
3 And though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel,
I will search and take them out thence;
And though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, [them:
Thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite
4 And though they go into captivity before their enemies,
Thence will I command the sword, and it shall slay them: [good.
And I will set mine eyes upon them for evil, and not for 5 And the Lord GOD of hosts is he
That toucheth the land, and it shall melt,
And all that dwell therein shall mourn:
And it shall rise up wholly like a flood;
And shall be drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.
6 It is he that buildeth his stories in the heaven,
And hath founded his troop in the earth;
He that calleth for the waters of the sea,
And poureth them out upon the face of the earth:
The LORD is his name.
7 Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me,
O children of Israel? saith the LORD.
Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt?
And the Philistines from Caphtor, and the Syrians from Kir? [kingdom,
8 Behold, the eyes of the Lord GOD are upon the sinful
And I will destroy it from off the face of the earth;
Saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the LORD.
9 For, lo, I will command,
And I will sift the house of Israel among all nations,
Like as corn is sifted in a sieve,
Yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth.
10 All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword,
Which say, The evil shall not overtake nor prevent us.

We have here the justice of God passing sentence upon a provoking people; and observe,

First. With what solemnity the sentence is passed. The prophet saw in vision "the Lord standing upon the altar," ver. 1, the altar of burnt offerings, for "the Lord hath a sacrifice," and multitudes must fall as victims to his justice. He is removed from the mercy-seat between the cherubims, and stands upon the altar, the judgment-seat, on which the fire of God used to fall to devour the sacrifices. He stands upon the altar to shew that the ground of his controversy with this people was their profanation of his holy things. Here he stands to avenge the quarrel of his altar; as also to signify that the sin of the house of Israel, like that of the house of Eli, shall "not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever," 1 Sam. iii. 14. He stands on the altar to prohibit sacrifice. Now the order given is, "Smite the lintel of the door" of the temple, the chapiter, smite it with such a blow "that the posts may shake," and "cut them," wound them "in the head, all of them;" break down the door of God's house, or of the courts of his house, in token of this, that he is going out from it, and forsaking it, and then all judgments are breaking in upon it. Or it signifies the destruction of those in the first place that should be as door-posts to the nation, for its defence; so as that, they being broken down, it becomes as "a city without gates and bars." Smite the king, who is as the lintel of the door, that the princes, who are as the posts, may shake; "cut them in the head," cleave them down, "all of them," as wood for the fire; and "I will slay the last of them," the posterity of them, them and their families, or the least of them, them and all that are employed under them. Or, I will slay them all, them and all that remain of them till it comes to the last man; the slaughter shall be general. There is no living for those of whom God hath said, "I will slay them," no standing before his sword.

Secondly. What effectual care is taken that none shall escape the execution of this sentence. This is enlarged upon here, and is intended for warning to all that provoke the Lord's jealousy; let sinners read it and tremble. As there is no fighting it out with God, so there is no fleeing from him; his judgments, when they come with commission, as they will overpower the strongest that think to outface them, so they will overtake the swiftest that think to outrun them, ver. 1. Those of them that flee, and take to their heels, they shall soon be out of breath, and shall not flee away out of the reach of danger; for as sometimes "the wicked flee when none pursues," so he cannot flee away when God pursues, though he would fain flee out of his hand. Nay, he that escapeth of them, that thinks he has gained his point, yet he shall not be delivered; evil pursues sinners, and will arrest them. This is here enlarged upon by shewing, that, wherever sinners flee for shelter from God's justice, it will overtake them, and the shelter will prove but a refuge of lies. What David saith of the ubiquity of God's presence, Ps. cxxxix. 7—10, is here said of the extent of God's power and justice.

1. Hell itself, though it has its name in English from its being hilled, or covered over, or hidden, cannot hide them; ver. 2, "though they dig into hell," into the centre of the earth, or the darkest recesses of it, yet "thence shall my hand take them," and bring them forth to be made public monuments of Divine justice. The grave is a hiding-place to the righteous from the malice of the world, Job. iii. 17, but it shall be no hiding-place to the wicked from the justice of God; from thence God's hand shall take them, when they shall rise in the great day to everlasting shame and contempt.

2. Heaven, though it has its name from being heaved or lifted up, shall not put them out of the reach of God's judgments; as hell cannot hide them, so heaven will not; "Though they climb up to heaven," in their own conceit, yet "thence will I bring them down." Those whom God brings to heaven by his grace shall never be brought down; but those who climb thither themselves, by their own presumption and confidence in themselves, will be brought down and filled with shame.

3. The top of Carmel, one of the highest parts of the dust of the world in that country, shall not protect them; "Though they hide themselves" there, where they imagine nobody will look for them, "I will search and take them out thence:" neither the thickest bushes nor the darkest caves in the top of Carmel will serve to hide them.

4. The bottom of the sea shall not serve to conceal them; though they think to hide themselves there, even there the judgments of God shall find them out, and lay hold on them. "Thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them," the "crooked serpent," even "the dragon that is in the sea," Isa. xxvii. 1. They shall find their plague and death there where they hope to find shelter and protection; diving will stand them in no more stead than climbing.

5. Remote countries will not befriend them, nor shall lesser judgments excuse them from greater; ver. 4, "Though they go into captivity before their enemies," who carry them to places at a great distance, and mingle them with their own people, among whom they seem to be lost, yet that shall not serve their turn; "Thence will I command the sword, and it shall slay them;" the sword of the enemy, or one another's sword; when God judgeth he will overcome. And that which binds on all this, and makes their escape impossible, and their ruin inevitable, is that God will "set his eyes upon them for evil and not for good." His eyes are in every place, are upon all men, and upon all the ways of men; upon some for good, to shew himself strong on their behalf, but upon others for evil, to take notice of their sins, Job xiii. 27, and take all opportunities of punishing them for their sins. Their case is truly miserable that have the providence of God and all the dispensations of it against them, working for their hurt.

Thirdly. What a great and mighty God he is that passeth this sentence upon them, and will take the executing of it into his own hands. Threatenings are more or less formidable according to the power of him that threatens. We laugh at impotent wrath, but the wrath of God is not so; it is omnipotent wrath—who knows the power of it? What he had before said he would do, ch. viii. 8, is here repeated, that he would make the land melt and tremble, and "all that dwell therein mourn," that the judgment should "rise up wholly like a flood," and the country shall be drowned, and laid under water, "as by the flood of Egypt," ver. 5. But is he able to make his words good? Yes, certainly he is; he doth but touch the land and it melteth, touch the mountains and they smoke. He can do it with the greatest ease; for,

1. He is "the Lord of hosts" that undertakes to do it, the God that has all power in his hand, and all creatures at his beck, that having made them all, and given them their several capacities, makes what use he pleaseth of them, and all their powers. Very miserable is the case of those that have the Lord God of hosts against them, for they have hosts against them—the whole creation at war with them.

2. He is the Creator and governor of the upper world; "It is he that buildeth his stories in the heavens," the celestial orbs, or spheres, one over another, as so many stories in a high and stately palace, are his, for he built them at first, when he said, "Let there be a firmament," and he made the firmament, and he buildeth them still, is continually building them, not as they need repair, but by his providence he still upholdeth them. His power is the pillars of heaven, by which it is borne up. Now he that hath the command of those stories is certainly to be feared, for from thence, as from a castle, he can fire upon his enemies, or cast upon them great hailstones, as on the Canaanites; or make the stars in their courses, the furniture of those stories, to fight against them, as against Sisera.

3. He has the conduct and command of this lower world too, in which we dwell,—the terraqueous globe, both earth and sea, so that, which way soever his enemies think to make their escape, he will meet them, or to make opposition, he will match them. Do they think to make a land-fight of it? "He hath founded his troop in the earth," his troop of guards which he has at command, and makes use of for the protection of his subjects, and the punishment of his enemies. All the creatures on earth make one bundle, as the margin reads it, one bundle of arrows, out of which he takes what he pleaseth to discharge against the persecutors, Ps. vii. 13. They are all one army, one body, so closely are they connected, and so harmoniously and so much in concert do they act for the accomplishing of their Creator's purposes. Do they think to make a sea-fight of it? He will be too hard for them there; for he has the waters of the sea at command, even its waves; the most tumultuous rebellious waters do obey him. He "calls for the waters of the sea," in the course of his common providence, causeth vapours to ascend out of it, and poureth them out in showers, the small rain and the great rain of his strength, upon the face of the earth. This was mentioned before as a reason why we should seek the Lord, ch. v. 8, and make him our friend, as it is here made a reason why we should fear him, and dread having him our enemy.

Fourthly. How justly God passeth this sentence upon the people of Israel. He doth not destroy them by an act of sovereignty, but by an act of righteousness; for, ver. 8, it is a sinful kingdom, and the eyes of the Lord are upon it, discovering it to be so. He sees the great sinfulness of it, and therefore he will "destroy it from off the face of the earth." Note, When those kingdoms that in name and profession were holy kingdoms, and kingdoms of priests, as Israel was, become sinful kingdoms, no other can be expected but that they should be cut off and abandoned. Let sinful kingdoms, and sinful families, and sinful persons too, see the eyes of the Lord upon them observing all their wickedness, and reserving the notice of it for the day of reckoning and recompense. This being a sinful kingdom, see how light God makes of it, ver. 7.

1. Of the relation wherein he stood to it; "Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel?" A sad change! children of Israel become as children of the Ethiopians! 1st. They were so in themselves, that was their sin. It is a thing to be greatly lamented that the children of Israel often become as children of the Ethiopians; the children of godly parents degenerate, and become the reverse of those that went before them. Those that were well educated and trained up in the knowledge and fear of God, and set out well, and promised fair, throw off their profession, and become as bad as the worst. How is the gold become dim! 2nd. They were so in God's account, and that was their punishment. He valued them no more, though they were children of Israel, than if they had been children of the Ethiopians. We read of one in the title of Ps. vii., that was Cush, (an Ethiopian, so some understand it,) and yet a Benjamite. Those that by birth and profession are children of Israel, if they degenerate and become wicked and vile, are to God no more than children of the Ethiopians. This is an intimation of the rejection of the unbelieving Jews in the days of the Messiah: because they embraced not the doctrine of Christ, the kingdom of God was taken from them, they were unchurched, and cast out of covenant, became as children of the Ethiopians, and are so to this day. And it is true of those that are called Christians, but do not live up to their name and profession, that rest in the form of piety, but live under the power of reigning iniquity, that they are to God as children of the Ethiopians; he rejects them and their services.

2. See how light he makes of the favours he had conferred upon them. They thought he would not, he could not, cast them off, and put them upon a level with other nations, because he had done that for them which he had not done for other nations, whereby they thought he was bound to them, so as never to leave them. No, saith he, the favours shewed you are not so distinguishing as you think they are; "Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt?" It is true, I have; but I have also brought the Philistines from Caphtor, or Cappadocia, where they were either natives or captives, or both. They are called the remnant of the country of Caphtor, Jer. xlvii. 4, and the Philistim are joined with the Caphtorim, Gen. x. 14. In like manner the Syrians were brought up from Kir, when they had been carried away thither, 2 Kin. xvi. 9. Note, If God's Israel lose the peculiarity of their holiness, they lose the peculiarity of their privileges; and what was designed as a favour of special grace shall be set in another light, shall have its property altered, and shall become but an act of common providence. If professors liken themselves to the world God will level them with the world. And if we live not up to the obligation of God's mercies we forfeit the honour and comfort of them.

Fifthly. How graciously God will separate between the precious and the vile in the day of retribution. Though the wicked Israelites shall be as the wicked Ethiopians; and their being called Israelites shall stand them in no stead, yet the pious Israelites shall not be as the wicked ones. No, "the Judge of all the earth will do right," more right than to "slay the righteous with the wicked," Gen. xviii. 25. His eyes "are upon the sinful kingdom," to spy out those in it that preserve their integrity, and swim against the stream, who sigh and cry for the abominations of their land, and they shall be marked for preservation, so that the destruction shall not be total; "I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob," not ruin them by wholesale, and in the gross, good and bad together, but I will distinguish, as becomes a righteous judge. The house of Israel shall be sifted, as corn is sifted; they shall be greatly hurried, and shaken, and tossed, but still in the hands of God, in both his hands, as the sieve in the hands of him that sifteth; ver. 9, "I will sift the house of Israel among all nations." Wherever they are shaken and scattered, God will have his eye upon them, and will take care to separate between the corn and chaff, which was the thing he designed in sifting them.

1. The righteous ones among them, that are as the solid wheat, shall none of them perish; they shall be delivered either from or through the common calamities of the kingdom; "Not the least grain shall fall on the earth," so as to be lost and forgotten; not the least stone, so the word is, for the good corn is weighty as a stone, in comparison with that which we call light corn. Note, Whatever shakings there may be in the world, God doth and will effectually provide that none that are truly his shall be truly miserable.

2. The wicked ones among them, that are hardened in their sins, shall all of them perish, ver. 10. See what a height of impiety they are come to; "They say, The evil shall not overtake and prevent us." They think they are innocent, and do not deserve punishment; or that the profession they make of relation to God will be their exemption and security from punishment; or that they shall be able to make their part good against the judgments of God, that they shall flee so swiftly from them that they shall not overtake them, or guard so carefully against them that they shall not prevent or surprise them. Note, Hope of impunity is the deceitful refuge of the impenitent. But see what it will come to at last; all the sinners that thus flatter themselves, and affront God, shall die by the sword, the sword of war, which to them shall be the sword of Divine vengeance, yea, though they be the sinners of my people, for their profession shall not be their protection. Note, Evil is often nearest those that put it at the greatest distance from them.

11 In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that
And close up the breaches thereof; [is fallen,
And I will raise up his ruins,
And I will build it as in the days of old:
12 That they may possess the remnant of Edom,
And of all the heathen, which are called by my name,
Saith the LORD that doeth this.
13 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That the plowman shall overtake the reaper,
And the treader of grapes him that soweth seed;
And the mountains shall drop sweet wine,
And all the hills shall melt. [Israel,
14 And I will bring again the captivity of my people of
And they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof;
They shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them.
15 And I will plant them upon their land,
And they shall no more be pulled up
Out of their land which I have given them, saith the LORD thy God.

To him, to whom all the prophets bare witness, this prophet here in the close bears his testimony, and speaks of that day, those days that shall come, in which God will do great things for his church, by the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah, for the rejecting of which the rejection of the Jews was foretold in the foregoing verses. The promise here is said to agree to the planting of the Christian church, and in that to be fulfilled, Acts xv. 15—17.

First. It is promised that in the Messiah the kingdom of David shall be restored; ver. 11, "the tabernacle of David" it is called, that is, his house and family, which, though great and fixed, yet in comparison with the kingdom of heaven was mean and moveable as a tabernacle. The church militant, in its present state, dwelling as in shepherds' tents to feed, as in soldiers' tents to fight, is the tabernacle of David. God's tabernacle is called the tabernacle of David, because David desired and chose to "dwell in God's tabernacle for ever," Ps. lxi. 4. Now, 1. These tabernacles were fallen, and gone to decay. The royal family was so impoverished, its power abridged, its honour stained and laid in the dust; for many of that race degenerated, and in the captivity it lost the imperial dignity. Sore breaches were made upon it, and at length it was laid in ruins. So it was with the church of the Jews; in the latter days of it its glory was departed. It was like a tabernacle broken down, and brought to ruin, in respect both of purity and prosperity. 2. By Jesus Christ these tabernacles were raised and rebuilt. In him God's covenant with David had its accomplishment, and the glory of that house, which was not only sullied, but quite sunk, revived again; the breaches of it were closed, and its ruins raised up, "as in the days of old." Nay, the spiritual glory of the family of Christ far exceeded the temporal glory of the family of David, when it was at its height. In him also God's covenant with Israel had its accomplishment; and in the gospel church the tabernacle of God was set up among men again, and raised up out of the ruins of the Jewish state. This is quoted in the first council at Jerusalem, as referring to the calling in of the Gentiles, and God's taking out of them a people for his name. Note, While the world stands God will have a church in it; and if it be fallen in one place, and among one people, it shall be raised up elsewhere.

Secondly. It is promised that that kingdom shall be enlarged, and the territories of it shall extend far, by the accession of many countries to it; ver. 12, that the house of David "may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen," that is, that Christ may have them given him for his inheritance, even "the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession," Ps. ii. 8. Those that had been strangers and enemies shall become willing, faithful subjects to the Son of David, shall be added to the church, or those of them that are called by my name, saith the Lord; that is, that belong to the election of grace, and are ordained to eternal life, Acts xiii. 48; for it is true of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews, that "the election hath obtained, and the rest were blinded," Rom. xi. 7. Christ died to "gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad," here said to be those that were called by his name. The promise is to all that were afar off, even "as many of them as the Lord our God shall call," Acts ii. 39. St. James expounds this as a promise "that the residue of men should seek after the Lord, even all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called." But may the promise be depended upon? Yes, the Lord saith this, who doth this, who can do it, who hath determined to do it, the power of whose grace is engaged for the doing of it, and with whom saying and doing are not two things, as they are with us.

Thirdly. That in the kingdom of the Messiah there shall be great plenty, and an abundance of all good things that the country doth produce; ver. 13, "The ploughman shall overtake the reaper," that is, there shall be such a plentiful harvest every year, and so much corn to be gathered in, that it shall last all summer, even till autumn, when it is time to begin to plough again. And in like manner the vintage shall continue till seedtime; and there shall be such abundance of grapes that even "the mountains shall drop new wine" into the vessels of the grape-gatherers, and the hills that were dry and barren shall be moistened, and shall melt with the fatness, or the mellowness as we call it, of the soil. Compare this with Joel ii. 24; iii. 18. This must certainly be understood of the abundance of spiritual blessings in heavenly things which all those are and shall be blessed with that are in sincerity added to Christ and his church. They shall be abundantly replenished with the goodness of God's house, with the graces and comforts of his Spirit. They shall have bread, the bread of life, to strengthen their hearts, and the wine of Divine consolation to make them glad; meat indeed, and drink indeed, all the benefit that comes to the souls of men from the word and Spirit of God. These had been long confined to the vineyard of the Jewish church; Divine revelation, and the power that attended it, were to be found only within that inclosure. But in gospel times the mountains and hills of the Gentile world shall be enriched with these privileges, by the Gospel of Christ preached and professed, and received in the power of it. When great multitudes were converted to the faith of Christ, and nations were born at once,—when the preachers of the Gospel were always caused to triumph in the success of their preaching,—then the ploughman overtook the reaper. And when the Gentile churches were "enriched in all utterance, and in all knowledge," and all manner of spiritual gifts, 1 Cor. i. 5, then "the mountains dropped sweet wine."

Fourthly. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall be well peopled. As the country shall be replenished so shall the cities be; there shall be mouths for this meat, ver. 14. Those that were carried captives shall be brought back out of their captivity; their enemies shall not be able to detain them in the land of their captivity, nor shall they themselves incline to settle in it, but the remnant shall return, and shall "build the waste cities, and inhabit them;" shall form themselves into Christian churches, and set up pure doctrine, worship, and discipline among them, according to the gospel charter by which Christ's cities are incorporated, and shall enjoy the benefit and comfort thereof. They shall plant vineyards, and make gardens: though the mountains and hills drop wine, and the privileges of the gospel church are laid in common, yet they shall inclose for themselves, not to monopolise these privileges to the exclusion of others, but to appropriate and improve these privileges in communion with others. And they shall drink the wine and eat the fruit of their own vineyards and gardens; for they that take pains in religion, as men must do about their vineyards and gardens, shall have both the pleasure and the profit of it. The bringing again of the captivity of God's Israel, which is here promised, may refer to the cancelling of the ceremonial law, which had been long to God's Israel as a yoke of bondage, and the investing of them in the liberty wherewith Christ came to make his church free, Gal. v. 1.

Fifthly. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall take such deep rooting in the world as never to be rooted out of it; ver. 15, "I will plant them upon their land." God's spiritual Israel shall be planted by the right hand of God himself, upon the land assigned them; and "they shall no more be pulled up out of it," as the old Jewish church was. God will preserve them from throwing themselves out of it by a total apostasy, and will preserve them from being thrown out of it by the malice of their enemies. The church may be corrupted, but shall not quite forsake God; may be persecuted, but shall not quite be forsaken of God, so that the gates of hell, neither with their temptations nor with their terrors, shall prevail against it. Two things secure the perpetuity of the church. 1. God's grants to it. It is "the land which I have given them," and God will confirm and maintain his own grants. The part he has given to his people is that good part which shall never be taken from them; he will not revoke his grant, and all the powers of earth and hell shall not invalidate it. 2. Its interest in him. He is "the Lord thy God," who has said it, and will make it good; "Thine, O Israel," who shall "reign for ever," as thine "unto all generations." And because he lives the church shall live also.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF AMOS.

CHAP. I.—2. The top of Carmel. The range of hills runs nearly eight miles into the country, and was in former days fruitful to a proverb. Indeed the name Carmel, signifying 'a fruitful field,' was plainly given to it for this reason. In the days of its primitive luxuriance how easy it would have been to hide in the top of Carmel, for embowering vines and deep shady fig-trees would afford a covert for many a mile along the summit; but the extensive summit, which was once like a garden, is (now) covered as far as our eye reached with wild mountain shrubs and briary plants, all of stinted growth, except where the rock lay bare and without verdure under the scorching sun. The same God who said, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field, and I will pour the stones of Samaria down the valley" said also, "The top of Carmel shall wither," and that word we saw before our eyes fulfilled to the letter.—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative, p. 316. 5. Plain of Aven. Supposed to be the same as the plain of Baalbec, or valley of Baal, where was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. See wood engraving at end of 2 Chr. 7. I will send a fire on the wall of Gaza. Supplementary Note, Jer. xlvii. 5, where is allusion to fire as having literally fused the masses of stone. The expression, however, so frequently employed in this chapter, denotes generally the instrument of executing the Divine judgments, especially war, in carrying on which fire is so often employed. Compare Num. xxi. 28; Isa. xxvi. 11. 8. The remnant of the Philistines shall perish. Supplementary Note, Jer. xxv. 16. 9. I will send a fire on the wall of Tyrus. Supplementary Notes on Isa. xxiii. and Eze. xxvi. 4. 11. Edom—I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Supplementary Notes on Isa. xvi. and xxxiv. 12. Teman—Bozrah—were principal cities of Edom, or Idumea. 14. I will kindle a fire on the wall of Rabbah. Supplementary Note, Eze. xxv. All these countries were subdued by Nebuchadnezzar.

CHAP. II.—2. Moab—I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Supplementary Notes on Isa. xvi. 14, and Jer. xlvii. 28. The judgments here pronounced against these countries should teach us that while God on his throne of grace delights to exercise mercy to the humble believer, he will thence also denounce and execute the severest vengeance on his enemies; that though he bears long with transgressors, yet he will no longer turn away the punishment of those who have filled up the measure of their guilt; that his wrath will consume flourishing families and magnificent palaces like a tremendous fire, break down the gates of fortified cities, depopulate fertile regions, dethrone princes, and reduce powerful nations to captivity and ruin. 4, 6. Judah—Israel—I will not turn away the punishment thereof. After the prophet had given a general warning to the surrounding nations and to Judah, he more particularly, in the name of God, addressed the Israelites, to whom he was charged with a special message. He recapitulates their atrocious and aggravated sins, and predicts the awful judgment that would come upon them. From this we should learn that it is a small thing for those "to whom are committed the oracles of God" (merely) to avoid the gross enormities of benighted heathens; that, even without crimes so atrocious in the sight of men, they may fill up a large measure of guilt and ripen speedily for vengeance, by "despising the law of the Lord and not keeping his commandments;" that false doctrines, delusive superstitions, idolatries, and direct and aggravated violations of the word of God, have often been perpetuated by tradition in the visible church, and one generation after another "have erred through the lies after which their fathers have walked," till the wrath of God has burned like fire to consume even the palaces of Jerusalem; that as it has been in times past, so when at any period this becomes the general character of churches and nations, it cannot be expected that the Lord will endure them, but that they also will be given up to complicated misery, notwithstanding all their idolized power, courage, and resources.—Scott. 6, 7. Sold—the poor for a pair of shoes—that pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor. Dr. Henderson gives nearly the same meaning as M. Henry to this latter clause. He says, 'the meaning of the prophet is, that the persons whom he describes were so avaricious, that after having robbed others of their property and reduced them to a state of poverty, they even begrudged them the small quantity of dust which they had cast on their heads in token of mourning.' Compare 2 Sam. i. 2; Job ii. 12. Some render it, 'They tread down the heads of the poor into the dust of the earth.' 'Such nominal Christians,' says Scott, 'will grudge the poor servant, labourer, and mechanic, the smallest advantage or indulgence, and eagerly pursue every iniquitous method of extorting their little from them to increase their own abundance.'—If you read Isa. v. 3—32; Jer. v. 22, 30; Am. iv. (rather ii.); Hab. ii.; and the Epistle of St. James, written to the same people a little before the second destruction of Jerusalem, you will be struck, I think, with the close resemblance of our own state to that of the Jews; while the state of the Greek churches, to whom St. Paul wrote, is wholly different, because, from their thin population and better political circumstances, poverty among them is hardly noticed, and our duties to the poor are consequently much less prominently brought forward.'—Life and Correspondence of Rev. Thos. Arnold, D.D., late Head Master of Rugby School, and Regius Professor of Modern History in the Unversity of Oxford. By A. P. Stanley, M.A., Oxford, vol. i. 262. In the same letter Dr. Arnold says, 'Unquestionably our aristocratical manners and habits have made us and the poor two distinct and unsympathizing bodies, and from want of sympathy I fear the transition to enmity is but too easy when distress embitters the feelings, and the sight of others in luxury makes that distress still more intolerable. This is the plague spot, to my mind, in our whole state of society, which must be removed, or the whole must perish. And under God it is for the clergy to come forward boldly and begin to combat it. The prophets, in a similar state of society in Judæa, did not preach subordination only or chiefly, but they denounced oppression and unnecessary overgrown properties, and grinding the labourers to the smallest possible pittance.' For remarks on that part of the above extract which speaks of our duties to the poor as much less prominently brought forward in the epistles of Paul than in these prophecies, see Comment on Jas. i. 27. At present we would only observe, that the civic and burghal, as well as the other aristocracy, (to which Dr. Arnold appears specially to allude,) have been to blame in this matter, and that it becomes all classes among the laity, higher and middle together, to be deeply humbled because of their past neglect of the interests of their poorer brethren, both in the manufacturing and rural districts of the land. The ministers of the Gospel, too, have much to answer for on this account. And whilst it is an occasion of thankfulness that within these few years increased efforts have been made for the temporal and spiritual amelioration of the humbler classes, it cannot be concealed that the evil has been allowed to get too far ahead, and that God by his providence, as by his word, is now loudly calling upon all men, clergy and laity, to apply themselves more strenuously than ever to the great duty, a duty so peculiarly obligatory on Christians, and for which they are furnished with such peculiar and powerful motives; "For ye know," says the apostle, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, for our sakes he became poor, that we through his povery might be made rich."

CHAP. V.—3. The city—which went forth by an hundred shall leave ten to the house of Israel. 'Of the hundreds of cities or towns that anciently flourished in Palestine, whether under the Israelites or the Romans, not one has been left to give now an example or illustration of what they were. Time after time they have been laid waste, and many of them are desolate without an inhabitant. Where miserable villages take the place and the name of large towns, and where towns still exist where cities stood, nothing more can be said than the prophet foretold in declaring the work of the Lord concerning them.'—Dr. Keith's Land of Israel. 5. Seek not Beth-el. Lord Lindsay's interpretation of this passage cannot stand. It is not a direction to a traveller not to search out its ruins, but a command to the idolatrous Israelites to give over their idolatry, that is to say, 'Seek not Bethel, but return to me.' Beth-el shall come to nought. This word has been fulfilled to the very letter. The shapeless ruins scattered over the brow of the hill are themselves silent witnesses of God's truth and faithfulness.—Narrative, p. 275. 15. Establish judgment in the gate. Supplementary Note, Matt. xvi. 18. 26. The star of your god. Supplementary Note, Num. xxiv. 17.

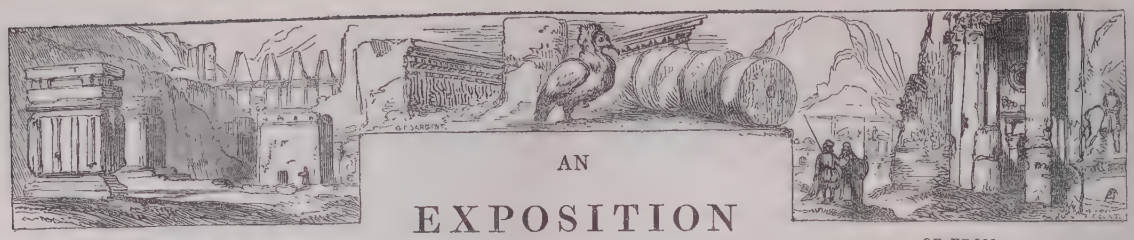
CHAP. VI.—1. Woe to them—that trust in the mountain of Samaria. Supplementary Note, 2 Kin. vi.; Obad. 19. 5. And invent to themselves instruments of musick, like David. On this passage we give the following extract from Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary, with no other view (though the true meaning is much controverted) than that our Wesleyan readers may know the opinion of an eminent minister of their body. After referring to his note on 1 Chr. xxiii. 5, and especially to his note on 2 Chr. xxix. 25, he adds, 'I believe that David was not authorized by the Lord to introduce that multitude of musical instruments into the Divine worship of which we read, and I am satisfied that his conduct in this respect is most solemnly reprehended by this prophet.' 'The late venerable and most eminent divine, the Rev. John Wesley,' he continues, 'who was a lover of music and an elegant poet, when asked his opinion of instruments of music being introduced into the chapels of the Methodists, said, "I have no objection to instruments of music in our chapels, provided they are neither heard nor seen." I say the same, though I think the expense of purchase had better be spared.'

CHAP. IX.—3. Hide—the top of Carmel. Supplementary Note, ch. i. 2. 8. I will destroy it from off the face of the earth—saving that I will not utterly destroy, &c. He intended to scatter the remnant of them through all nations and to harass them with manifold calamities, as the corn is shaken in the sieve, yet he would preserve all that were valuable of them with the most exact care, and not suffer one of them, however mean and inconsiderable, to perish. The astonishing preservation of the Jews as a distinct people through all their dispersions to the present day is here evidently predicted—the whole house of Jacob, the families brought out of Egypt being certainly intended, and not the ten tribes only.—Scott. 13—15. Behold the days come, &c. Not a few recent commentators consider these verses as referring to the restoration of the Jews to their own land, its increased fertility, and their perpetual occupation of it. See Supplementary Notes on Jer. xxiii., containing a collection of the passages from Scripture adduced by them in favour of this opinion. Dr. Henderson, in particular, gives a strong expression of his views to this effect: 'It is impossible, he says, 'to conceive of prophecy more distinctly or positively asserting the future and general restoration of the Jews to Canaan than that contained in these verses.' Hengstenberg, in his Christology, gives quite a different interpretation, coinciding in the main with that of M. Henry. Scott's views on this subject do not appear well defined; though every reader, whatever his opinion on these minor matters, will unite with him in prayer for 'the complete performance of these predictions in the more perfect peace, purity, and beauty of the church; in the increase of diligent, able, faithful, and successful ministers; in the ruin of all obstinate enemies, and in the conversion of Jews, Gentiles, and Mohammedans, to the faith of Christ. But only in heaven shall we be so planted and established as to experience no more changes, fears, temptations, sins or sorrows, for there alone is fulness of joy for evermore.'



DESOLATION OF EDOM.

AN

EXPOSITION

PROPHECY OF OBADIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THIS is the shortest of all the books of the Old Testament—the least of those tribes—and yet is not to be passed by, or thought meanly of; for this penny hath Cæsar's image and superscription upon it: it is stamped with a Divine authority. There may appear much of God in a short sermon, in a little book, and much good may be done by it; multum in parvo,—'much in a little.' Mr. Norris saith, 'If angels were to write books, we should have few folios.' That may be very precious which is not voluminous. This book is entitled "The vision of Obadiah." Who this Obadiah was doth not appear from any other Scripture. Some of the ancients imagined him to be the same with that Obadiah that was steward of Ahab's household, 1 Kin. xviii. 3; and if so, he that hid and fed the prophets had indeed a prophet's reward, when he was himself made a prophet. But that is a conjecture which has no ground. This Obadiah, it is probable, was of later date; some think contemporary with Hosea, Joel, and Amos; others think he lived about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, when the children of Edom so barbarously triumphed in that destruction. However, what he wrote was what he saw—it is his vision. Probably there was much more which he was Divinely inspired to speak, but this is all he was inspired to write; and all he writes is concerning Edom. It is a foolish fancy of some of the Jews that, because he prophesies only concerning Edom, he was himself an Edomite by birth, but a proselyte to the Jewish religion. Other prophets prophesied against Edom, and some of them seem to have borrowed from him, in their predictions against Edom, as Jer. xlix. 7, &c., Eze. xxv. 12, &c. Out of the mouth of these two or three witnesses every word will be established.

A.D. 3417. B.C. 587.

This book is wholly concerning Edom, a nation near allied and near adjoining to Israel, and yet an enemy to the seed of Jacob, inheriting the enmity of their father Esau to Jacob. Now here we have, after the preface, ver. 1. I. Threatenings against Edom. 1. That their pride should be humbled, ver. 2—4; 2. That their wealth should be plundered, ver. 5—7; 3. That their wisdom should be infatuated, ver. 8, 9; 4. That their spiteful carriage towards God's Israel should be avenged, ver. 10—16. II. Gracious promises to Israel, that they shall be restored and reformed, and shall be victorious over the Edomites, and become masters of their land and the lands of other their neighbours, ver. 18—20; and that the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, by the bringing in of the great salvation, ver. 21.

THE vision of Obadiah.
Thus saith the Lord GOD concerning Edom;
We have heard a rumour from the LORD,
And an ambassador is sent among the heathen,
Arise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle.
2 Behold, I have made thee small among the heathen:
Thou art greatly despised.
3 The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee,
Thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, whose habitation is high;
That saith in his heart, Who shall bring me down to the ground?
4 Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle,
And though thou set thy nest among the stars,
Thence will I bring thee down, saith the LORD.
5 If thieves came to thee, if robbers by night,
(How art thou cut off!)
Would they not have stolen till they had enough?
If the grapegatherers came to thee,
Would they not leave some grapes?
6 How are the things of Esau searched out!
How are his hidden things sought up!
7 All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border:
The men that were at peace with thee have deceived [thee,
And prevailed against thee;
They that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee:
There is none understanding in him.
8 Shall I not in that day, saith the LORD,
Even destroy the wise men out of Edom,
And understanding out of the mount of Esau?
9 And thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed,
To the end that every one of the mount of Esau
May be cut off by slaughter.

Edom is the nation against which this prophecy is levelled, and some think is put for all the enemies of Israel, that shall be brought down, first or last. The rabbins, by Edom, understand Rome,—Rome Christian they understand it of, and have an implacable enmity to it as such; but if we understand it of Rome antichristian, we shall find the passages of it applicable enough. And, though Edom was mortified in the times of the Maccabees, as it had been before by Jehoshaphat, yet its destruction seems to have been typical, as their father Esau's rejection, and to have farther reference to the destruction of the enemies of the gospel church; for so shall all God's enemies perish. And we find, Isa. xxxiv. 5, the sword of the Lord coming down upon Idumea, to signify the general day of God's recompences for the controversy of Zion, ver. 8. Some have well observed that it could not but be a great temptation to the people of Israel, when they saw themselves, who were the children of the beloved Jacob, in trouble, and the Edomites, the seed of hated Esau, not only prospering, but triumphing over them in their troubles; and therefore God gives them a prospect of the destruction of Edom, which should be total and final, and of a happy issue of their own correction. Now we may observe here,

First. A declaration of war against Edom; ver. 1, "We have heard a rumour," or rather an order from the Lord, the God of hosts. He hath given the word of command; it is his counsel and decree, which can neither be reversed nor resisted, that all that do mischief to his people shall certainly bring mischief upon themselves. We have heard a report that God is raised up out of his holy habitation, and is preparing his throne for judgment; and "an ambassador is sent among the heathen," a herald rather, some minister or messenger of providence to alarm the nations; or, the Lord's prophets, who gave each nation its burthen. Those whom God employs cry to each other, "Arise ye, stir up yourselves and one another," "and let us rise up against Edom in battle." The confederate forces under Nebuchadnezzar thus animate themselves and one another to make a descent upon that country; "Gather ye together and come against her," so it is in the parallel place, Jer. xlix. 14. Note, When God hath bloody work to do among the enemies of his church, he will find out and fit up both hands and hearts to do it.

Secondly. A prediction of the success of that war. Edom shall certainly be subdued, and spoiled, and brought down, for all her confidence shall fail her, and stand her in no stead; and in like manner shall all the enemies of God's church be disappointed in those things which they stayed themselves upon.

1. Do they depend upon their grandeur, the figure they make among the nations, their influence upon them, and interest in them? that shall dwindle; ver. 2, "Behold, I have made thee small among the heathen," so that none of thy neighbours will court thy friendship, or court an alliance with thee; thou art greatly despised among them, and looked upon with contempt as an infatuated and unfaithful nation. And thus, ver. 3, "The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee. Note, 1st. Those that think well of themselves are apt to fancy that others think well of them too; but when they come to make trial of them they will find themselves mistaken, and thus their pride deceives them, and by it slays them. 2nd. God can easily lay those low that have magnified and exalted themselves, and will find out a way to do it, for he resisteth the proud. And we often see those small and greatly despised, who, when time was, looked very big, and were greatly caressed and admired.

2. Do they depend upon the fortifications of their country, both by nature and art, and glory in the advantages they have thereby? Those also shall deceive them. They "dwelt in the clefts of the rock," as an eagle in her nest, and their habitation was high; not only exalted above their neighbours, which was the matter of their pride, but fortified against their enemies, which was the matter of their security; so high as to be out of the reach of danger. Now observe, 1st. What Edom saith in the pride of his heart; "Who shall bring me down to the ground?" He speaks with a confidence of his own strength, and a contempt of God's judgments, as if almighty power itself could not overpower him. As for "all his enemies," even God himself, "he puffeth at them," Ps. x. 5, sets them all at defiance. Their father Esau had sold his birthright, and yet they lift up themselves, as if to them had still pertained the "excellency of dignity and power." Many forfeit their privileges, and yet boast of them. Because Edom is high and lifted up he imagines none can bring him down. Note, Carnal security is a sin that most easily besets men in the day of their pomp, power, and prosperity, and doth as much as any thing both ripen men for ruin, and aggravate it when it comes. 2nd. What God saith to this, ver. 4. If men will dare to challenge omnipotence, their challenge shall be taken up. "Who shall bring me down?" saith Edom. "I will," saith God. "Though thou exalt thyself as an eagle," that soars high, and builds high; nay, "though thou set thy nest among the stars," higher than ever any eagle flew, it is but in thine own imagination, and "thence will I bring thee down." This we had Jer. xlix. 15, 16. Note, Sinners will certainly be made ashamed of their pride and security; of their pride when it has a fall, and of their security when their confidences fail their expectation.

3. Do they depend upon their wealth and treasure, the abundance of which is looked upon as the sinews of war? Is their money their defence? Is that their strong city? It is so but in their own conceit, for it shall rather expose them than protect them; it shall be made a prey to the enemy, and they for the sake of it, ver. 5, 6; much to this purpose we had, Jer. xlix. 9, 10; only here comes in, in a parenthesis, "How art thou cut off!" thou and all thy stores. The prophet foretells it, but laments it, that the thread of their prosperity was cut off. How art thou fallen, and how great is thy fall? How art thou stupified? so the Chaldee words it. How senseless art thou under these desolating judgments, as if they were but common strokes! But he shews that it should be an utter ruin, not a usual calamity; for, 1st. It is indeed a usual calamity for those that have wealth to have it stolen, and to lose a little out of their great deal. Thieves come to them,—for where the carcase is, there will the birds of prey be gathered together,—robbers come by night, and they steal till they have enough, what they have occasion for, what they have a mind of; they steal no more than they think they can carry away, and out of a great stock it is scarce missed. Those that rob orchards, or vineyards, carry off what they think fit, but they "leave some grapes," some fruits for the owner, who easily bears his loss, perhaps, and soon recruits it. But, 2nd. It shall not be so with Edom. His wealth shall be taken away, and nothing shall escape the hands of the destroying army, not that which is most precious and valuable; ver. 6, "How are the things of Esau," the things he sets his heart upon, and placeth his happiness in,—his good things, his best things,—how are these things, which were so carefully treasured up and concealed, now "searched out" by the enemy and seized! "How are his hidden things," his hid treasures, plundered, rifled, and "sought up!" his hoards, that had not seen the light of many years, are now a spoil to the enemy. Note, Treasures on earth, though never so fast locked up, and never so artfully hidden, yet cannot be so safely laid up but that thieves may break through and steal. It is therefore our wisdom to lay up for ourselves treasures in heaven.

4. Do they depend upon their alliances with neighbouring states and potentates? those also shall fail them; ver. 7, "The men of thy confederacy," all of them, the Ammonites and Moabites, and other thy high allies, that "were at peace with thee," that entered into a league offensive and defensive with thee, that solemnly engaged not only to do thee no hurt, but to do thee all the service they could. They did eat thy bread, were magnificently treated and entertained by thee, lived upon thee; their soldiers had free quarter in thy country, and took pay as thine auxiliaries. They have "brought thee even to the border" of thy land; were very respectful to thine ambassadors, and brought them on their way home, even to the utmost limits of their country. They seemed forward to serve thee with their forces when thou hadst occasion for them, and came along with thee to the border, till thou wast just ready to engage the invading enemy. But then, 1st. They have deceived thee. They flew back and retreated when thou wast in extremity, and proved as a broken reed to the traveller that is weary, and as the brooks in summer to the traveller that is thirsty; they bear no weight, yield no relief. Nay, 2nd. They have "prevailed against thee;" that is, they were too hard for thee in the treaty imposed upon thee, and by cheating thee ruined thee; brought thee into danger, and there left thee an easy prey to thine enemy. Note, Those that make flesh their arm arm it against them. Yet this was not the worst. 3rd. They have "laid a wound under thee;" that is, they have laid that under thee for a stay and support, for a foundation to rely on, for a pillow to repose on, which will prove a wound to thee, not as thorns only, but as swords. If God lay under us the arms of his power and love, these will be firm and easy under us,—the God of our covenant will never deceive us; but if we trust to the men of our confederacy, and what they will lay under us, it may prove to us a wound and dishonour. And observe the just censure here passed upon Edom for trusting to those who thus played tricks with him, "There is no understanding in him," or else he would never have put it into their power to betray him, by putting such a confidence in them. Note, Those shew they have no understanding in them who, when they are encouraged to trust in the Creator, put a cheat upon themselves by reposing a confidence in the creature.

5. Do they depend upon the politics of their counsellors? these shall fail them, ver. 8. Edom had been famous for great statesmen, men of learning and experience, that sat at the helm of government, and were masters of all the arts of management, that in all treaties used to outwit their neighbours; but now the counsellors are become fools, and the wise God makes them so. "Shall I not in that day destroy the wise men out of Edom?" as men they shall fall by the sword in common with others, Ps. xlix. 10, and their wisdom shall not secure them. As wise men, they shall be infatuated in all their counsels; their best laid designs shall be baffled, their measures broken, and those very projects by which they thought to establish themselves and the public interests shall be the ruin of both. Thus "wisdom perished from Teman," as it is in the parallel place, Jer. xlix. 7. This was, 1st. The just punishment of their folly in trusting to an arm of flesh. "There is no understanding in them," ver. 7. They have no sense to trust in a living God, and a God of truth, but put confidence in men that are frail, fickle, and false, and therefore God will destroy their understanding. Note, God will justly deny those understanding to keep out of the way of danger that will not use their understanding to keep out of the way of sin. He that will be foolish, let him be foolish still. 2nd. It was the forerunner of their destruction. A nation is then marked for ruin when God hides the things that belong to its peace from the eyes of those that are intrusted with its counsels. Quos Deus vult perdere eos dementat,—'God infatuates those whom he designs to destroy.' Job xii. 17.

6. Do they depend upon the strength and courage of their soldiers? They are not only able-bodied, but men of spirit and courage, that can face an enemy and stand their ground; but now, ver. 9, "Thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed," their courage shall fail them, "to the end that every one of the mount of Esau may be cut off by slaughter," and none escape. The weak, and feeble, and unarmed, must fall of course into the hand of the destroyer, when the mighty men are dismayed, and not only lose the day, but lose their lives, because they have lost their spirits. "Howl, fir-trees, if the cedars be shaken." Note, The death or disuniting of the mighty oft proves the death and destruction of the many; and it is in vain to depend upon mighty men for our protection, if we have not an almighty God for us, much less if we have an almighty God against us.

10 For thy violence against thy brother Jacob shame shall
And thou shalt be cut off for ever. [cover thee,
11 In the day that thou stoodest on the other side,
In the day that the strangers carried away captive his
And foreigners entered into his gates, [forces,
And cast lots upon Jerusalem, even thou wast as one of them. [brother
12 But thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy
In the day that he became a stranger;
Neither shouldest thou have rejoiced over the children of
In the day of their destruction; [Judah
Neither shouldest thou have spoken proudly in the day of distress. [people
13 Thou shouldest not have entered into the gate of my
In the day of their calamity;
Yea, thou shouldest not have looked on their affliction
In the day of their calamity,
Nor have laid hands on their substance in the day of their calamity;
14 Neither shouldest thou have stood in the crossway,
To cut off those of his that did escape;
Neither shouldest thou have delivered up those of his
That did remain in the day of distress.
15 For the day of the LORD is near upon all the heathen:
As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee:
Thy reward shall return upon thine own head.
16 For as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain,
So shall all the heathen drink continually,
Yea, they shall drink, and they shall swallow down,
And they shall be as though they had not been.

When we have read Edom's doom, no less than utter ruin, it is natural to ask, Why, what evil hath he done? What is the ground of God's controversy with him? Many things, no doubt, were amiss in Edom; they were a sinful people, and a people laden with iniquity. But that one single crime which is laid to their charge, as filling their measure, and bringing this ruin upon them,—that for which they here stand indicted, of which they are convicted, and for which they are condemned,—is the injuries and wrongs they had done to the people of God; ver. 10, it is for "thy violence against thy brother Jacob," that ancient and hereditary grudge which thou hast borne to the people of Israel, that is it for which all this "shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off for ever." Note, Injuries to men are affronts to God, the righteous God that loveth righteousness and hateth wickedness; and, as the Judge of all the earth, will give right to those that suffer wrong, and take vengeance on those that do wrong. All violence, all unrighteousness, is sin; but it is a great aggravation of the violence if it be done either, 1st. Against any of our own people. It is violence against thy brother, thy near relation, to whom thou shouldest be a goel, a redeemer; whom it is thy duty to right if others wronged him. How wicked is it then for thee thyself to wrong him! Thou slanderest and abusest thine own mother's son; this makes the sin exceeding sinful, Ps. l. 20. Or, 2nd. Much more if it be done against any of God's people. It is thy brother Jacob that is in covenant with God, and dear to him. Thou hatest him whom God has loved, and because God hath loved him; him whose cause God espouseth, and will plead with jealousy; and in whose interests God is pleased so far to interest himself, as that he takes the violence done to him as done to himself: "Whoso toucheth Jacob, toucheth the apple of the eye of Jacob's God." So that it is crimen læsæ majestatis,—'high treason,' for which let Edom expect an ignominious punishment; "Shame shall cover thee," and a ruining one; "Thou shalt be cut off for ever." In the following verses we are told more particularly,

First. What the violence was which Edom did against his brother Jacob, and what are the proofs of this charge. It doth not appear that the Edomites did themselves invade Israel, but that was more for want of power than will; they had malice enough to do it, but were not a match for them. But that which is laid to their charge is, their barbarous carriage towards Judah and Jerusalem when they were in distress and ready to be destroyed, probably by the Chaldeans, or upon occasion of other calamities of the Jews; for this seems to have been always their temper towards them. See this charged upon the Edomites, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, that "in the day of Jerusalem they said, Rase it, rase it," and Eze. xxv. 21. They are here told particularly what they did, by being told what they should not have done; ver. 12—14, "Thou shouldest not have looked," thou "shouldest not have entered;" but thou didst so. Note, In reflecting upon ourselves, it is good to compare what we have done with what we should have done, our practice with the rule, that we may discover wherein we have done amiss, have "done those things which we ought not to have done;" we should not have been where we were at such a time, should not have been in such and such company, should not have said what we said, nor have taken the liberty that we took. Sin thus looked upon in the glass of the commandment will appear exceeding sinful. Let us see,

1. What was the case of Judah and Jerusalem when the Edomites behaved themselves thus basely, and insulted over them. 1st. It was a day of distress with them, ver. 12; it was "the day of their calamity," so it is called three times, ver. 13. With the Edomites it was a day of prosperity and peace, when with the Israelites it was a day of distress and calamity, for judgment commonly begins at the house of God. Children are corrected when strangers are let alone. 2nd. It was "the day of their destruction," ver. 12, when both city and country were laid waste, were laid in ruins. 3rd. It was a day when foreigners entered into the gates of Jerusalem, when the city, after a long siege, was broken up, and the great officers of the king of Babylon's army came and sat in the gates, as judges of the land; when they cast lots upon the spoils of Jerusalem, as the soldiers on Christ's garments, what share each of the conquerors should have, what share of the lands, what share of the goods; or cast lots to determine themselves when and where they should attack it. 4th. It was a day when the "strangers carried away captive his forces," ver. 11, took the men of war prisoners of war, and carried them off in poverty and shame to their own country. Or, such a multitude of captives that they were as an army. 5th. It was a day when thy brother himself, that had been long at home, at rest in his own land, became a stranger, an exile in a strange land. Now when this was the woful case of the Jews, the Edomites, their neighbours and brethren, should have pitied them and helped them, condoled them and comforted them, and should have trembled to think that their own turn would come next; for "if this were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" But,

2. See what was the carriage of the Edomites towards them when they were in this distress, for which they are here condemned. 1st. They looked with pleasure upon the affliction of God's people. They "stood on the other side," ver. 11, afar off, when they should have come in to the relief of their distressed neighbours; and looked upon them, and their day, "looked on their affliction," ver. 12, 13, with a careless, unconcerned eye, as the priest and Levite looked upon the wounded man, and passed by on the other side. Those have a great deal to answer for that are idle spectators of the troubles and afflictions of their neighbours, when they are capable of being their active helpers. But this was not all; they looked upon it with a scornful eye, with an eye of complacency and satisfaction; they looked and laughed to see Israel in distress, saying, "Aha! so would we have it." They fed their eyes with the rueful spectacle of Jerusalem's ruins, and looked at it as those that had long looked for it, and often wished to see it. Note, We must take heed with what eye we look upon the afflictions of our brethren, and if we cannot look upon them with a gracious eye of sympathy and tenderness, it is better not to look upon them at all. "Thou shouldest not have looked" as thou didst "upon the day of thy brother." 2nd. They triumphed and insulted over them, upbraided their brethren with their sorrows, and made themselves and their companions merry with them. They "rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction." They had not the good manners to conceal the pleasure they took in Judah's destruction, and to dissemble it, but openly declared it, and rudely and insolently declared it to them; they rejoiced over them, crowed and hectored, and trampled upon them. Those have the spirit of Edomites that can rejoice over any, especially of Israelites, in the day of their calamity. 3rd. They spoke proudly, 'magnified the mouth,' so the word is, against Israel; talked with a great disdain of the suffering Israelites, and with an air of haughtiness of the present safety and prosperity of Edom; as if it might be inferred from their present different state that the tables were turned, and now Esau were beloved, and the favourite of heaven, and Jacob hated and rejected. Note, Those must expect to be some way or other effectually humbled and mortified themselves that are puffed up and made proud by the humiliations and mortifications of others. 4th. They went farther yet, for they entered into the gate of God's people, in the day of their calamity, and laid hands on their substance. Though they did not help to conquer them they helped to plunder them, and put in for a share in the prey, ver. 13. Jerusalem was thrown open, and then they entered it; its wealth was thrown about, and they seized it for themselves, excusing it with this, that they had as good take it as let it be lost; whereas it was taking what was not their own. Babylon lays Jerusalem waste, but Edom, by meddling with the spoil, becomes particeps criminis,—'partaker of the crime,' and shall be reckoned with as an accessary ex post facto,—'after the fact.' Note, These do but impoverish themselves that think to enrich themselves by the ruins of the people of God; and those deceive themselves who think they may call all that substance their own which they can lay their hands on in a day of calamity. 5th. They did yet worse things; they not only robbed their brethren, but murdered them, in the day of their calamity; laid hands not only on their substance, but on their persons, ver. 14. When the victorious sword of the Chaldeans was making bloody work among the Jews, many made their escape, and were in a fair way to save themselves by flight, but the Edomites basely interrupted them, stood in the cross-way where several roads met, by each of which the trembling Israelites were making the best of their way from the fury of the pursuers, and there they stopped them. Some they barbarously and coward-like cut off themselves; others they took prisoners, and delivered up to the pursuers, only to ingratiate themselves with them because they were now the conquerors. They should not have been thus cruel to those that lay at their mercy, and never had done, nor were ever likely to do, them any hurt,—should not have betrayed those whom they had such a fair opportunity to protect; but such are the tender mercies of the wicked. One cannot read this without a high degree of compassion towards those that were thus basely abused, that when they fled from the sword of an open enemy, and thought they were got out of the reach of it, fell upon and fell by the sword of a treacherous neighbour, that they were not apprehensive of any danger from; nor without a high degree of indignation towards those that were so perfectly lost to all humanity as to exercise such cruelty upon such proper objects of compassion. 6th. In all this they joined with the open enemies and persecutors of Israel. Even thou wast as one of them, an accessary equally guilty with the principals. He that joins in with evil-doers, and is aiding and abetting in their evil deeds, shall be reckoned, and shall be reckoned with, as one of them.

Secondly, What the shame is that shall cover them for this violence of theirs.

1. They shall soon find that the cup is going round, even the cup of trembling; and when they come to be in the same calamitous condition that the Israel of God is now in, they will be ashamed to remember how they triumphed over them; ver. 15, "The day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen," when God will recompense tribulation to the troublers of his church. Though judgment begin at the house of God, it shall not end there. This should effectually restrain us from triumphing over others in their misery, that we know not how soon it may be our own case.

2. Their enmity to the people of God, and the injuries they have done them, shall be recompensed into their own bosoms; "As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee." The righteous God will render both to nations and to particular persons according to their works; and the punishment is often made exactly to answer the sin, and those that have abused others come to be themselves abused in like manner. The just and jealous God will find out a time and way to avenge the wrong done to his people on those that have been injurious to them. And, ver. 16, "As ye have drunk upon my holy mountain;" that is, as God's professing people, who inhabit his holy mountain, have drunk deep of the cup of affliction, and their being of the holy mountain will not excuse them, so shall all the heathen drink in their turn of the same bitter cup; for if God bring evil on the city that is called by his name, shall they be unpunished that never knew his name? see Jer. xxv. 29; and it is part of the burthen of Edom, Jer. xlix. 12, "They whose judgment was not to drink of the cup;" that is, who had reason to promise themselves an exemption from it, have assuredly drunken, and shall Edom go unpunished that is the generation of God's wrath? No, "Thou shalt surely drink of it;" the "cup of trembling shall be taken out of the hand" of God's people, and put "into the hand of them that afflict them," Isa. li. 22, 23. Nay, they may expect their case to be worse in the day of their distress than that of Israel was in their day. For, 1st. The afflictions of God's people were but for a moment, and soon had an end; but their enemies shall "drink continually the wine of God's wrath," Rev. xiv. 10. 2nd. The dregs of the cup are reserved for "the wicked of the earth," Ps. lxxv. 8; they shall "drink and swallow down," or sup up, as the margin reads it, shall drink it to the bottom. 3rd. The people of God, though they may be made to drink of the "wine of astonishment" for awhile, Ps. lx. 3, yet they shall recover it, and come to themselves again; but the heathen shall drink and be "as though they had not been;" that is, there shall be neither any remains nor any remembrance of them, but they shall be wholly extirpated and rooted out. "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord;" so they shall perish if they turn not.

17 But upon mount Zion shall be deliverance,
And there shall be holiness;
And the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions.
18 And the house of Jacob shall be a fire;
And the house of Joseph a flame,
And the house of Esau for stubble,
And they shall kindle in them, and devour them;
And there shall not be any remaining of the house of
For the LORD hath spoken it. [Esau;
19 And they of the south shall possess the mount of Esau;
And they of the plain the Philistines:
And they shall possess the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria:
And Benjamin shall possess Gilead.
20 And the captivity of this host of the children of Israel
Shall possess that of the Canaanites, even unto Zarephath;

ZAREPHATH.

And the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad,
Shall possess the cities of the south.
21 And saviours shall come up on mount Zion
To judge the mount of Esau;
And the kingdom shall be the LORD's.

After the destruction of the church's enemies is threatened, which will be completely accomplished in the great day of recompence, and that judgment for which Christ came once, and will come again, into this world, here follow precious promises of the salvation of the church, with which this prophecy concludes, as those of Joel and Amos did; which, however they might be in part fulfilled in the return of the Jews out of Babylon, notwithstanding the triumphs of Edom in their captivity, as if it were perpetual, yet, doubtless, they are to have their accomplishment in that great salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ, to which all the prophets bare witness. It is promised here,

First. That there shall be salvation upon mount Zion, that holy hill where God sets his anointed king, Ps. ii. 6; "Upon mount Zion shall be deliverance," ver. 17. There shall be those that escape; so the margin. A remnant of Israel, upon the holy mountain, shall be saved, ver. 16. Christ said, "Salvation is of the Jews," Jno. iv. 22. God wrought deliverances for the Jews, typical of our redemption by Christ. But mount Zion is the gospel church, from thence the New Testament law went forth, Isa. ii. 3; there salvation shall be preached and prayed for. To the gospel church those are added that shall be saved; and those who come in faith and hope to this mount Zion, for them deliverance shall be wrought from wrath and the curse, from sin, and death, and hell, while those that continue afar off shall be left to perish.

Secondly. That where is salvation there shall be sanctification in order to it. And "there shall be holiness," to prepare and qualify the children of Zion for this deliverance; for, wherever God designs glory he gives grace. Temporal deliverances are then wrought for us in mercy when with them there is holiness; when there is wrought in us a disposition to receive them with love and gratitude to God; when we are sanctified, they are sanctified to us. Holiness is itself a great deliverance, and an earnest of that eternal salvation which we look for. There, upon mount Zion, in the gospel church, shall be holiness, for that is it which becomes God's house for ever; and the great design of the Gospel and its grace is to plant and promote holiness. There shall be the Holy Spirit, the holy ordinances, the holy Jesus, and a select remnant of holy souls, in whom and among whom the holy God will delight to dwell. Note, Where there is holiness there shall be deliverance.

Thirdly. That this salvation and sanctification shall spread and prevail, and get ground in the world. The house of Jacob, even this mount Zion, with the deliverance and the holiness there wrought, shall possess their possessions; that is, the gospel church shall be set up among the heathen, and shall replenish the earth. The apostles of Christ by their preaching shall gain possession of the hearts of men for him whose messengers and ministers they are; and when they possess their hearts they shall possess their possessions, for those who have given up themselves to the Lord give up all they have to him. When Lydia's heart was opened to Christ her house was opened to his ministers. When the Gentile nations became "nations of them that were saved," were discipled, walked in the light of the Lord, and "brought their glory and honour into the New Jerusalem," Rev. xxi. 24, then the house of Jacob possessed their possessions. This is in part fulfilled by the planting of the Christian religion in the world; and shall be fulfilled yet more and more by the setting up of Christ's throne there where Satan's seat is, and the erecting of the trophies of his victory upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom. Now here is foretold,

1. How this possession shall be gained, and the opposition given to it got over; ver. 18, "The house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame," for their God is and will be a consuming fire; and the house of Esau shall be for stubble, easily devoured and consumed by this fire. This is fulfilled, 1st. In the conversion of multitudes by the grace of Christ. The Gospel preached in the house of Jacob and Joseph, and there owned and professed, shall be as a fire and a flame to melt and soften hard hearts, to burn up the dross of sin and corruption, that they may be purified and refined with the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning. Christ, when he comes, shall be "as a refiner's fire," Mal. iii. 1, 2. 2nd. In the confusion of all the impenitent, implacable enemies of the Gospel of Christ, that oppose it and do all they can to hinder the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah by it. The gospel day is a day that "burns like an oven," in which "all the proud, and all that do wickedly, shall be as stubble," Mal. iv. 1. Jacob and Joseph shall be as a fire and a flame; for those that meddle with them to do them hurt will find it at their peril; they shall be to them as a torch of fire in a sheaf, Zec. xii. 6. The word of God in the mouth of his ministers is said to be like fire, and the people "as wood to be devoured" by it, Jer. v. 14; and the man of sin is to be consumed by the "breath of Christ's mouth," 2 Thes. ii. 8. Those that are not refined as gold by the fire of the Gospel shall be consumed as dross by it, for it will be a savour either of life or death. When idols and idolatry were abolished, and the wealth and power of the nations were brought into the service of Christ and his Gospel, and the spoils of the strong man armed were divided by him that was stronger than he, then the house of Jacob and Joseph devoured the house of Esau, so that there was none of them left remaining. This the Lord spoke by his prophets, and this he did by his apostles.

2. How far this possession shall extend, ver. 19, 20. This is described in Jewish language, which speaks the accessions made to the land of Israel, after the return out of captivity in Babylon. "The captivity of this host of Israel," that is, this host of Israel that has been so long in captivity, and now they are come back are still called the children of the captivity, these shall not only recover their own land, but shall gain ground upon their neighbours adjoining to them, some of whom shall become proselytes, and shall incorporate with the Jews, who, by possessing them in a holy communion, possess their land. We must reckon ourselves truly enriched by the conversion of our neighbours to the fear of God and the faith of Christ, and their coming to join with us in the worship of God. Such an accession to our Christian communion we must reckon to be more our wealth and strength than an accession to our estates. Or, the ancient inhabitants of those lands that were carried away into captivity being lost, and never returning to their estates, the children of Israel shall take possession of that which lies next them; for their numbers shall so increase that their own land shall be too strait for them, and their neighbours' estates shall escheat to them, ob defectum sanguinis,—'through default of heirs;' they shall enter upon that which is adjoining to them. The country of Esau shall be possessed by them of the south parts of Canaan, for to them it lies contiguous. "They of the plain," on the west of Canaan, which was a champaign country, shall enter upon the land of the Philistines, their neighbours. They of Judah, which was the chief of the two returning tribes, shall possess the field of Ephraim and Samaria, which before belonged to the ten tribes; and Benjamin, the other tribe, shall possess Gilead on the other side Jordan, which had belonged to the two tribes and a half. The kingdom of Israel shall join with that of Judah, both in civil and sacred interests, and as friends and brethren shall mutually possess and enjoy one another; and both together shall possess the Canaanites, even to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon; and Jerusalem shall possess the cities of the south, even to Sepharad. Thus did the Jews enlarge their borders on all sides. The modern rabbins teach their scholars, by Zarephath and Sepharad, to understand France and Spain, grounding upon this a foolish, groundless expectation, that some time or other the Jews shall be masters of those countries; and they call and count the Christians Edomites, over whom they are to have dominion. But the promise here, no doubt, has a spiritual signification, and had its accomplishment in the setting up of the Christian church, the gospel Israel, in the world, and shall have its accomplishment more and more in the enlargement of it, and the additions made to it, till the mystical body is completed. When ministers and Christians prevail with their neighbours to come to Christ, to yield themselves to the Lord, they possess them. The converts that Abraham made are said to be the "souls that he had gotten," Gen. xii. 5. The possession is gained, not vi et armis,—'by force of arms,' for "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal," but spiritual. It is by the preaching of the Gospel, and the power of Divine grace given along with it, that this possession is got and kept.

Fourthly. That the kingdom of the Redeemer should be erected and maintained, to the comfort of his loyal subjects, and the terror and shame of all his enemies; ver. 21, "The kingdom shall be the Lord's," the Lord Christ's; God shall give it him, by putting all things into his hand, all power both in heaven and in earth. Men shall give it him, by resigning themselves to him as his willing people, and appointing him their head. Now the work of kings is to protect their subjects and suppress their enemies; and this Christ will do, he will both reward and punish.

1. The mountain of Zion shall be saved. On it saviours shall come, the preachers of the Gospel, who are called saviours, because their business is to save themselves and those that hear them; and in this they are workers together with Christ, but to little purpose, if he by his grace did not work together with them.

2. The mountain of Esau shall be judged, and the same that come as saviours on mount Zion shall judge the mountain of Esau, for the word of the Gospel in their mouth that saves believers judgeth unbelievers, convinceth and condemns them. Christ's ministers are "saviours on mount Zion," when they preach that "he that believes shall be saved;" but they judge the mount of Esau, when they preach that "he that believeth not shall be damned," which they are not only commissioned, but commanded to do, Mar. xvi. 16. And in the course of God's providence his Scripture is fulfilled; when God raiseth up friends to the church in her distress, as he raised up judges to deliver Israel of old, Jud. ii. 16, then "saviours come on mount Zion," to save it from being sunk and ruined. And when the enemies of the church are brought down, and their power broken, then is the mount of Esau judged; and this shall be done in every age, in such a way as God thinks best. We may depend upon it that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church, but the church shall prevail against them; for the "kingdom shall be the Lord's," the kingdoms of the world shall become his, and he has taken and will take to himself his great power and reign.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF OBADIAH.

VER. 17, 18.—Of the house of Esau.—Supplementary Note on Isa. xxxiv. 19. The plain. An immense undulating plain was stretched before us, lying north and south, and of vast breadth east and west. There were few trees, but it was covered with fields of yellow grain, and studded with a goodly number of little towns, the remains of other days. In the background, the beautiful hill country of Judah rose tier above tier, and the sun, which was just rising above them, poured a flood of golden rays into the plain. This is the great plain of Cephela, called "the plain."—Narrative, 153. Referring to Zarephath, in ver. 20, (alluded to also in 1 Kin. xvii. 9, and under the name of Sarepta, in Lu. iv. 26,) now called Sarpend, it is described in the same work as formerly spread towards the shore, but now upon the heights, about a mile from the shore, and as a village pleasantly situated upon the steep brow, overhanging a ravine filled with fine olive trees, and commanding a wide view. In the rocks along the foot of the hills Dr. Robinson found many excavated tombs, which he considers to have once belonged to this ancient city.—Palestine, iii. 414. They shall possess the fields of Samaria. Dr. Keith, in his interesting work, The Land of Israel, adopting the opinion referred to in Supplementary Note on Jer. xxiii., and Amos ix. 13, &c., respecting the restoration of the Jews to that land, gives many striking illustrations of its capability to sustain them, (especially with the limits which he assigns to it,) describing its former fertility and cultivation, and stating that, though now so greatly desolate, it will hereafter be made eminently fruitful. He quotes Dr. Robinson, who says, 'Even in these parts, where all is now desolate, as in the rugged sloping mountains between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, which present nothing but an aspect of dreary desolation, there are everywhere traces of the hands of the men of other days—terraces, walls, stones gathered along the paths, frequent cisterns, and the like. Most of the hills exhibit the remains of terraces built up around them, the undoubted sites of former cultivation.'—Robinson and Smith, ii. 187. The city of Samaria, situated on an oblong isolated hill, at the head of the great valley, trusted in its strength, and gloried in its riches. Purchased, as was the hill on which it stood, by Omri of Shemer, it is reserved, like all the mountains of Samaria, and the land over which they look, as the free gift of the Lord to his people Israel. The beasts of the field, according to the word of the Lord, now feed on the grassy terraces which encircle the hill, like beds of down all ready for cultivation, but like those around it, whose terraced sides formed hanging gardens beautifully closing in the rich valley, they are yet reserved for their primitive use, and for their ancient occupants; for in the same chapter in which the prophet announces the new covenant which the Lord will make with the house of Israel, and the house of Judah, it is written, "Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria: the planters shall plant, and shall eat them as common things," Jer. xxxi. 5.—The Land of Israel, 436. Whatever may be our opinion of it, we think it right to give the interpretation put on this and other passages of Scripture by esteemed authors entertaining the views to which allusion has been made.

AN

EXPOSITION

PROPHECY OF JONAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THIS book of Jonah, though it be placed here in the midst of the prophetical books of Scripture, yet it is rather a history than a prophecy. One line of prediction there is in it, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown;" the rest of the book is a narrative of the preface to, and the consequences of, that prediction. In the midst of the obscure prophecies before and after this book, wherein are many things dark and hard to be understood, which are puzzling to the learned, and are strong meat for strong men, comes in this plain and pleasant story, which is entertaining to the weakest, and milk for babes. Probably Jonah was himself the penman of this book, and he, as Moses, and other inspired penmen, records his own faults, which is an evidence that in these writings they designed God's glory, and not their own. We read of this same Jonah, 2 Kin. xiv. 25, where we find that he was of Gath-hepher in Galilee, a city that belongs to the tribe of Zebulun, in a remote corner of the land of Israel; for the Spirit, which, like the wind, "blows where it listeth," will as easily find out Jonah in Galilee as Isaiah at Jerusalem. We find also that he was a messenger of mercy to Israel, in the reign of Jeroboam the Second; for the success of his arms in the restoring of the coast of Israel is said to be "according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by the hands of his servant Jonah the prophet." Those prophecies were not committed to writing, but this against Nineveh was, chiefly for the sake of the story that depends upon it, and that is recorded chiefly for the sake of Christ, of whom Jonah was a type. It contains also very remarkable instances of human infirmity in Jonah, and of God's mercy, both in pardoning repenting sinners, witness Nineveh, and in bearing with repining saints, witness Jonah.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. A command given to Jonah to go preach at Nineveh, ver. 1, 2. II. Jonah's disobedience to that command, ver. 3. III. The pursuit and arrest of him for that disobedience by a storm, in which he was asleep, ver. 4—6. IV. The discovery of him, and his disobedience, to be the cause of the storm, ver. 7—10. V. The casting of him into the sea for the stilling of the storm, ver. 11—16. VI. The miraculous preservation of his life there in the belly of a fish, ver. 17, which was his reservation for farther services.

NOW the word of the LORD came unto Jonah the son of Amittai, saying, 2 Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me. 3 But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the LORD, and went down to Joppa; and he found a ship going to Tarshish: so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish from the presence of the LORD.

First. The honour God put upon Jonah in giving him a commission to go and prophesy against Nineveh. Jonah signifies a dove, a proper name for all God's prophets, all his people, who ought to be harmless as doves, and to mourn as doves for the sins and calamities of the land. His father's name was Amittai, 'my truth,' for God's prophets should be the sons of truth. To him "the word of the Lord came," 'to him it was,' so the word signifies; for God's word is a real thing; men's words are but wind, God's words are substance. He had been before acquainted with the word of the Lord, and knew his voice from that of a stranger. The orders now given him were, "Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city," ver. 2. Nineveh was at this time the metropolis of the Assyrian monarchy, an eminent city, Gen. x. 11; a great city, that great city, forty-eight miles in compass, some make it much more; great in the number of the inhabitants, as appears by the multitudes of infants in it, ch. iv. 11; great in wealth, there was no end of its store, Nah. ii. 9; great in power and dominion, it was the city that for some time ruled over the kings of the earth. But great cities, as well as great men, are under God's government and judgment. It was a great city, and yet a heathen city, without the knowledge and worship of the true God. How many great cities and great nations are there that "sit in darkness, and in the valley of the shadow of death!" This great city was a wicked city; "Their wickedness is come up before me," their malice, so some read it; their wickedness was presumptuous, and they sinned with a high hand. It is sad to think what a great deal of sin is committed in great cities, where there are many sinners, who are not only all sinners, but making one another sin. Their wickedness is come up, that is, it is come to a high degree, to the highest pitch; the measure of it is full to the brim; their wickedness is come up, and then it is time for vengeance to come down. Or, "the cry of their wickedness is come up," as that of Sodom, Gen. xviii. 20, 21; it is come up before me, to my face, so the word is; it is a bold and open affront to God. It is sinning against him, in his sight, therefore Jonah must cry against it; he must witness against their great wickedness, and must warn them of the destruction that was coming upon them for it. God is coming forth against it, and he sends Jonah before to proclaim war and to sound an alarm, Cry aloud, spare not; he must not whisper his message in a corner, but publish it in the streets of Nineveh. He that has ears to hear let him hear what God has to say by his prophet against that wicked city; when the cry of sin comes up to God, the cry of vengeance comes out against the sinner. He must go to Nineveh, and cry there upon the spot, against the wickedness of it. Other prophets were ordered to send messages to the neighbour nations, and the prophecy of Nahum is particularly the burthen of Nineveh; but Jonah must go and carry the message himself. Arise quickly, apply thyself to the business with speed and courage, and the resolution that becomes a prophet, "Arise, and go to Nineveh." Those that go on God's errands must rise and go, must stir up themselves to the work cut out for them. The prophets were sent first to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet not to them only; they had the children's bread, but Nineveh eats of the crumbs.

Secondly. The dishonour Jonah did to God, in refusing to obey his orders, and to go on the errand on which he was sent; ver. 3, "But Jonah," instead of rising to go to Nineveh, "rose up to flee to Tarshish," to the sea, not bound for any port, but desirous to get away "from the presence of the Lord;" and, if he might but do that, he cared not whither he went, not as if he thought he could go any where from under the eye of God's inspection, but from his special presence, from the spirit of prophecy, which, when it put him upon this work, he thought himself haunted with, and coveted to get out of the hearing of. Some think Jonah went upon the opinion of some of the Jews, that the spirit of prophecy was confined to the land of Israel, (which in Ezekiel and Daniel was effectually proved to be a mistake,) and therefore he hoped he should get clear of it if he could but get out of the borders of that land. 1. Jonah would not go to Nineveh to cry against it, either because it was a long and dangerous journey thither, and in a road he knew not; or, because he was afraid it would be as much as his life was worth to deliver such an ungrateful message to that great and potent city. He consulted with flesh and blood, and declined the embassy, because he could not go with safety; or, because he was jealous for the prerogative of his country, and not willing that any other nation should share in the honour of Divine revelation. He feared it would be the beginning of the removal of the kingdom of God from the Jews to another nation, that would bring forth more of the fruits of it. He owns himself, ch. iv. 2, that the reason of his aversion to this journey was because he foresaw that the Ninevites would repent, and God would forgive them, and take them into favour, which would be a slur upon the people of Israel, who had been so long a peculiar people to God. 2. He therefore went to Tarshish, to Tarsus in Cilicia, so some, probably because he had friends and relations there, with whom he hoped for some time to sojourn. He went to Joppa, a famous seaport in the land of Israel, in quest of a ship bound for Tarshish, and there he found one. Providence seemed to favour his design, and give him an opportunity to escape. We may be out of the way of duty, and yet may meet with a favourable gale. The ready way is not always the right way. He found the ship just ready to weigh anchor perhaps, and to hoist sail for Tarshish, and so he lost no time; but perhaps therefore he went to Tarshish because he found the ship going thither; otherwise all places were alike to him. He did not think himself out of his way, the way he would go, provided he was not in his way, the way he should go. "So he paid the fare thereof," for he would not stick at the charge, so he could but gain his point, and get at a distance "from the presence of the Lord;" he went with them, with the mariners, with the passengers, with the merchants, whoever they were, that were going to Tarshish. Jonah, forgetting his dignity, as well as duty, herded himself with them, and went down into the ship to go with them to Tarshish. See what the best of men are when God leaves them to themselves; and what need we have, when the word of the Lord comes to us, to have the Spirit of the Lord come along with the word, to bring every thought within us into obedience to it. The prophet Isaiah owns that therefore he "was not rebellious, neither turned away back," because God not only spake to him, but "opened his ear," Isa. l. 5. Let us learn hence to cease from man, and not to be too confident either of ourselves or others in a time of trial, but "let him that thinks he stands take heed lest he fall."

4 But the LORD sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken. 5 Then the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god, and cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them. But Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship; and he lay, and was fast asleep. 6 So the shipmaster came to him, and said unto him, What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not. 7 And they said every one to his fellow, Come, and let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this evil is upon us. So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah. 8 Then said they unto him, Tell us, we pray thee, for whose cause this evil is upon us; What is thine occupation? and whence comest thou? what is thy country? and of what people art thou? 9 And he said unto them, I am an Hebrew; and I fear the LORD, the God of heaven, which hath made the sea and the dry land. 10 Then were the men exceedingly afraid, and said unto him, Why hast thou done this? For the men knew that he fled from the presence of the LORD, because he had told them.

When Jonah was set on shipboard, and under sail for Tarshish, he thought himself safe enough; but here we find him pursued and overtaken, discovered and convicted as a deserter from God, as one that had run from his colours.

First. God sends a pursuivant after him, "a mighty tempest in the sea," ver. 4. God has the "winds in his treasuries," Ps. cxxxv. 7; and out of these treasuries God sent forth, he cast forth, so the word is, with force and violence, "a great wind into the sea;" even "stormy winds fulfil his word," and are often the messengers of his wrath. He "gathers the winds in his fist," Pr. xxx. 4, where he holds them, and whence he squeezeth them when he pleaseth; for though as to us the wind blows where it listeth, yet not as to God, but where he directs. The effect of this wind was a mighty tempest; for when the winds rise the waves rise. Note, Sin bring storms and tempests in the soul, in the family, in churches, and nations; it is a disquieting, disturbing thing. The tempest prevailed to that degree that "the ship was like to be broken," the mariners expected no other; that ship, so some read it, that and no other. Other ships were upon the same sea at the same time, yet it should seem that ship in which Jonah was was tossed more than any other, and was more in danger. This wind was sent after Jonah to fetch him back again to God and to his duty, and it is a great mercy to be reclaimed and called home when we go astray, though it be by a tempest.

Secondly. The ship's crew were alarmed by this mighty tempest, but Jonah only, the person concerned, was unconcerned, ver. 5. The mariners were affected with their danger, though it was not with them that God had this controversy.

1. They were afraid. Though, their business leading them to be very much conversant with dangers of this kind, they used to make light of them, yet now the oldest and stoutest of them began to tremble, being apprehensive that there was something more than ordinary in the tempest, so suddenly did it rise, so strongly did it rage. Note, God can strike a terror upon the most daring, and make even great men and chief captains call for shelter from rocks and mountains.

2. They "cried every man unto his god." This was the effect of their fear; many will not be brought to prayer till they are frightened to it; he that would learn to pray, let him go to sea, "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee." Every man of them prayed; they were not some praying, and others reviling, but every man engaged. As the danger was general, so was the address to heaven; there was not one praying for them all, but every one for himself. They cried every man to his god, the god of his country or city, or his own tutelar deity. It is a testimony against atheism that every man had a god, and had the belief of a god; but it is an instance of the folly of paganism that they had gods many, every man the god he had a fancy for, whereas there can be but one God; there needs be no more. But though they had lost that dictate of the light of nature, that there is but one God, they still were governed by that direction of the law of nature, that God is to be prayed to; "Should not a people seek unto their God," Isa. viii. 19; and that he is especially to be prayed to when we are in distress and danger; "Call upon me in the time of trouble." Is any afflicted? is any frightened? let him pray.

3. Their prayers for deliverance were seconded with endeavours, and having called upon their gods to help them, they did what they could to help themselves; for that is the rule, Help thyself, and God will help thee; "They cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them;" as Paul's mariners, in a like case, cast forth even the tackling of the ship, and the wheat, Acts xxvii. 18, 19, 38. These here were making a trading voyage, as it should seem, and were laden with many goods and merchandises, by which they hoped to get gain; but now they are content to suffer loss, by throwing them all overboard, to save their lives. See how powerful the natural love of life is; "Skin for skin, and all that a man has" will he give for it; and shall we not put a like value upon the spiritual life, the life of the soul, reckoning that the gain of all the world cannot countervail the loss of the soul. See the vanity of worldly wealth, and the uncertainty of its continuance with us. Riches make themselves wings and flee away; nay, and the case may be such that we may be under a necessity of making them wings, and driving them away, as here, when they could not be kept for the owners thereof but to their hurt, so that they themselves are glad to be rid of them, and sink that which otherwise would sink them, though they had no prospect of ever recovering it. Oh that men would be thus wise for their own souls, and would be willing to part with that wealth, pleasure, and honour, which they cannot keep without making shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, and ruining their souls for ever! And they that thus quit their temporal interests for the securing of their spiritual welfare will be unspeakably gainers at last; for what they lose upon those terms they shall find again to life eternal.

But where is Jonah all this while? One would have expected him busier than any there; but we find him gone down into his cabin, nay, into the hold, between the sides of the ship, and there he lies, and is fast asleep; neither the noise without nor the sense of guilt within waked him. Perhaps for some time before he had avoided sleeping, for fear of God's speaking to him again in a dream; and now he imagined himself out of the reach of that danger he slept so much the faster. Note, Sin is of a stupifying nature, and we are concerned to take heed lest at any time our hearts be hardened by the deceitfulness of it. It is the policy of Satan, when by his temptations he has drawn men from God and their duty, to rock them asleep in carnal security, that they may not be sensible of their misery and danger. It concerns us all to watch therefore.

Thirdly. The master of the ship called Jonah up to his prayers; ver. 6, the shipmaster came to him, and bid him for shame get up both to pray for life and prepare for death. He gave him,

1. A just and necessary chiding; "What meanest thou, O sleeper?" Here we commend the shipmaster, who gave him this reproof, for though he was a stranger to him he was for the present as one of his family; and whoever has a precious soul we must help as we can to save it from death. We pity Jonah, who needed this reproof; as a prophet of the Lord, if he had been in his place, he might have been reproving the king of Nineveh, but being out of the way of his duty, he doth himself lie open to the reproofs of a sorry shipmaster. See how men by their sin and folly diminish themselves, and make themselves mean. Yet we must admire God's goodness in sending him this seasonable reproof, for it was the first step towards his recovery, as the crowing of the cock was to Peter. Note, Those that sleep in a storm may well be asked what they mean?

2. A pertinent word of advice; "Arise, call upon thy God." We are here crying every man to his god, why dost not thou get up and cry to thine? Art not thou equally concerned with the rest, both in the danger dreaded and in the deliverance desired? Note, The devotions of others should quicken ours; and those who hope to share in a common mercy ought in all reason to contribute their quota towards the prayers and supplications that are made for it. In time of public distress, if we have any interest at the throne of grace, we ought to improve it for the public good. And the servants of God themselves have sometimes need to be called and stirred up to this part of their duty.
